The Norton Anthology of English Literature

EIGHTH EDITION
VOLUME 1

Stephen Greenblatt, General Editor
COGAN UNIVERSITY PROFESSOR OF THE HUMANITIES, HARVARD UNIVERSITY

M. H. Abrams, Founding Editor Emeritus
CLASS OF 1916 PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH EMERITUS, CORNELL UNIVERSITY

W W NORTON & COMPANY • New York • London
W. W. Norton & Company has been independent since its founding in 1923, when William Warder Norton and Mary D. Herter Norton first published lectures delivered at the People's Institute, the adult education division of New York City's Cooper Union. The Nortons soon expanded their program beyond the Institute, publishing books by celebrated academics from America and abroad. By mid-century, the two major pillars of Norton's publishing program—trade books and college texts—were firmly established. In the 1950s, the Norton family transferred control of the company to its employees, and today—with a staff of four hundred and a comparable number of trade, college, and professional titles published each year—W. W. Norton & Company stands as the largest and oldest publishing house owned wholly by its employees.

Preface to the Eighth Edition

The outpouring of English literature overflows all boundaries, including the capacious boundaries of The Norton Anthology of English Literature. But these pages manage to contain many of the most remarkable works written in English during centuries of restless creative effort. We have included epic poems and short lyrics; love songs and satires; tragedies and comedies written for performance on the commercial stage, and private meditations meant to be perused in silence; prayers, popular ballads, prophecies, ecstatic visions, erotic fantasies, sermons, short stories, letters in verse and prose, critical essays, polemical tracts, several entire novels, and a great deal more. Such works generally form the core of courses that are designed to introduce students to English literature, with its history not only of gradual development, continuity, and dense internal echoes, but also of sudden change and startling innovation.

One of the joys of literature in English is its spectacular abundance. Even within the geographical confines of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, where the majority of texts brought together in this collection originated, one can find more than enough distinguished and exciting works to fill the pages of this anthology many times over. The abundance is all the greater if one takes, as the editors of these volumes do, a broad understanding of the term literature. In the course of several centuries, the meaning of the term has shifted from the whole body of writing produced in a particular language to a subset of that writing consisting of works that claim special attention because of their unusual formal beauty or expressive power. Certain literary works, arousing enduring admiration, have achieved sufficient prominence to serve as widespread models for other writers and thus to constitute something approximating a canon. But just as in English-speaking countries there have never been academies empowered to regulate the use of language, so too there have never been firmly settled guidelines for canonizing particular texts. Any individual text's claim to attention is subject to constant debate and revision; established texts are jostled both by new arrivals and by previously neglected claimants; and the boundaries between the literary and whatever is thought to be "nonliterary" are constantly challenged and redrawn. The heart of this collection consists of poems, plays, and prose fiction, but, like the language in which they are written, these categories are themselves products of ongoing historical transformations, and we have included many texts that call into question any conception of literature as only a limited set of particular kinds of writing. English literature as a field arouses not a sense of order but what Yeats calls "the emotion of multitude."

Following the lead of most college courses, we have separated off, on pragmatic grounds, English literature from American literature, but, in keeping with the multinational, multicultural, and hugely expansive character of the language, we have incorporated, particularly for the modern period, a substantial number of texts by authors from other countries. This border-crossing is not a phenomenon of modernity only. It is fitting that among the first works here is Beowulf, a powerful epic written in the Germanic language known as Old English about a singularly restless Scandinavian hero. Beowulf’s remarkable translator in The Norton Anthology of English Literature, Seamus Heaney, is one of the great contemporary masters of English literature he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1995—but it would be potentially misleading to call him an "English poet" for he was born in Northern Ireland and is not in fact English. It would be still more misleading to call him a "British poet," as if the British Empire were the most salient fact about the language he speaks and writes in or the culture by which he was shaped. What matters is that the language in which Heaney writes is English, and this fact links him powerfully with the authors assembled in these volumes, a linguistic community that stubbornly refuses to fit comfortably within any firm geographical or ethnic or national boundaries. So too, to glance at other authors and writings in the anthology, in the sixteenth century William Tyndale, in exile in the Low Countries and inspired by German religious reformers, translated the New Testament from Greek and thereby changed the course of the English language; in the seventeenth century Aphra Behn deeply touched her readers with a story that moves from Africa, where its hero is born, to South America, where Behn herself may have witnessed some of the tragic events she describes; and early in the twentieth century Joseph Conrad, born in Ukraine of Polish parents, wrote in eloquent English a celebrated novella whose vision of European empire was trenchantly challenged at the century’s end by the Nigerian-born writer in English, Chinua Achebe.

A vital literary culture is always on the move. This principle was the watchword of M. H. Abrams, the distinguished literary critic who first conceived The Norton Anthology of English Literature, brought together the original team of editors, and, with characteristic insight, diplomacy, and humor, oversaw seven editions and graciously offered counsel on this eighth edition. Abrams wisely understood that the dense continuities that underlie literary performance are perpetually challenged and revitalized by innovation. He understood too that new scholarly discoveries and the shifting interests of readers constantly alter the landscape of literary history. Hence from the start he foresaw that, if the anthology were to be successful, it would have to undergo a process of periodic revision and reselection, an ambitious enterprise that would draw upon the energy and ideas of new editors brought in to work with the seasoned team.

The Eighth Edition of The Norton Anthology of English Literature represents the most thoroughgoing instance in its long publishing history of this generational renewal. Across the whole chronological breadth of the volumes, new editors joined forces with the existing editors in a spirit of close collaboration. The revitalized team has considered afresh each of the selections and rethought all the other myriad aspects of the anthology. In doing so, we have, as in past years, profited from a remarkable flow of voluntary corrections and suggestions proposed by teachers, as well as students, who view the anthology with a loyal but critical eye. Moreover, we have again solicited and received detailed information on the works actually assigned, proposals for deletions and additions, and suggestions for improving the editorial matter, from over two hundred reviewers from around the world, almost all of them teachers who use the book in a course. The active participation of an engaged and dedicated community of readers has been crucial as the editors of the Norton Anthology grapple with the task of retaining (and indeed strengthening) the selection of more traditional texts even while adding many texts that reflect the transformation and expansion of the field of English studies. The great challenge (and therefore the interest) of the task is linked to the space constraints that even these hefty volumes must observe. The virtually limitless resources of the anthology's Web site make at least some of the difficult choices less vexing, but the editorial team kept clearly in view the central importance in the classroom of the printed pages. The final decisions on what to include were made by the editors, but we were immeasurably assisted by our ongoing collaboration with teachers and students.

With each edition, The Norton Anthology of English Literature has offered a broadened canon without sacrificing major writers and a selection of complete longer texts in which readers can immerse themselves. Perhaps the most emblematic of these longer texts are the two great epics Beowulf and Paradise Lost. To the extensive list of such complete works, the Eighth Edition has added many others, including Sir Thomas More's Utopia, Samuel Johnson's Rasselas (restored to its entirety), Eliza Haywood's Fantomina, Robert Louis Stevenson's The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Tom Stoppard's Arcadia, and Brian Friel's Translations.

Though this latest edition of The Norton Anthology of English Literature has retained the works that have traditionally been identified and taught as the principal glories of English literature, many of the newer selections reflect the fact that the national conception of literary history, the conception by which English Literature meant the literature of England or at most of Great Britain, has begun to give way to something else. Writers like William Butler Yeats (born in Dublin), Hugh MacDiarmid (born in Dumfriesshire, Scotland), Virginia Woolf (born in London), and Dylan Thomas (born in Swansea, Wales) are now being taught, and are here anthologized, alongside such writers as Nadine Gordimer (born in the Transvaal, South Africa), Alice Munro (born in Wingham, Ontario), Derek Walcott (born on Saint Lucia in the West Indies), V. S. Naipaul (born in Trinidad), and Salman Rushdie (born in Bombay, India). English literature, like so many other collective enterprises in our century, has ceased to be principally about the identity of a single nation; it is a global phenomenon.

We have in this edition continued to expand the selection of writing by women in all of the historical periods. The sustained work of scholars in recent years has recovered dozens of significant authors who had been marginalized or neglected by a male-dominated literary tradition and has deepened our understanding of those women writers who had managed, against considerable odds, to claim a place in that tradition. The First Edition of the Norton Anthology included 6 women writers; this Eighth Edition includes 67, of whom 16 are newly added and 15 are reselected or expanded. Poets and dramatists whose names were scarcely mentioned even in the specialized literary histories of earlier generations—Aemilia Lanyer, Lady Mary Wroth, Elizabeth Cary, Margaret Cavendish, Mary Leapor, Anna Letitia Barbauld, Charlotte Smith, Letitia Elizabeth Landon, and many others—now appear in the company of their male contemporaries. There are in addition four complete long prose works by women—Aphra Behn's Oroonoko, Eliza Haywood's Fantomina, Jane Austen's Love and Friendship, and Virginia Woolf's A Room of One's Own—along with new selections from such celebrated fiction writers as Maria Edgeworth, Jean Rhys, Katherine Mansfield, and Doris Lessing.

The novel is, of course, a stumbling block for an anthology. The length of many great novels defies their incorporation in any volume that hopes to include a broad spectrum of literature. At the same time it is difficult to excerpt representative passages from narratives whose power often depends upon amplitude or upon the slow development of character or upon the onrushing urgency of the story. Therefore, better to represent the achievements of novelists, the publisher is making available the full list of Norton Critical Editions—more than 180 titles, including the most frequently assigned novels: Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice, Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, Charles Dickens's Hard Times, Charlotte Bronte's Jane Eyre, and Emily Bronte's Wuthering Heights. A free Norton Critical Edition may be packaged with Volume 1 or 2 clothbound, paperbound, or three-volume package.

Building on an innovation introduced in the Seventh Edition, the editors have included for each of the periods several clusters that gather together short texts illuminating the cultural, historical, intellectual, and literary concerns of the age. In the Eighth Edition we have rethought, streamlined, and more closely coordinated these clusters with three aims: to make them easier to teach in the space of a class meeting or two, to make them more lively and accessible, and to heighten their relevance to the surrounding works of literature. Hence, for example, a new cluster for the Middle Ages, "Christ's Humanity," broaches one of the broadest and most explosive cultural and literary movements of the period, a movement that brought forth new kinds of readers and writers and a highly contested cultural politics of the visual. Similarly, a new cluster for the eighteenth century, "Liberty," goes to the heart of a central and momentous contradiction: on the one hand, the period's passionate celebration of liberty as the core British value, and, on the other hand, its extensive and profitable engagement in the slave trade. The implications of this contradiction, as the conjoined texts demonstrate, ripple out through English philosophy, law, and literature. Another new cluster, to take a final example, focuses on the fraught relationship between nation and language in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Through the vast extent of the former British Empire and, more recently, through American economic and political power, the English language has displaced or commingled with indigenous languages in many parts of the world. In consequence, imaginative writers from India to Africa, from the Caribbean to Hong Kong, have grappled with the kind of vexed questions about linguistic and national identity that have been confronted by generations of Welsh, Scottish, and Irish writers. The political, psychological, and cultural complexity of these questions is evident in the array of texts brought together in the "Nation and Language" cluster, while their rich literary potential is fully apparent in Brian Friel's powerful play Translations. We supplement the topical clusters for each period by several more extensive topical selections of texts, with illustrations, on the anthology Web site.

Now, as in the past, cultures define themselves by the songs they sing and the stories they love to tell. But the central importance of visual media in contemporary culture has heightened our awareness of the ways in which songs and stories have always been closely linked to the images that societies have fashioned. The Eighth Edition of The Norton Anthology of English Literature features sixty pages of color plates (in seven new color inserts). In addition, black-and-white engravings and illustrations by Hogarth, Blake, and Dante Gabriel Rossetti provide compelling examples of the hybrid art of the "visual narrative." In selecting visual material—from the Sutton Hoo treasure of the seventh century to Anish Kapoor's immense Marsyas in the twenty-first century—the editors sought to provide images that conjure up, whether directly or indirectly, the individual writers in each section; that relate specifically to individual works in the anthology; and that shape and illuminate the culture of a particular literary period. We have tried to choose visually striking images that will interest students and provoke discussion, and our captions draw attention to important details and cross-reference related texts in the anthology.

Period-by-Period Revisions

The scope of the extensive revisions we have undertaken can be conveyed more fully by a list of some of the principal texts and features that have been added to the Eighth Edition.

The Middle Ages. The period, edited by Alfred David and James Simpson, is divided into three sections: Anglo-Saxon Literature, Anglo-Norman Literature, and Middle English Literature of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries. The heart of the Anglo-Saxon section is the great epic Beowulf in an acclaimed translation, specially commissioned for The Norton Anthology of English Literature, by Seamus Heaney. The selection of Anglo-Saxon texts has been newly augmented with the alliterative poem Judith and with King Alfred's preface to the Pastoral Care. The Anglo-Norman section—a key bridge between the Anglo-Saxon period and the time of Chaucer—includes two clusters of texts: "Legendary Histories of Britain" traces the origins of Arthurian romance in the accounts of Geoffrey of Monmouth, Wace, and Layamon. "Celtic Contexts" explores the complex multilingual situation of the period, represented by the Old Irish "Exile of the Sons of Uisliu"; newly added, the conclusion of Thomas of England's Le Roman de Tristan, which comes from Irish, Welsh, and Breton sources and was written down in Old French; and Marie de France's magnificent Breton lay Lanval, one of the period's principal texts, as well as her Chevrefoil, in a new verse translation by Alfred David. A tale from the Confessio Amantis of John Gower, a new author, complements the generous selections from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. We have added new selections from the remarkable Margery Kempe and from Langland's Piers Plowman and an important new topical cluster, "Christ's Humanity." Our representation of medieval drama has been strengthened by the addition of the powerful York Play of the Crucifixion.

The Sixteenth Century. For the first time with this edition, the anthology includes the whole of Thomas More's Utopia, the visionary masterpiece that helped to shape the modern world. Edited by George Logan and Stephen Greenblatt, this period includes five other complete longer texts: Book 1 of Spenser's Faerie Queene, Marlowe's Hero and Leander and Doctor Faustus, and Shakespeare's Twelfth Night and King Lear. The selection of poems offers new works by Wyatt, five additional sonnets by Sidney, five additional sonnets by Shakespeare, and two sonnets by a poet introduced here for the first time, Richard Barnfield. In addition we provide modern prose translations of several of Petrarch's rime in order to show their close relationship with sonnets by Wyatt, Sidney, and Ralegh. The cluster on the period's bitter religious contro-verses, "Faith in Conflict," has been redesigned in order to better represent the Catholic as well as the Protestant position. A new cluster, "Women in Power," greatly expands the selections from Queen Elizabeth and sets her writings alongside those of three compelling new figures: Mary Tudor ("Bloody Mary"), Lady Jane Grey, the tragic queen for nine days, and Mary, Queen of Scots, Elizabeth's cousin and prisoner. The topic as a whole provides insight into the strange position of female rulers attempting to shape their public performances in a society that ordinarily allowed little scope for women's shaping power.

The Early Seventeenth Century. At the heart of this section, edited by Barbara Lewalski and Katharine Eisaman Maus, is John Milton's Paradise Lost, presented in its entirety. Other complete longer works include John Donne's soul-searching Satire 3, Aemilia Lanyer's country-house poem The Description of Cookham, three major works by Ben Jonson (The Masque of Blackness, Volpone [freshly edited by Katharine Eisaman Maus], and the Cary-Morison ode), John Webster's tragedy The Duchess of Malfi, and Milton's Lycidas. Significant additions have been made to the works of Donne, Jonson, Bacon, Carew, and Hobbes. Three newly conceived topical clusters will help teachers organize the rich profusion of seventeenth-century texts. "The Gender Wars" offers the stark contrast between Joseph Swetnam's misogynistic diatribe and Rachel Speght's vigorous response. "Forms of Inquiry" represents the vital intellectual currents of the period by bringing together reselected texts by Bacon, Burton, Browne, and Hobbes. And introducing riveting reports on the trial and execution of Charles I, political writings by the conservative Filmer and the revolutionaries Milton and Winstanley, and searching memoirs by Lucy Hutchinson, Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, Lady Anne Halkett, and Dorothy Waugh, "Crisis of Authority" shows how new literary forms arose out of the trauma of political conflict.

The Restoration and the Eighteenth Century. In response to widespread demand and our own sense of its literary merit, the editors, Lawrence Lipking and James Noggle, include the complete text of Samuel Johnson's philosophical fable Rasselas. We introduce as well Fantomina, a novella of sexual role-playing by an author new to the anthology, Eliza Haywood. Other complete longer texts in this section include Dryden's satires Ahsolom and Achitophel and MacFlecknoe, Aphra Behn's novel Oroonoko, Congreve's comedy The Way of the World, Pope's Essay on Criticism, The Rape of the Lock, and Epistle to Dr. Ahuthnot, Gay's Beggar's Opera, Hogarth's graphic satire "Marriage A-la-Mode," Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes, Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard, and Goldsmith's The Deserted Village. Additions have been made to the works of John Wilmot, Second Earl of Rochester, and Mary Leapor, and the selection from Joseph Addison and Sir Richard Steele has been recast. "Liberty," a new thematic cluster on freedom and slavery, brings together texts by John Locke, Mary Astell, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Third Earl of Shaftesbury, David Hume, Edmund Burke, and others.

The Romantic Period. The principal changes introduced by the editors, Jack Stillinger and Deidre Shauna Lynch, center on significantly increased attention to women writers of both poetry and prose. There are more poems by Anna Letitia Barbauld, Charlotte Smith (including the great long work Beachy Head and a substantial selection from The Emigrants). Mary Robinson, Joanna Baillie, and Felicia Hemans. Mary Wollstonecraft and Dorothy Wordsworth are now joined by two new woman authors, Maria Edgeworth and Jane Austen. Mary Shelley is represented by two works, her introduction to The Last Man and her story "The Mortal Immortal" (Frankenstein, formerly in the anthology, is now available in a Norton Critical Edition). There are additional poems by Robert Burns, William Wordsworth, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and John Keats and new prose pieces by Sir Walter Scott, Charles Lamb, and John Clare. A new topic, "The Gothic and the Development of a Mass Readership," focuses on the controversial history of a genre that continues to shape popular fiction and films. Writings by Horace Walpole, William Beckford, Ann Radcliffe, and "Monk" Lewis, together with commentaries and reviews by contemporaries such as Anna Barbauld and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, illuminate the promise and menace that this period saw in a mode of writing that opened up a realm of nightmarish terror to literary exploration.

The Victorian Age. Among the major additions to this section, edited by Carol Christ and Catherine Robson, are Robert Louis Stevenson's The Strange Case of Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde; two new long poems—Elizabeth Barrett Browning's poem The Runaway Slave at Pilgrim's Point and Dante Gabriel Rossetti's Jenny; a new complete text of FitzGerald's The Rubaiyat of Omar Kayyam; and Rudyard Kipling's The White Man's Burden and If. Kipling's novella The Man Who Would Be King and Oscar Wilde's comedy The Importance of Being Earnest continue to be featured, as does the poetry of Tennyson, Robert Browning, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Christina Rossetti, and others. Along with the widely assigned "Victorian Issues" clusters (Evolution, Industrialism, and the "Woman Question"), we present the topic "Empire and National Identity." This is an innovative and highly teachable sequence of paired texts, grappling with fiercely contentious issues that repeatedly arose across the empire's vast extent.

The Twentieth Century and After. A host of new writers and topics mark this major revision by the editors, Jon Stallworthy and Jahan Ramazani. The section now features two brilliant plays, Brian Friel's Translations and Tom Stoppard's Arcadia, both of which have vital connections to literary and cultural issues that extend throughout these volumes. The many writers introduced to the anthology for the first time include the Indian poet A. K. Ramanujan, the Canadian poet Anne Carson, and the English poet Carol Ann Duffy. There are new stories by E. M. Forster and Jean Rhys, a new selection from J. M. Coetzee's Waiting for the Barbarians, and new poems by W. B. Yeats, W. H. Auden, Derek Walcott, and Ted Hughes. There is, as before, a remarkable array of complete longer texts, including Hardy's "On the Western Circuit," Conrad's Heart of Darkness, Woolf's A Room of One's Own, Eliot's The Waste Land, Mansfield's "The Garden Party" and "The Daughters of the Late Colonel," Beckett's Endgame, Lessing's 'To Room Nineteen,' Pinter's The Dumb Waiter, Achebe's Things Fall Apart, and Naipaul's One Out of Many. And two new, highly innovative topics will enable teachers to introduce students to major aspects of the period's cultural scene. The first, "Modernist Manifestos," brings together the radical experiments of T. E. Hulme, Ezra Pound, H. D., Wyndham Lewis, and Mina Loy. The second, "Nation and Language," gets to the heart of the questions that face colonial and postcolonial writers who must grapple with the power, at once estranging and liberating, of the English language. The voices in this cluster, Claude McKay, Hugh MacDiarmid, Louise Bennett, Brian Friel, Kamau Brathwaite, Wole Soyinka, Tony Harrison, Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o, Salman Rushdie, and John Agard, bear eloquent witness to the global diffusion of English, the urgency of unresolved issues of nation and identity, and the rich complexity of literary history. That history is not a straightforward sequence. Seamus Heaney's works, to which two new poems... have been added, provide the occasion to look back again to Heaney's translation of Beowulf at the beginning of the anthology. This translation is a reminder that the most recent works can double back upon the distant past, and that words set down by men and women who have crumbled into dust can speak to us with astonishing directness.

Editorial Procedures

The Eighth Edition adheres to the core principles that have always characterized The Norton Anthology of English Literature. Period introductions, headnotes, and annotation are designed to enhance students' reading and, without imposing an interpretation, to give students the information they need to understand each text. The aim of these editorial materials is to make the anthology self-sufficient, so that it can be read anywhere—in a coffee bar, on a bus, or under a tree. Above all, we have tried always to keep in mind the actual classroom situation. Teachability is central to every aspect of these volumes.

Our fidelity to a trusted and well-tried format may make it difficult for long-time users to take in, at first glance, how thoroughgoing and extensive the revisions to the Eighth Edition actually are. The editorial team undertook to rethink and update virtually everything in these pages, from the endpaper maps, scrutinized for accuracy by Catherine Robson and redrawn by cartographer Adrian Kitzinger, to the appendix on English money, which, thanks to James Noggle's clever chart, now provides, at a glance, answers to the perennial question, But what was money actually worth? Similarly, "Religions in England," rewritten by Katharine Maus, and "Geographic Nomenclature," revised by Jahan Ramazani, quickly and elegantly illuminate what students have often found obscure. Each volume of the anthology includes a "Poems in Process" section, revised and expanded by Deidre Lynch with the help of Alfred David and James Simpson, which reproduces from manuscripts and printed texts the genesis and evolution of a number of poems whose final form is printed in that volume. And, thanks to the thoroughgoing work of James Simpson, we now have a freshly conceived and thoroughly rewritten "Literary Terminology" appendix, recast as a quick-reference alphabetical glossary with examples from works in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Drawing upon the latest scholarship and upon classroom experience, the editors have substantially rewritten the period introductions and headnotes. We have updated as well the bibliographies and have carefully revised the timelines. And we have provided in-text references to the Norton Literature Online Web site. With all aspects of the anthology's apparatus our intention is to facilitate direct and informed access to the extraordinary works of literature assembled here.

The Norton Anthology of English Literature prides itself on both the scholarly accuracy and the readability of its texts. To ease students' encounter with some works, we have normalized spelling and capitalization in texts up to and including the Romantic period—for the most part they now follow the conventions of modern English; we leave unaltered, however, texts in which such modernizing would change semantic or metrical qualities. From the Victorian period onward, we have restored the original spelling and punctuation to selections retained from the previous edition.

We continue other editorial procedures that have proved useful in the past. After each work, we cite the date of first publication on the right; in some instances, this date is followed by the date of a revised edition for which the author was responsible. Dates of composition, when they differ from those of publication and when they are known, are provided on the left. We have used square brackets to indicate titles supplied by the editors for the convenience of readers. Whenever a portion of a text has been omitted, we have indicated that omission with three asterisks. If the omitted portion is important for following the plot or argument, we have provided a brief summary within the text or in a footnote. Finally, we have reconsidered annotations throughout and increased the number of marginal glosses for archaic, dialect, or unfamiliar words.

Additional Resources

With the Eighth Edition of The Norton Anthology of English Literature, the publisher is proud to launch an extensive new resource—Norton Literature Online (wwnorton.com/literature)—the gateway to all of the outstanding online literature resources available from Norton. Students who activate the password included in each new copy of the anthology will find at Norton Literature Online a deep and broad array of general resources, among them a glossary of literary terms, advice on writing about literature and using MLA documentation style, study aids and quizzes, a portrait gallery featuring 380 authors, more than 100 maps, and over 90 minutes of recorded readings and musical selections. To encourage students to explore Norton Literature Online, cross-references in the anthology draw attention to relevant materials, notably to the 27 topical clusters (augmenting the 17 in-text topics) in the much-praised Norton Topics Online site. Prepared by the anthology editors, each topic includes an introduction, a gathering of annotated texts and images, and study questions and research links. For use with the Eighth Edition, three entirely new Twentieth Century topics—"Imagining Ireland," "Modernist Experiment," and "Representing the Great War"—and a recast Romantic topic, "The Satanic and Byronic Hero," have been added, among other updates and improvements. Norton Literature Online is also the portal to the Online Archive (wwnorton.com/nael/noa), which offers more than 150 downloadable texts from the Middle Ages through the early Victorian period, as well as some 80 audio files. An ongoing project, the Online Archive is being expanded with all public-domain texts trimmed from The Norton Anthology of English Literature over six editions. A new feature of the archive, a Publication Chronology, lists over 1,000 texts and the edition of the anthology in which each was introduced, dropped, and sometimes reintroduced. As such, the table, and the archive of texts now being assembled (a massive project of a few years' duration) are a unique window on changing interests in the teaching of English literature over four decades.

Teaching with The Norton Anthology of English Literature: A Guide for Instructors has been reconceived for ease of use and substantially rewritten by Sondra Archimedes, University of California, Santa Cruz; Elizabeth Fowler, University of Virginia; Laura Runge, University of South Florida; and Philip Schwyzzer, University of Exeter. The Guide offers extensive help with teaching a course, from planning, to developing a syllabus and course objectives, to preparing exams. For authors and works, the Guide entries provide a "hook" to start class discussion; a "Quick Read" section to help instructors review essential information about a text or author; teaching suggestions that call out interesting textual or contextual features; teaching clusters of suggested groups or pairs of texts; and discussion questions. Built into the Guide for Instructors is a freestanding Media Guide, by Philip Schwyzer, which offers specific suggestions for integrating the anthology's rich multimedia resources with the text and for incorporating them into traditional or distance-learning courses. Finally, the Norton Resource Library (wivnorton.com/nrl), also by Philip Schwyzer, offers instructors brief period introductions and "class sessions" to facilitate close reading, art galleries and literary links, enhanced period timelines, essay assignments, sample syllabi, and instructions for customizing the material. These materials are compatible with WebCT and other course management systems.

The editors are deeply grateful to the hundreds of teachers worldwide who have helped us to improve The Norton Anthology of English Literature. A list of the advisors who prepared in-depth reviews and of the instructors who replied to a detailed questionnaire follows on a separate page, under Acknowledgments. The editors would like to express appreciation for their assistance to Elizabeth Anker (University of Virginia), Sandie Byrne (Oxford University), Timothy Campbell (Indiana University), Sarita Cargas (Oxford University), Jason Coats (University of Virginia), Joseph W. Childers (University of California, Riverside), Daniel Cook (University of California, Davis), Linda David, Christopher Fanning (Queens University), William Flesch (Brandeis University), Robert Folkensflik (University of California, Irvine), Robert D. Fulk (Indiana University), Omaar Hena (University of Virginia), Tom Keirstead (Indiana University), Shayna Kessel (University of Southern California), Joanna Lipking (Northwestern University), Ian Little (Liverpool University), Tricia Lootens (University of Georgia), Erin Minear (Harvard University), Elaine Musgrave (University of California, Davis), J. We especially thank John W. Sider (Westmont College) for his meticulous review of standing annotations and myriad suggestions for improvements. We also thank the many people at Norton who contributed to the Eighth Edition: Julia Reidhead, who served not only as the inhouse supervisor but also as an unfailingly wise and effective collaborator in every aspect of planning and accomplishing this Eighth Edition; Marian Johnson, managing editor for college books, who kept the project moving forward with a remarkable blend of focused energy, intelligence, and common sense; Kurt Wildermuth, developmental and project editor; Alice Falk, Katharine Ings, Candace Levy, Alan Shaw, and Ann Tappert, manuscript editors; Eileen Connell, electronic media editor; Diane O’Connor, production manager; Nancy Rodwan and Katrina Washington, permissions managers; Toni Krass, designer; Neil Ryder Hoos, art researcher; Erin Granville, associate editor; and Catherine Spencer, editorial assistant. All these friends provided the editors with indispensable help in meeting the challenge of representing the unparalleled range and variety of English literature.

We dedicate this Eighth Edition of The Norton Anthology of English Literature to our friend, mentor, and inspiring guide M. H. Abrams. His shaping power over these volumes and the profession it serves will long endure.
Acknowledgments

Among our many critics, advisors, and friends, the following were of especial help toward the preparation of the Eighth Edition, either by offering advice or by providing critiques of particular periods of the anthology: Daniel Albright (University of Rochester), David L. Anderson (Butler County Community College), Judith H. The Middle Ages to ca. 1485

43—ca. 420: Roman invasion and occupation of Britain
ca. 450: Anglo-Saxon Conquest
597: St. Augustine arrives in Kent; beginning of Anglo-Saxon conversion to Christianity 871-899: Reign of King Alfred 1066: Norman Conquest
1154-1189: Reign of Henry II
c. 1200: Beginnings of Middle English literature
1360—1400: Geoffrey Chaucer; Piers Plowman; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight
1485: William Caxton’s printing of Sir Thomas Malory’s Morte Darthur, one of the first books printed in England

The Middle Ages designates the time span roughly from the collapse of the Roman Empire to the Renaissance and Reformation. The adjective "medieval," coined from Latin medium (middle) and aevum (age), refers to whatever was made, written, or thought during the Middle Ages. The Renaissance was so named by nineteenth-century historians and critics because they associated it with an outburst of creativity attributed to a "rebirth" or revival of Latin and, especially, of Greek learning and literature. The word "Reformation" designates the powerful religious movement that began in the early sixteenth century and repudiated the supreme authority of the Roman Catholic Church. The Renaissance was seen as spreading from Italy in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries to the rest of Europe, whereas the Reformation began in Germany and quickly affected all of Europe to a greater or lesser degree. The very idea of a Renaissance or rebirth, however, implies something dormant or lacking in the preceding era. More recently, there have been two non-exclusive tendencies in our understanding of the medieval period and what follows. Some scholars emphasize the continuities between the Middle Ages and the later time now often called the Early Modern Period. Others emphasize the ways in which sixteenth-century writers in some sense "created" the Middle Ages, in order to highlight what they saw as the brilliance of their own time. Medieval authors, of course, did not think of themselves as living in the "middle"; they sometimes expressed the idea that the world was growing old and that theirs was a declining age, close to the end of time. Yet art, literature, and science flourished during the Middle Ages, rooted in the Christian culture that preserved, transmitted, and transformed classical tradition.

The works covered in this section of the anthology encompass a period of more than eight hundred years, from Casdmon’s Hymn at the end of the seventh century to Everyman at the beginning of the sixteenth. The date 1485, the year of the accession of Henry VI and the beginning of the Tudor dynasty, is an arbitrary but convenient one to mark the "end" of the Middle Ages in England.

Although the Roman Catholic Church provided continuity, the period was one of enormous historical, social, and linguistic change. To emphasize these changes and the events underlying them, we have divided the period into three primary sections: Anglo-Saxon Literature, Anglo-Norman Literature, and Middle English Literature in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries. The Anglo-Saxon invaders, who began their conquest of the southeastern part of Britain around 450, spoke an early form of the language we now call Old English. Old English displays its kinship with other Germanic languages (German or Dutch, for example) much more clearly than does contemporary British and American English, of which Old English is the ancestor. As late as the tenth century, part of an Old Saxon poem written on the Continent was transcribed and transliterated into the West Saxon dialect of Old English without presenting problems to its English readers. In form and content Old English literature also has much in common with other Germanic literatures with which it shared a body of heroic as well as Christian stories. The major characters in Beowulf are pagan Danes and Geats, and the only connection to England is an obscure allusion to the ancestor of one of the kings of the Angles.

The changes already in progress in the language and culture of Anglo-Saxon England were greatly accelerated by the Norman Conquest of 1066. The ascendancy of a French-speaking ruling class had the effect of adding a vast number of French loan words to the English vocabulary. The conquest resulted in new forms of political organization and administration, architecture, and literary expression. In the twelfth century, through the interest of the Anglo-Normans in British history before the Anglo-Saxon Conquest, not only England but all of Western Europe became fascinated with a legendary hero named Arthur who makes his earliest appearances in Celtic literature. King Arthur and his knights became a staple subject of medieval French, English, and German literature. Selections from Latin, French, and Old Irish, as well as from Early Middle English have been included here to give a sense of the cross-currents of languages and literatures in Anglo-Norman England and to provide background for later English literature in all periods.

Literature in English was performed orally and written throughout the Middle Ages, but the awareness of and pride in a uniquely English literature does not actually exist before the late fourteenth century. In 1336 Edward III began a war to enforce his claims to the throne of France; the war continued intermittently for one hundred years until finally the English were driven from all their French territories except for the port of Calais. One result of the war and these losses was a keener sense on the part of England's nobility of their English heritage and identity. Toward the close of the fourteenth century English finally began to displace French as the language for conducting business in Parliament and much official correspondence. Although the high nobility continued to speak French by preference, they were certainly bilingual, whereas some of the earlier Norman kings had known no English at all. It was becoming possible to obtain patronage for literary achievement in English. The decision of Chaucer (d. 1400) to emulate French and Italian poetry in his own vernacular is an indication of the change taking place in the status of English, and Chaucer's works were greatly to enhance the prestige of English as a vehicle for literature of high ambition. He was acclaimed by fifteenth-century poets as the embelisher of the English tongue; later writers called him the English Homer and the father of English poetry. His friend

John Gower (1330?—1408) wrote long poems in French and Latin before producing his last major work, the Confessio Amantis (The Lover’s Confession), which in spite of its Latin title is composed in English.

The third and longest of the three primary sections, Middle English Literature in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, is thus not only a chronological and linguistic division but implies a new sense of English as a literary medium that could compete with French and Latin in elegance and seriousness.

Book production throughout the medieval period was an expensive process. Until the invention of moveable type in the mid-fifteenth century (introduced into England by Caxton in 1476), medieval books were reproduced by hand in manuscript (literally "written by hand"). While paper became increasingly common for less expensive manuscripts in the fifteenth century, manuscripts were until then written on carefully prepared animal (usually calf or sheep) skin, known as parchment or vellum. More expensive books could be illuminated both by colored and calligraphic lettering, and by visual images.

The institutions of book production developed across the period. In the Anglo-Saxon period monasteries were the main centers of book production and storage. Until their dissolution in the 1530s, monastic and other religious houses continued to produce books, but from the early fourteenth century, particularly in London, commercial book-making enterprises came into being. These were loose organizations of various artisans such as parchmentmakers, scribes, flourishers, illuminators, and binders, who usually lived in the same neighborhoods in towns. A bookseller or dealer (usually a member of one of these trades) would coordinate the production of books to order for wealthy patrons, sometimes distributing the work of copying to different scribes, who would be responsible for different gatherings, or quires, of the same book. Such shops could call upon the services of professional scribes working in the bureaucracies of the royal court.

The market for books also changed across the period: while monasteries, other religious houses, and royal courts continued to fund the production of books, from the Anglo-Norman period books were also produced for (and sometimes by) noble and gentry households. From the fourteenth century the market was widened yet further, with wealthy urban patrons also ordering books. Some of these books were dedicated to single works, some largely to single genres; most were much more miscellaneous, containing texts of many kinds and (particularly in the Anglo-Norman period) written in different languages (especially Latin, French and English). Only a small proportion of medieval books survive; large numbers were destroyed at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries in the 1530s.

Texts in Old English, Early Middle English, the more difficult texts in later Middle English (Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, Piers Plowman), and those in other languages are given in translation. Chaucer and other Middle English works may be read in the original, even by the beginner, with the help of marginal glosses and notes. These texts have been spelled in a way that is intended to aid the reader. Analyses of the sounds and grammar of Middle English and of Old and Middle English prosody are presented on pages 15—21.
Britons. The Britons adapted themselves to Roman civilization, of which the ruins survived to impress the poet of The Wanderer, who refers to them as "the old works of giants." The withdrawal of the Roman legions during the fifth century, in a vain attempt to protect Rome itself from the threat of Germanic conquest, left the island vulnerable to seafaring Germanic invaders. These belonged primarily to three related tribes, the Angles, the Saxons, and the Jutes. The name English derives from the Angles, and the names of the counties Essex, Sussex, and Wessex refer to the territories occupied by the East, South, and West Saxons.

The Anglo-Saxon occupation was no sudden conquest but extended over decades of fighting against the native Britons. The latter were, finally, largely confined to the mountainous region of Wales, where the modern form of their language is spoken alongside English to this day. The Britons had become Christians in the fourth century after the conversion of Emperor Constantine along with most of the rest of the Roman Empire, but for about 150 years after the beginning of the invasion, Christianity was maintained only in the remoter regions where the as yet pagan Anglo-Saxons failed to penetrate. In the year 597, however, a Benedictine monk (afterward St. Augustine of Canterbury) was sent by Pope Gregory as a missionary to King Ethelbert of Kent, the most southerly of the kingdoms into which England was then divided, and about the same time missionaries from Ireland began to preach Christianity in the north. Within 75 years the island was once more predominantly Christian. Before Christianity there had been no books. The impact of Christianity on literacy is evident from the fact that the first extended written specimen of the Old English (Anglo-Saxon) language is a code of laws promulgated by Ethelbert, the first English Christian king.

In the centuries that followed the conversion, England produced many distinguished churchmen. One of the earliest of these was Bede, whose Latin Ecclesiastical History of the English People, which tells the story of the conversion and of the English church, was completed in 731; this remains one of our most important sources of knowledge about the period. In the next generation Alcuin (735—804), a man of wide culture, became the friend and adviser of the Frankish emperor Charlemagne, whom he assisted in making the Frankish court a great center of learning; thus by the year 800 English culture had developed so richly that it overflowed its insular boundaries.

In the ninth century the Christian Anglo-Saxons were themselves subjected to new Germanic invasions by the Danes who in their longboats repeatedly ravaged the coast, sacking Bede’s monastery among others. Such a raid date in the tenth century inspired The Battle of Maldon, the last of the Old English heroic poems. The Danes also occupied the northern part of the island, threatening to overrun the rest. They were stopped by Alfred, king of the West Saxons from 871 to 899, who for a time united all the kingdoms of southern England. This most active king was also an enthusiastic patron of literature. He himself translated various works from Latin, the most important of which was Boethius’s Consolation of Philosophy, a sixth-century Roman work also translated in the fourteenth century by Chaucer. Alfred probably also instigated a translation of Bede’s History and the beginning of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; this year-by-year record in Old English of important events in England was maintained at one monastery until the middle of the twelfth century. Practically all of Old English poetry is preserved in copies made in the West Saxon dialect after the reign of Alfred.
The Anglo-Saxon invaders brought with them a tradition of oral poetry (see "Bede and Csedmon's Hymn," p. 24). Because nothing was written down before the conversion to Christianity, we have only circumstantial evidence of what that poetry must have been like. Aside from a few short inscriptions on small artifacts, the earliest records in the English language are in manuscripts produced at monasteries and other religious establishments, beginning in the seventh century. Literacy was mainly restricted to servants of the church, and so it is natural that the bulk of Old English literature deals with religious subjects and is mostly drawn from Latin sources. Under the expensive conditions of manuscript production, few texts were written down that did not pertain directly to the work of the church. Most of Old English poetry is contained in just four manuscripts.

Germanic heroic poetry continued to be performed orally in alliterative verse and was at times used to describe current events. The Battle of Brunaburh, which celebrates an English victory over the Danes in traditional alliterative verse, is preserved in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. The Battle of Maldon commemorates a Viking victory in which the Christian English invoke the ancient code of honor that obliges a warrior to avenge his slain lord or to die beside him.

These poems show that the aristocratic heroic and kinship values of Germanic society continued to inspire both clergy and laity in the Christian era. As represented in the relatively small body of Anglo-Saxon heroic poetry that survives, this world shares many characteristics with the heroic world described by Homer. Nations are reckoned as groups of people related by kinship rather than by geographical areas, and kinship is the basis of the heroic code. The tribe is ruled by a chieftain who is called king, a word that has "kin" for its root. The lord (a word derived from Old English hlaf, "loaf," plus weard, "protector") surrounds himself with a band of retainers (many of them his blood kindred) who are members of his household. He leads his men in battle and rewards them with the spoils; royal generosity was one of the most important aspects of heroic behavior. In return, the retainers are obligated to fight for their lord to the death, and if he is slain, to avenge him or die in the attempt. Blood vengeance is regarded as a sacred duty, and in poetry, everlasting shame awaits those who fail to observe it.

Even though the heroic world of poetry could be invoked to rally resistance to the Viking invasions, it was already remote from the Christian world of Anglo-Saxon England. Nevertheless, Christian writers like the Beowulf poet were fascinated by the distant culture of their pagan ancestors and by the inherent conflict between the heroic code and a religion that teaches that we should "forgive those who trespass against us" and that "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." The Beowulf poet looks back on that ancient world with admiration for the courage of which it was capable and at the same time with elegiac sympathy for its inevitable doom.

For Anglo-Saxon poetry, it is difficult and probably futile to draw a line between "heroic" and "Christian," for the best poetry crosses that boundary. Much of the Christian poetry is also cast in the heroic mode: although the Anglo-Saxons adapted themselves readily to the ideals of Christianity, they did not do so without adapting Christianity to their own heroic ideal. Thus Moses and St. Andrew, Christ and God the Father are represented in the style of heroic verse. In the Dream of the Rood, the Cross speaks of Christ as "the young hero, . . . strong and stouthearted." In Csedmon's Hymn the creation of heaven and earth is seen as a mighty deed, an "establishment of wonders." Anglo-Saxon heroines, too, are portrayed in the heroic manner. St. Helena, who leads an expedition to the Holy Land to discover the true Cross, is described as a "battle-queen." The biblical narrative related in the Anglo-Saxon poem Judith is recast in the terms of Germanic heroic poetry. Christian and heroic ideals are poignantly blended in The Wanderer, which laments the separation from one's lord and kinsmen and the transience of all earthly treasures. Love between man and woman, as described by the female speaker of The Wife's Lament, is disrupted by separation, exile, and the malice of kinsfolk.

The world of Old English poetrys often elegiac. Men are said to be cheerful in the mead hall, but even there they think of war, of possible triumph but more possible failure. Romantic love—one of the principal topics of later literature—appears hardly at all. Even so, at some of the bleakest moments, the poets powerfully recall the return of spring. The blade of the magic sword with which Beowulf has killed Grendel's mother in her sinister underwater lair begins to melt, "as ice melts / when the Father eases the fetters off the frost / and unravels the water ropes, He who wields power."

The poetic diction, formulaic phrases, and repetitions of parallel syntactic structures, which are determined by the versification, are difficult to reproduce in modern translation. A few features may be anticipated here and studied in the text of Csedmon's Hymn, printed below (pp. 25—27) with interlinear translation.

Poetic language is created out of a special vocabulary that contains a multiplicity of terms for lord, warrior, spear, shield, and so on. Synecdoche and metonymy are common figures of speech as when "keel" is used for ship or "iron," for sword. A particularly striking effect is achieved by the kenning, a compound of two words in place of another as when sea becomes "whale-road" or body is called "life-house." The figurative use of language finds playful expression in poetic riddles, of which about one hundred survive. Common (and sometimes uncommon) creatures, objects, or phenomena are described in an enigmatic passage of alliterative verse, and the reader must guess their identity. Sometimes they are personified and ask, "What is my name?"

Because special vocabulary and compounds are among the chief poetic effects, the verse is constructed in such a way as to show off such terms by creating a series of them in apposition. In the second sentence of Csedmon's Hymn, for example, God is referred to five times appositively as "he," "holy Creator," "mankind's Guardian," "eternal Lord," and "Master Almighty." This use of parallel and appositive expressions, known as variation, gives the verse a highly structured and musical quality.

The overall effect of the language is to formalize and elevate speech. Instead of being straightforward, it moves at a slow and stately pace with steady indirection. A favorite mode of this indirection is irony. A grim irony pervades heroic poetry even at the level of diction where fighting is called "battle-play." A favorite device, known by the rhetorical term enotes, is ironic understatement. After the monster Grendel has slaughtered the Danes in the great hall Heorot, it stands deserted. The poet observes, "It was easy then to meet with a man / shifting himself to a safer distance."

More than a figure of thought, irony is also a mode of perception in Old English poetry. In a famous passage, the Wanderer articulates the theme of
INTRODUCTION  /  7

Ubi sunt? (where are they now?): "Where has the horse gone? Where the young warrior? Where the giver of treasure? . . ." Beowulf is full of ironic balances and contrasts—between the aged Danish king and the youthful Beowulf, and between Beowulf, the high-spirited young warrior at the beginning, and Beowulf, the gray-haired king at the end, facing the dragon and death.

The formal and dignified speech of Old English poetry was always distant from the everyday language of the Anglo-Saxons, and this poetic idiom remained remarkably uniform throughout the roughly three hundred years that separate Caedmon's Hymn from The Battle of Maldon. This clinging to old forms—grammatical and orthographic as well as literary—by the Anglo-Saxon church and aristocracy conceals from us the enormous changes that were taking place in the English language and the diversity of its dialects. The dramatic changes between Old and Middle English did not happen overnight or over the course of a single century. The Normans displaced the English ruling class with their own barons and clerics, whose native language was a dialect of Old French that we call Anglo-Norman. Without a ruling literate class to preserve English traditions, the custom of transcribing vernacular texts in an earlier form of the West-Saxon dialect was abandoned, and both language and literature were allowed to develop unchecked in new directions.

ANGLO-NORMAN LITERATURE

The Normans, who took possession of England after the decisive Battle of Hastings (1066), were, like the Anglo-Saxons, descendants of Germanic adventurers, who at the beginning of the tenth century had seized a wide part of northern France. Their name is actually a contraction of 'Norsemen.' A highly adaptable people, they had adopted the French language of the land they had settled in and its Christian religion. Both in Normandy and in Britain they were great builders of castles, with which they enforced their political dominance, and magnificent churches. Norman bishops, who held land and castles like the barons, wielded both political and spiritual authority. The earlier Norman kings of England, however, were often absentee rulers, as much concerned with defending their Continental possessions as with ruling over their English holdings. The English Crown's French territories were enormously increased in 1154 when Henry II, the first of England's Plantagenet kings, ascended the throne. Through his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine, the divorced wife of Louis VII of France, Henry had acquired vast provinces in the southwest of France.

The presence of a French-speaking ruling class in England created exceptional opportunities for linguistic and cultural exchange. Four languages coexisted in the realm of Anglo-Norman England: Latin, as it had been for Bede, remained the international language of learning, used for theology, science, and history. It was not by any means a written language only but also a lingua franca by which different nationalities communicated in the church and the newly founded universities. The Norman aristocracy for the most part spoke French, but intermarriage with the native English nobility and the business of daily life between masters and servants encouraged bilingualism. Different branches of the Celtic language group were spoken in Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany.

Inevitably, there was also literary intercourse among the different languages. The Latin Bible and Latin saints' lives provided subjects for a great deal of Old English as well as Old French poetry and prose. The first medieval drama in the vernacular, The Play of Adam, with elaborate stage directions in Latin and realistic dialogue in the Anglo-Norman dialect of French, was probably produced in England during the twelfth century.

The Anglo-Norman aristocracy was especially attracted to Celtic legends and tales that had been circulating orally for centuries. The twelfth-century poets Thomas of England, Marie de France and Chretien de Troyes each claim to have obtained their narratives from Breton storytellers, who were probably bilingual performers of native tales for French audiences. 'Breton' may indicate that they came from Brittany, or it may have been a generic term for a Celtic bard. Marie speaks respectfully of the storytellers, while Thomas expresses caution about their tendency to vary narratives; Chretien accuses them of marring their material, which, he boasts, he has retold with an elegant fusion of form and meaning. Marie wrote a series of short romances, which she refers to as 'lays' originally told by Bretons. Her versions are the most original and sophisticated examples of the genre that came to be known as the Breton lay, represented here by Marie's Lanval and Chevrefoil. It is very likely that Henry II is the "noble king" to whom she dedicated her lays and that they were written for his court. Thomas composed a moving, almost operatic version of the adulterous passion of Tristran and Isolt, very different from the powerful version of the same story by Beroul, also composed in the last half of the twelfth century. Chretien is the principal creator of the romance of chivalry in which knightly adventures are a means of exploring psychological and ethical dilemmas that the knights must solve, in addition to displaying martial prowess in saving ladies from monsters, giants, and wicked knights. Chretien, like Marie, is thought to have spent time in England at the court of Henry II.

Thomas, Marie, and Chretien de Troyes were innovators of the genre that has become known as "romance." The word roman was initially applied in French to a work written in the French vernacular. Thus the thirteenth-century Roman de Troie is a long poem about the Trojan War in French. While this work deals mainly with the siege of Troy, it also includes stories about the love of Troilus for Cressida and of Achilles for the Trojan princess Polyxena. Eventually, "romance" acquired the generic associations it has for us as a story about love and adventure.

Romance was the principal narrative genre for late medieval readers. Insofar as it was centrally concerned with love, it developed ways of representing psychological interiority with great subtlety. That subtlety itself provoked a sub-genre of questions about love. Thus in the late twelfth century, Andreas Capellanus (Andrew the Chaplain) wrote a Latin treatise, the title of which may be translated The Art of Loving Correctly [honeste]. In one part, Eleanor of Aquitaine, her daughter, the countess Marie de Champagne, and other noble women are cited as a supreme court rendering decisions on difficult questions of love—for example, whether there is greater passion between lovers or between married couples. Whether such "courts of love" were purely imaginary or whether they represent some actual court entertainment, they imply that the literary taste and judgment of women had a significant role in fostering the rise of romance in France and Anglo-Norman England.

In Marie's Lanval and in Chretien's romances, the court of King Arthur had already acquired for French audiences a reputation as the most famous center of chivalry. That eminence is owing in large measure to a remarkable book in Latin, The History of the Kings of Britain, completed by Geoffrey of Monmouth, ca. 1136—38. Geoffrey claimed to have based his "history" on a book in the British tongue (i.e., Welsh), but no one has ever found such a book. He drew on a few earlier Latin chronicles, but the bulk of his history was probably fabricated from Celtic oral tradition, his familiarity with Roman history and literature, and his own fertile imagination. The climax of the book is the reign of King Arthur, who defeats the Roman armies but is forced to turn back to Britain to counter the treachery of his nephew Mordred. In 1155 Geoffrey's Latin was rendered into French rhyme by an Anglo-Norman poet called Wace, and fifty or so years later Wace's poem was turned by Layamon, an English priest, into a much longer poem that combines English alliterative verse with sporadic rhyme.

Layamon's work is one of many instances where English receives new material directly through French sources, which may be drawn from Celtic or Latin sources. There are two Middle English versions of Marie's Lanval, and the English romance called Yvain and Gawain is a cruder version of Chretien's Le Chevalier au Lion (The Knight of the Lion). There is a marvelous English lay, Sir Orfeo, a version of the Orpheus story in which Orpheus succeeds in rescuing his wife from the other world, for which a French original, if there was one, has never been found. Romance, stripped of its courtly, psychological, and ethical subtleties, had an immense popular appeal for English readers and listeners. Many of these romances are simplified adaptations of more aristocratic French poems and recount in a rollicking and rambling style the adventures of heroes like Guy of Warwick, a poor steward who must prove his knightly worth to win the love of Fair Phyllis. The ethos of many romances, aristocratic and popular alike, involves a knight proving his worthiness through nobility of character and brave deeds rather than through high birth. In this respect romances reflect the aspirations of a lower order of the nobility to rise in the world, as historically some of these nobles did. William the Marshall, for example, the fourth son of a baron of middle rank, used his talents in war and in tournaments to become tutor to the oldest son of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine. He married a great heiress and became one of the most powerful nobles in England and the subject of a verse biography in French, which often reads like a romance.

Of course, not all writing in Early Middle English depends on French sources or intermediaries. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle continued to be written at the monastery of Peterborough. It is an invaluable witness for the changes taking place in the English language and allows us to see Norman rule from an English point of view. The Owl and the Nightingale (12th century) is a witty and entertaining poem in which these two female birds engage in a fierce debate about the benefits their singing brings to humankind. The owl grimly reminds her rival of the sinfulness of the human condition, which her mournful song is intended to amend; the nightingale sings about the pleasures of life and love when lord and lady are in bed together. The poet, who was certainly a cleric, is well aware of the fashionable new romance literature; he specifically has the nightingale allude to Marie de France's lay Laiistic, the Breton word, she says, for 'rossignol' in French and 'nightingale' in English. The poet does not side with either bird; rather he has amusingly created the sort of dialectic between the discourses of religion and romance that is carried on throughout medieval literature.

There is also a body of Early Middle English religious prose aimed at women.
Three saints’ lives celebrate the heroic combats of virgin martyrs who suffer dismemberment and death; a tract entitled Holy Maidenhead paints the woes of marriage not from the point of view of the husband, as in standard medieval antifeminist writings, but from that of the wife. Related to these texts, named the Katherine Group after one of the virgin martyrs, is a religious work also written for women but in a very different spirit. The Ancrene Riwle (Anchoresses’ Rule), or Ancrene Wisse (Anchoresses’ Guide) as it is called in another manuscript, is one of the finest works of English religious prose in any period. It is a manual of instruction written at the request of three sisters who have chosen to live as religious recluses. The author, who may have been their personal confessor, addresses them with affection, and, at times, with kindness and humor. He is also profoundly serious in his analyses of sin, penance, and love. In the selection included here from his chapter on love, he, too, tells a tale of romance in a strikingly different way.

MIDDLE ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES

The styles of The Owl and the Nightingale and Ancrene Riwle show that around the year 1200 both poetry and prose were being written for sophisticated and well-educated readers whose primary language was English. Throughout the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, there are many kinds of evidence that, although French continued to be the principal language of Parliament, law, business, and high culture, English was gaining ground. Several authors of religious and didactic works in English state that they are writing for the benefit of those who do not understand Latin or French. Anthologies were made of miscellaneous works adapted from French for English readers and original pieces in English. Most of the nobility were by now bilingual, and the author of an English romance written early in the fourteenth century declares that he has seen many nobles who cannot speak French. Children of the nobility and the merchant class are now learning French as a second language. By the 1360s the linguistic, political, and cultural climate had been prepared for the flowering of Middle English literature in the writings of Chaucer, Gower, Langland, and the Gawain poet.

The Fourteenth Century

War and disease were prevalent throughout the Middle Ages but never more devastatingly than during the fourteenth century. In the wars against France, the gains of two spectacular English victories, at Crecy in 1346 and Poitiers in 1356, were gradually frittered away in futile campaigns that ravaged the French countryside without obtaining any clear advantage for the English. In 1348 the first and most virulent epidemic of the bubonic plague—the Black Death—swept Europe, wiping out a quarter to a third of the population. The toll was higher in crowded urban centers. Giovanni Boccaccio’s description of the plague in Florence, with which he introduces the Decameron, vividly portrays its ravages: "So many corpses would arrive in front of a church every day and at every hour that the amount of holy ground for burials was certainly insufficient for the ancient custom of giving each body its individual place; when all the graves were full, huge trenches were dug in all of the cemeteries of the churches and into them the new arrivals were dumped by the hundreds; and they were packed in there with dirt, one on top of another, like a ship's cargo, until the trench was filled." The resulting scarcity of labor and a sudden expansion of the possibilities for social mobility fostered popular discontent. In 1381 attempts to enforce wage controls and to collect oppressive new taxes provoked a rural uprising in Essex and Kent that dealt a profound shock to the English ruling class. The participants were for the most part tenant farmers, day laborers, apprentices, and rural workers not attached to the big manors. A few of the lower clergy sided with the rebels against their wealthy church superiors; the priest John Ball was among the leaders. The movement was quickly suppressed, but not before sympathizers in London had admitted the rebels through two city gates, which had been barred against them. The insurgents burned down the palace of the hated duke of Lancaster, and they summarily beheaded the archbishop of Canterbury and the treasurer of England, who had taken refuge in the Tower of London. The church had become the target of popular resentment because it was among the greatest of the oppressive landowners and because of the wealth, worldliness, and venality of many of the higher clergy.

These calamities and upheavals nevertheless did not stem the growth of international trade and the influence of the merchant class. In the portrait of Geoffrey Chaucer's merchant, we see the budding of capitalism based on credit and interest. Cities like London ran their own affairs under politically powerful mayors and aldermen. Edward III, chronically in need of money to finance his wars, was obliged to negotiate for revenues with the Commons in the English Parliament, an institution that became a major political force during this period. A large part of the king's revenues depended on taxing the profitable export of English wool to the Continent. The Crown thus became involved in the country's economic affairs, and this involvement led to a need for capable administrators. These were no longer drawn mainly from the church, as in the past, but from a newly educated laity that occupied a rank somewhere between that of the lesser nobility and the upper bourgeoisie. The career of Chaucer, who served Edward III and his successor Richard II in a number of civil posts, is typical of this class—with the exception that Chaucer was also a great poet.

In the fourteenth century, a few poets and intellectuals achieved the status and respect formerly accorded only to the ancients. Marie de France and Chretien de Troyes had dedicated their works to noble patrons and, in their role as narrators, address themselves as entertainers and sometimes as instructors to court audiences. Dante (1265—1321) made himself the protagonist of The Divine Comedy, the sacred poem, as he called it, in which he revealed the secrets of the afterlife. After his death, manuscripts of the work were provided with lengthy commentaries as though it were Scripture, and public readings and lectures were devoted to it. Francis Petrarch (1304—1374) won an international reputation as a man of letters. He wrote primarily in Latin and contrived to have himself crowned "poet laureate" in emulation of the Roman poets whose works he imitated, but his most famous work is the sonnet sequence he wrote in Italian. Giovanni Boccaccio (1313—1375) was among Petrarch's most ardent admirers and carried on a literary correspondence with him.

Chaucer read these authors along with the ancient Roman poets and drew on them in his own works. Chaucer's Clerk's Tale is based on a Latin version Petrarh made from the last tale in Boccaccio's Decameron: in his prologue, the Clerk refers to Petrarch as "lauriat poete" whose sweet rhetoric illuminated all Italy with his poetry. Yet in his own time, the English poet Chaucer never attained the kind of laurels that he and others accorded to Petrarch. In his earlier works, Chaucer portrayed himself comically as a diligent reader of old books, as an aspiring apprentice writer, and as an eager spectator on the fringe of a fashionable world of courtiers and poets. In The House of Fame, he relates a dream of being snatched up by a huge golden eagle (the eagle and many other things in this work were inspired by Dante), who transports him to the palace of the goddess Fame. There he gets to see phantoms, like the shades in Dante’s poem, of all the famous authors of antiquity. At the end of his romance Troilus and Criseyde, Chaucer asks his “litel book” to kiss the footsteps where the great ancient poets had passed before. Like Dante and Petrarch, Chaucer had an ideal of great poetry and, in his Troilus at least, strove to emulate it. But in The House of Fame and in his final work, The Canterbury Tales, he also views that ideal ironically and distances himself from it. The many surviving documents that record Geoffrey Chaucer’s career as a civil servant do not contain a single word to show that he was also a poet. Only in the following centuries would he be canonized as the father of English poetry.

Chaucer is unlikely to have known his contemporary William Langland, who says in an autobiographical passage (see pp. 352—54), added to the third and last version of his great poem Piers Plowman, that he lived in London on Cornhill (a poor area of the city) among “lollers.” “Loller” was a slang term for the unemployed and transients; it was later applied to followers of the religious and social reformer John Wycliffe, some of whom were burned at the stake for heresy in the next century. Langland assailed corruption in church and state, but he was certainly no radical. It is thought that he may have written the third version of Piers Plowman, which tones down his attacks on the church, after the rebels of 1381 invoked Piers as one of their own. Although Langland does not condone rebellion and his religion is not revolutionary, he nevertheless presents the most clear-sighted vision of social and religious issues in the England of his day. Piers Plowman is also a painfully honest search for the right way that leads to salvation. Though learned himself, Langland and the dreamer who represents him in the poem arrive at the insight that learning can be one of the chief obstacles on that way.

Langland came from the west of England, and his poem belongs to the “Alliterative Revival,” a final flowering in the late fourteenth century of the verse form that goes all the way back to Anglo-Saxon England. Anglo-Saxon traditions held out longest in the west and north, away from London, where Chaucer and his audience were more open to literary fashions from the Continent.

John Gower is a third major late fourteenth-century English poet. While his first and second large works are written in French and Latin verse respectively, his Confessio Amantis (1390) is written in English octosyllabic couplets. Gower’s first two works are severe satires; the Confessio, by contrast, broaches political and ethical issues from an oblique angle. Its primary narrative concerns the treatment of a suffering lover. His therapy consists of listening to, and understanding, many other narratives, many of which are drawn from classical sources. Like Chaucer, Gower anglicizes and absorbs classical Latin literature.

Admiration for the poetry of both Chaucer and Gower and the controversial nature of Langland’s writing assured the survival of their work in many manuscripts. The work of a fourth major fourteenth-century English poet, who remains anonymous, is known only through a single manuscript, which contains four poems all thought to be by a single author: Cleanness and Patience, two biblical narratives in alliterative verse; Pearl, a moving dream vision in which a grief-stricken father is visited and consoled by his dead child, who has been transformed into a queen in the kingdom of heaven; and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, the finest of all English romances. The plot of Gawain involves a folklore motif of a challenge by a supernatural visitor, first found in an Old Irish tale. The poet has made this motif a challenge to King Arthur's court and has framed the tale with allusions at the beginning and end to the legends that link Arthur's reign with the Trojan War and the founding of Rome and of Britain. The poet has a sophisticated awareness of romance as a literary genre and plays a game with both the hero's and the reader's expectations of what is supposed to happen in a romance. One could say that the broader subject of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight is "romance" itself, and in this respect the poem resembles Chaucer's Canterbury Tales in its author's interest in literary form.

Julian of Norwich is a fifth major writer of this period. The first known woman writer in the English vernacular, the anchoress Julian participates in a Continental tradition of visionary writings, often by women. She spent a good deal of her life meditating and writing about a series of visions, which she called "showings," that she had received in 1373, when she was thirty years old. While very carefully negotiating the dangers of writing as a woman, and of writing sophisticated theology in the vernacular, Julian manages to produce visionary writing that is at once penetrating and serene.

The Fifteenth Century

In 1399 Henry Bolingbroke, the duke of Lancaster, deposed his cousin Richard II, who was murdered in prison. As Henry IV, he successfully defended his crown against several insurrections and passed it on to Henry V, who briefly united the country once more and achieved one last apparently decisive victory over the French at the Battle of Agincourt (1415). The premature death of Henry V in 1422, however, left England exposed to the civil wars known as the Wars of the Roses, the red rose being the emblem of the house of Lancaster; the white, of York. These wars did not end until 1485, when Henry Tudor defeated Richard III at Bosworth Field and acceded to the throne as Henry VII.

The most prolific poet of the fifteenth century was the monk John Lydgate (1371?—1449), who produced dream visions; a life of the Virgin; translations of French religious allegories; a Troy Book; The Siege of Thebes, which he framed as a "new" Canterbury tale; and a thirty-six-thousand-line poem called
The Fall of Princes, a free translation of a French work, itself based on a Latin work by Boccaccio. The last illustrates the late medieval idea of tragedy, namely that emperors, kings, and other famous men enjoy power and fortune only to be cast down in misery. Lydgate shapes these tales as a "mirror" for princes, i.e., as object lessons to the powerful men of his own day, several of whom were his patrons. A self-styled imitator of Chaucer, Lydgate had a reputation almost equal to Chaucer's in the fifteenth century. The other significant poet of the first half of the fifteenth century is Thomas Hoccleve (1367?— 1426). Like Lydgate, Hoccleve also wrote for powerful Lancastrian patrons, but his poetry is strikingly private, painfully concerned as it often is with his penury and mental instability.

Religious works of all kind continued to be produced in the fifteenth cen-
The Lancastrian authorities responded to the reformist religious movement known as "Lollardy" in draconian ways. They introduced a statute for the burning of heretics (the first such statute) in 1401, and a series of measures designed to survey and censor theology in English in 1409. Despite this, many writers continued to produce religious works in the vernacular. Perhaps the most remarkable of these writers is Margery Kempe (who records her visit to Julian of Norwich in about 1413). Kempe made pilgrimages to the Holy Land, Rome, Santiago, and to shrines in Northern Europe. These she records, in the context of her often fraught and painful personal life, in her Book of Margery Kempe. Both Julian of Norwich and Margery Kempe, in highly individual ways, allow us to see the medieval church and its doctrines from female points of view.

Social, economic, and literary life continued as they had throughout all of the previously mentioned wars. The prosperity of the towns was shown by performances of the mystery plays—a sequence or "cycle" of plays based on the Bible and produced by the city guilds, the organizations representing the various trades and crafts. The cycles of several towns are lost, but those of York and Chester have been preserved, along with two other complete cycles, one possibly from Wakefield in Yorkshire, and the other titled the 'N-Town' Cycle. Under the guise of dramatizing biblical history, playwrights such as the Wakefield Master manage to comment satirically on the social ills of the times. The century also saw the development of the morality play, in which personified vices and virtues struggle for the soul of "Mankind" or "Everyman." Performed by professional players, the morality plays were precursors of the professional theater in the reign of Elizabeth I.

The best of Chaucer’s imitators was Robert Henryson, who, in the last quarter of the fifteenth century, wrote The Testament of Cresseid, a continuation of Chaucer’s great poem Troilus and Criseyde. He also wrote the Moral Fathils of Esope, among which The Cock and the Fox, included here, is a remake of Chaucer’s Nun’s Priest’s Tale.

The works of Sir Thomas Malory (d. 1471) gave the definitive form in English to the legend of King Arthur and his knights. Malory spent years in prison Englishing a series of Arthurian romances that he translated and abridged chiefly from several enormously long thirteenth-century French prose romances. Malory was a passionate devotee of chivalry, which he personified in his hero Sir Lancelot. In the jealousies and rivalries that finally break up the round table and destroy Arthur’s kingdom, Malory saw a distant image of the civil wars of his own time. A manuscript of Malory’s works fell into the hands of William Caxton (1422?—1492), who had introduced the new art of printing by movable type to England in 1476. Caxton divided Malory’s tales into the chapters and books of a single long work, as though it were a chronic history, and gave it the title Morte Darthur, which has stuck to it ever since. Caxton also printed The Canterbury Tales, some of Chaucer’s earlier works, and Gower’s Confesso Amantis. Caxton himself translated many of the works he printed for English readers: a history of Troy, a book on chivalry, Aesop’s fables, The History of Reynard the Fox, and The Game and Playe of Chesse. The new technology extended literacy and made books more easily accessible to new classes of readers. Printing made the production of literature a business and made possible the bitter political and doctrinal disputes that, in the sixteenth century, were waged in print as well as on the field of battle.
MEDIEVAL ENGLISH

The medieval works in this anthology were composed in different states of our language. Old English, the language that took shape among the Germanic settlers of England, preserved its integrity until the Norman Conquest radically altered English civilization. Middle English, the first records of which date from the early twelfth century, was continually changing. Shortly after the introduction of printing at the end of the fifteenth century, it attained the form designated as Early Modern English. Old English is a very heavily inflected language. (That is, the words change form to indicate changes in function, such as person, number, tense, case, mood, and so on. Most languages have some inflection—for example, the personal pronouns in Modern English have different forms when used as objects—but a "heavily inflected" language is one in which almost all classes of words undergo elaborate patterns of change.) The vocabulary of Old English is almost entirely Germanic. In Middle English, the inflectional system was weakened, and a large number of words were introduced into it from French, so that many of the older Anglo-Saxon words disappeared. Because of the difficulty of Old English, all selections from it in this book have been given in translation. So that the reader may see an example of the language, Caedmon's Hymn has been printed in the original, together with an interlinear translation. The present discussion, then, is concerned primarily with the relatively late form of Middle English used by Chaucer and the East Midland dialect in which he wrote.

The chief difficulty with Middle English for the modern reader is caused not by its inflections so much as by its spelling, which may be described as a rough-and-ready phonetic system, and by the fact that it is not a single standardized language, but consists of a number of regional dialects, each with its own peculiarities of sound and its own systems for representing sounds in writing. The East Midland dialect—the dialect of London and of Chaucer, which is the ancestor of our own standard speech—differs greatly from the dialect spoken in the west of England (the original dialect of Piers Plowman), from that of the northwest (Sir Gawain and the Green Knight), and from that of the north (The Second Shepherds' Play). In this book, the long texts composed in the more difficult dialects have been translated or modernized, and those that—like Chaucer, Gower, Everyman, and the lyrics—appear in the original, have been re-spelled in a way that is designed to aid the reader. The remarks that follow apply chiefly to Chaucer's East Midland English, although certain non-Midland dialectal variations are noted if they occur in some of the other selections.

I. The Sounds of Middle English: General Rules

The following general analysis of the sounds of Middle English will enable the reader who does not have time for detailed study to read Middle English aloud and preserve some of its most essential characteristics, without, however, worrying too much about details. The next section, "Detailed Analysis," is designed for the reader who wishes to go more deeply into the pronunciation of Middle English. The best way of absorbing the sound of Middle English pronunciation is to listen to it; Norton Literature Online offers recordings of selections as an aid to this end.

Middle English differs from Modern English in three principal respects: (I) the pronunciation of the long vowels a, e, i (or y), o, and u (spelled ou, ow):
(2) the fact that Middle English final e is often sounded; and (3) the fact that all Middle English consonants are sounded.

1. LONG VOWELS

Middle English vowels are long when they are doubled (aa, ee, oo) or when they are terminal (be, to, holy); a, e, and o are long when followed by a single consonant plus a vowel (name, mete, note). Middle English vowels are short when they are followed by two consonants.

Long a is sounded like the a in Modern English "father": maken, madd.
Long e may be sounded like the a in Modern English "name" (ignoring the distinction between the close and open vowel): he, sweete.
Long i (or y) is sounded like the i in Modern English "machine": lif, whit;
myn, holy.
Long o may be sounded like the o in Modern English "note" (again ignoring the distinction between the close and open vowel): do, soone.
Long u (spelled ou, ow) is sounded like the oo in Modern English "goose":
hous, flowr.

Note that in general Middle English long vowels are pronounced like long vowels in modern European languages other than English. Short vowels and diphthongs, however, may be pronounced as in Modern English.

2. FINAL E

In Middle English syllabic verse, final e is sounded like the a in "sofa" to provide a needed unstressed syllable: Another Nonne with hire hadde she. But (cf. hire in the example) final e is suppressed when not needed for the meter.
It is commonly silent before words beginning with a vowel or h.

3. CONSONANTS

Middle English consonants are pronounced separately in all combinations—gnat: g-nat; knave: k-nave; write: w-rite; folk: fol-k. In a simplified system of pronunciation the combination gh as in night or thought may be treated as if it were silent.

Doubled vowels and terminal vowels are always long, whereas single vowels before two consonants other than th, ch are always short. The vowels a, e, and o are long before a single consonant followed by a vowel; name, sehe (sick), holy. In general, words that have descended into Modern English reflect their original Middle English quantity: liven (to live), but lif (life).

The close and open sounds of long e and long o may often be identified by the Modern English spellings of the words in which they appear. Original long close e is generally represented in Modern English by ee: "sweet," "knee," "teeth," "see" have close e in Middle English, but so does "be": original long open e is generally represented in Modern English by ex: "meat," "heath," "sea," "great," "breath" have open e in Middle English. Similarly, original long close o is now generally represented by ooc "soon," "food," "good," but also "do," "to"; original long open o is represented either by oa or by o: "coat," "boat," "moan," but also "go," "bone," "foue," "home." Notice that original close o is now almost always pronounced like the oo in "goose," but that original open o is almost never so pronounced; thus it is often possible to identify the Middle English vowels through Modern English sounds.

The nonphonetic Middle English spelling of o for short u has been preserved in a number of Modern English words ("love," "son," "come"), but in others u has been restored: "run" (Sonne), "run" (ronne).

For the treatment of final e, see "General Rules," "Final e."

<td>thought, lowe</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Note that in words with ou, ow that in Modern English are sounded with the ou of "about," the combination indicates not the diphthong but the simple vowel long u (see "Simple Vowels").

3. CONSONANTS

In general, all consonants except h were always sounded in Middle English, including consonants that have become silent in Modern English, such as the g in gnaw, the k in knight, the l in folk, and the w in write. In noninitial gn, however, the g was silent as in Modern English "sign." Initial h was silent in short common English words and in words borrowed from French and may have been almost silent in all words. The combination gh as in night or thought was sounded like the ch of German ich or nach. Note that Middle English gg represents both the hard sound of "dagger" and the soft sound of "bridge."

III. Parts of Speech and Grammar

1. NOUNS

The plural and possessive of nouns end in es, formed by adding s or es to the singular: knight, knihtes; roote, rootes-. A final consonant is frequently doubled before es: hed, beddes. A common irregular plural is yen, from ye. eye.
The chief comparisons with Modern English are as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Modern English</th>
<th>East Midlands</th>
<th>Middle English</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>I</td>
<td>l. ich (ik is a northern form)</td>
<td></td>

</tr>
<tr>
<td>their</td>
<td>hir (their is a Northern form)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>them</td>
<td>hem (them is a Northern form)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

In formal speech, the second person plural is often used for the singular. The possessive adjectives my, thy take an before a word beginning with a vowel or h; thyn ye, rayn host.

3. ADJECTIVES

Adjectives ending in a consonant add final e when they stand before the noun they modify and after another modifying word such as the, this, that, or nouns or pronouns in the possessive; a good hors, but the (this, my, the hinges) goode hors. They also generally add e when standing before and modifying a plural noun, a noun in the vocative, or any proper noun: goode men, oh goode man, faire Venus.

Adjectives are compared by adding er(e) for the comparative, est(e) for the superlative. Sometimes the stem vowel is shortened or altered in the process: sweete, swettere, swettest; long, lenger, lengest.

4. ADVERBS

Adverbs are formed from adjectives by adding e, by, or liche; the adjective fair thus yields faire, fairly, fairliche.

5. VERBS

Middle English verbs, like Modern English verbs, are either weak or strong. Weak verbs form their preterites and past participles with a t or d suffix and preserve the same stem vowel throughout their systems, although it is sometimes shortened in the preterite and past participle: love, loved; bend, bend; hear, heard; meet, met. Strong verbs do not use the t or d suffix, but vary their stem vowel in the preterite and past participle: take, took, taken; begin, began, begun; find, found, found.

The inflectional endings are the same for Middle English strong verbs and weak verbs except in the preterite singular and the imperative singular. In the following paradigms, the weak verbs loven (to love) and heeren (to hear), and the strong verbs taken (to take) and ginnen (to begin) serve as models.

The present plural ending eth is southern, whereas the e(n) ending is Midland and characteristic of Chaucer. In the north, s may appear as the ending of all persons of the present. In the weak preterite, when the ending e gave a verb three or more syllables, it was frequently dropped. Note that in certain strong verbs like ginnen there are two distinct stem vowels in the preterite; even in Chaucer’s time, however, one of these had begun to replace the other, and Chaucer occasionally writes gan for all persons of the preterite.

In verbs like ginnen, which have two stem vowels in the indicative preterite, it is the vowel of the plural and of the second person singular that is used for the preterite subjunctive.

The imperative singular of most weak verbs is e: (thou) love, but of some weak verbs and all strong verbs, the imperative singular is without termination: (thou) heer, taak, gin. The imperative plural of all verbs is either e or eth: (ye) love(th), heere(th), take(th), ginne(th).

The infinitive of verbs is e or en: love(n), heere(n), take(n), ginne(n).

The past participle of weak verbs is the same as the preterite without inflectional ending: loved, herd. In strong verbs the ending is either e or en: take(n), gonne(n). The prefix y often appears on past participles: yloved, yherd, ytake(n).

OLD AND MIDDLE ENGLISH PROSODY

All the poetry of Old English is in the same verse form. The verse unit is the single line, because rhyme was not used to link one line to another, except very occasionally in late Old English. The organizing device of the line is alliteration, the beginning of several words with the same sound (“Foemen fled”). The Old English alliterative line contains, on the average, four principal stresses and is divided into two half-lines of two stresses each by a strong medial caesura, or pause. These two half-lines are linked to each other by the alliteration; at least one of the two stressed words in the first half-line, and often both of them, begin with the same sound as the first stressed word of the second half-line (the second stressed word is generally nonalliterative). The fourth line of Beowulf is an example (sc has the value of modern sh; j) is a runic symbol with the value of modern th:

Oft Scyld Sceafing
scæjDena joretum.

For further examples, see Casdmon’s Hymn. It will be noticed that any vowel alliterates with any other vowel. In addition to the alliteration, the length of the unstressed syllables and their number and pattern is governed by a highly complex set of rules. When sung or intoned—as it was—to the rhythmic strumming of a harp, Old English poetry must have been wonderfully impressive in the dignified, highly formalized way that aptly fits both its subject matter and tone.

The majority of Middle English verse is either in alternately stressed rhyming verse, adapted from French after the conquest, or in alliterative verse that is descended from Old English. The latter preserves the caesura of Old English and in its purest form the same alliterative system, the two stressed words of the first half-line (or at least one of them) alliterating with the first stressed word in the second half-line. But most of the alliterative poets allowed themselves a number of deviations from the norm. All four stressed words may alliterate, as in the first line of Piers Plowman:

In a summer season when soft was the sun.

Or the line may contain five, six, or even more stressed words, of which all or only the basic minimum may alliterate:

Air/ield/ull of olk/ound I there between.

There is no rule determining the number of unstressed syllables, and at times some poets seem to ignore alliteration entirely. As in Old English, any vowel may alliterate with any other vowel; furthermore, since initial h was silent or lightly pronounced in Middle English, words beginning with h are treated as though they began with the following vowel.

There are two general types of stressed verse with rhyme. In the more common, unstressed and stressed syllables alternate regularly as x X x X x X or, with two unstressed syllables intervening a s x x X x X x X or a combination of the two s x x X x X x X (of the reverse patterns, only X X X x x X is common in English). There is also a line that can only be defined as containing a predetermined number of stressed syllables but an irregular number and pattern of unstressed syllables. Much Middle English verse has to be read without expectation of regularity; some of this was evidently composed in the irregular meter, but some was probably originally composed according to a strict metrical system that has been obliterated by scribes careless of fine points. One receives the impression that many of the lyrics—as well as the Second Shepherds' Play—were at least composed with regular syllabic alternation. In the play Everyman, only the number of stresses is generally predetermined but not the number or placement of unstressed syllables.

In pre-Chaucerian verse the number of stresses, whether regularly or irregularly alternated, was most often four, although sometimes the number was three and rose in some poems to seven. Rhyme in Middle English (as in Modern English) may be either between adjacent or alternate lines, or may occur in more complex patterns. Most of the Canterbury Tales are in rhymed couplets, the line containing five stresses with regular alternation—technically known as iambic pentameter, the standard English poetic line, perhaps introduced into English by Chaucer. In reading Chaucer and much pre-Chaucerian verse, one must remember that the final e, which is silent in Modern English, could be pronounced at any time to provide a needed unstressed syllable. Evidence seems to indicate that it was also pronounced at the end of the line, even though it thus produced a line with eleven syllables. Although he was a very regular metricist, Chaucer used various conventional devices that are apt to make the reader stumble until he or she understands them. Final e is often not pronounced before a word beginning with a vowel or h, and may be suppressed whenever metrically convenient. The same medial and terminal syllables that are slurred in Modern English are apt to be suppressed in Chaucer’s English: Canterbury for Canterbury; ev’r (perhaps e’er) for evere. The plural in es may either be syllabic or reduced to s as in Modern English. Despite these seeming irregularities, Chaucer’s verse is not difficult to read if one constantly bears in mind the basic pattern of the iambic pentameter line.

BEDE (ca. 673-735) and CSEDMON'S HYMN

The Venerable Bede (the title by which he is known to posterity) became a novice at the age of seven and spent the rest of his life at the neighboring monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow. Although he may never have traveled beyond the boundaries of his native district of Northumbria, he achieved an international reputation as one of the greatest scholars of his age. Writing in Latin, the learned language of the era, Bede produced many theological works as well as books on science and rhetoric, but his most popular and enduring work is the Ecclesiastical History of the English People (completed 731). The History tells about the Anglo-Saxon conquest and the vicissitudes of the petty kingdoms that comprised Anglo-Saxon England; Bede's main theme, however, is the spread of Christianity and the growth of the English church. The latter were the great events leading up to Bede's own time, and he regarded them as the unfolding of God's providence. The History, therefore, also a moral work and a hagiography—that is, it contains many stories of saints and miracles meant to testify to the grace and glory of God.

The story we reprint preserves what is probably the earliest extant Old English poem (composed sometime between 658 and 680) and the only biographical information, outside of what is said in the poems themselves, about any Old English poet. Bede tells how Caedmon, an illiterate cowherd employed by the monastery of Whitby, miraculously received the gift of song, entered the monastery, and became the founder of a school of Christian poetry. Caedmon was clearly an oral-formulaic poet, one who created his work by combining and varying formulas—units of verse developed in a tradition transmitted by one generation of singers to another. In this respect he resembles the singers of the Homeric poems and oral-formulaic poets recorded in the twentieth century, especially in the Balkan countries. Although Bede tells us that Caedmon had never learned the art of song, we may suspect that he concealed his skill from his fellow workmen and from the monks because he was ashamed of knowing "vain and idle" songs, the kind Bede says Caedmon never composed. Caedmon's inspiration and the true miracle, then, was to apply the meter and language of such songs, presumably including pagan heroic verse, to Christian themes.

Although most Old English poetry was written by lettered poets, they continued to use the oral-formulaic style. The Hymn is, therefore, a good short example of the way Old English verse, with its traditional poetic diction and interwoven formulaic expressions, is constructed. Eight of the poem's eighteen half-lines contain epithets describing various aspects of God: He is Weard (Guardian), Meotod (Measurer), Wuldor-Fseder (Glory-Father), Drihten (Lord), Scyppend (Creator), and Frea (Master). God is heofonrices Weard or mancynnes Weard (heaven's or mankind's Guardian), depending on the alliteration required. This formulaic style provides a richness of texture and meaning difficult to convey in translation. As Bede said about his own Latin paraphrase of the Hymn, no literal translation of poetry from one language to another is possible without sacrifice of some poetic quality.

Several manuscripts of Bede's History contain the Old English text in addition to Bede's Latin version. The poem is given here in a West Saxon form with a literal interlinear translation. In Old English spelling, se (as in Caedmon's name and line 3) is a vowel symbol that represents the vowel of Modern English cat; (?) (line 2) and 5 (line 7) both represented the sound th. The spelling sc (line 1) = sh; g (line 1) = y in yard; c (line 1) = ch in chin; c (line 2) = k. The large space in the middle of the line indicates the caesura. The alliterating sounds that connect the half-lines are printed in bold italics.

From An Ecclesiastical History of the English People

(The Story of Caedmon)

Heavenly grace had especially singled out a certain one of the brothers in the monastery ruled by this abbess, for he used to compose devout and religious songs. Whatever he learned of holy Scripture with the aid of interpreters, he quickly turned into the sweetest and most moving poetry in his own language, that is to say English. It often happened that his songs kindled a contempt for this world and a longing for the life of Heaven in the hearts of many men. Indeed, after him others among the English people tried to compose religious poetry, but no one could equal him because he was not taught the art of song by men or by human agency but received this gift through heavenly grace. Therefore, he was never able to compose any vain and idle songs but only such as dealt with religion and were proper for his religious tongue to utter. As a matter of fact, he had lived in the secular estate until he was well advanced in age without learning any songs. Therefore, at feasts, when it was decided to have a good time by taking turns singing, whenever he would see the harp getting close to his place, he got up in the middle of the meal and went home.

Once when he left the feast like this, he went to the cattle shed, which he had been assigned the duty of guarding that night. And after he had stretched himself out and gone to sleep, he dreamed that someone was standing at his side and greeted him, calling out his name. 'Caedmon,' he said, 'sing me something.'

And he replied, 'I don't know how to sing; that is why I left the feast to come here—because I cannot sing.'

"All the same," said the one who was speaking to him, "you have to sing for me."

"What must I sing?" he said.

And he said, "Sing about the Creation."

At this, Caedmon immediately began to sing verses in praise of God the Creator, which he had never heard before and of which the sense is this:

Nu sculon foerigean
Now we must praise

Meotodes weashte the Measurer's might

weorc Wuldor-Fseder
the work of the Glory-Father, and his modgeDanc

and his mind-plans,

swa he wundra gehwas

when he of wonders of every one,

I. Abbess Hilda (614–680), a grandniece of the first Christian king of Northumbria, founded Whitby, a double house for monks and nuns, in 657 and ruled over it for twenty-two years.

2. Oral poetry was performed to the accompaniment of a harp; here the harp is being passed from one participant of the feast to another, each being expected to perform in turn.
He merest sceop

This is the general sense but not the exact order of the words that he sang in his sleep;² for it is impossible to make a literal translation, no matter how well-written, of poetry into another language without losing some of the beauty and dignity. When he woke up, he remembered everything that he had sung in his sleep, and to this he soon added, in the same poetic measure, more verses praising God.

The next morning he went to the reeve,⁶ who was his foreman, and told him about the gift he had received. He was taken to the abbess and ordered to tell his dream and to recite his song to an audience of the most learned men so that they might judge what the nature of that vision was and where it came from. It was evident to all of them that he had been granted the heavenly grace of God. Then they expounded some bit of sacred story or teaching to him, and instructed him to turn it into poetry if he could. He agreed and went away. And when he came back the next morning, he gave back what had been commissioned to him in the finest verse.

Therefore, the abbess, who cherished the grace of God in this man, instructed him to give up secular life and to take monastic vows. And when she and all those subject to her had received him into the community of brothers, she gave orders that he be taught the whole sequence of sacred history. He remembered everything that he was able to learn by listening, and turning it over in his mind like a clean beast that chews the cud,⁷ he converted it into sweetest song, which sounded so delightful that he made his teachers, in their turn, his listeners. He sang about the creation of the world and the origin of the human race and all the history of Genesis; about the exodus of Israel out of Egypt and entrance into the promised land; and about many other stories of sacred Scripture, about the Lord’s incarnation, and his passion,⁸ resurrection, and ascension into Heaven; about the advent of the Holy Spirit and the teachings of the apostles. He also made many songs about the terror of the monastery.

9. The great majority of extant Old English poems are on religious subjects like those listed here, but most are thought to be later than Caedmon.

THE DREAM OF THE ROOD

The Dream of the Rood (i.e., of the Cross) is the finest of a rather large number of religious poems in Old English. Neither its author nor its date of composition is known. It appears in a late tenth-century manuscript located in Vercelli in northern Italy, a manuscript made up of Old English religious poems and sermons. The poem may antedate its manuscript, because some passages from the Rood’s speech were carved, with some variations, in runes on a stone cross at some time after its construction early in the eighth century; this is the famous Ruthwell Cross, which is preserved near Dumfries in southern Scotland. The precise relation of the poem to this cross is, however, uncertain.

The experience of the Rood—its humiliation at the hands of those who changed it from tree to instrument of punishment for criminals, its humility when the young hero Christ mounts it, and its pride as the restored “tree of glory”—has a suggestive relevance to the condition of the sad, lonely, sin-stained Dreamer. His isolation and melancholy is typical of exile figures in Old English poetry. For the Rood, however, glory has replaced torment, and at the end, the Dreamer’s description of Christ’s triumphant entry into heaven with the souls He has liberated from hell reflects the Dreamer’s response to the hope that has been brought to him. Christ and the Cross both act, paradoxically, in keeping with, and diametrically opposed to, a code of heroic action: Christ is heroic and passive, while the Cross is loyal to its lord, yet must participate in his death.

The Dream of the Rood¹

Listen, I will speak of the best of dreams, of what I dreamed at midnight when men and their voices were at rest. It seemed to me that I saw a most rare tree reach high aloft, wound in light, brightest of beams. All that beacon was covered with gold; gems stood fair where it met the ground, five were above about the crosspiece. Many hosts of angels gazed on it, fair in the form created for them. This was surely no felon’s gallows, but holy spirits beheld it there, men upon earth, and all this glorious creation. Wonderful was the triumph-tree, and I stained with sins, wounded with wrongdoings. I saw the tree of glory shine splendidly, adorned with garments, decked with gold: jewels had worthily covered the Lord’s tree. Yet through that gold I might perceive ancient agony of wretches, for now it began to bleed on the right side.¹ I was all afflicted with sorrows, I was afraid for that fair sight. I saw that bright beacon change in clothing and color: now it was wet with moisture, drenched with flowing of blood, now adorned with treasure. Yet I, lying there a long while troubled, beheld the Saviour's tree until I heard it give voice: the best of trees began to speak words.

"It was long ago—I remember it still—that I was hewn down at the wood's edge, taken from my stump. Strong foes seized me there, hewed me to the shape they wished to see, commanded me to lift their criminals. Men carried me on their shoulders, then set me on a hill; foes enough fastened me there. Then I saw the Lord of mankind hasten with stout heart, for he would climb upon me. I dared not bow or break against God's word when I saw earth's surface tremble. I might have felled all foes, but I stood fast. Then the young Hero stripped himself—that was God Almighty—strong and stouthearted. He climbed on the high gallows, bold in the sight of many, when he would free mankind. I trembled when the Warrior embraced me, yet I dared not bow to earth, fall to the ground's surface; but I must stand fast. I was raised up, a cross; I lifted up the Mighty King, Lord of the Heavens: I dared not bend. They pierced me with dark nails: the wounds are seen on me, open gashes of hatred. Nor did I dare harm any of them. They mocked us both together. I was all wet with blood, drenched from the side of that Man after he had sent forth his spirit. I had endured many bitter happenings on that hill. I saw the God of Hosts cruelly racked. The shades of night had covered the Ruler's body with their mists, the bright splendor. Shadow came forth, dark beneath the clouds. All creation wept, bemoaned the King's fall; Christ was on Cross.

"Yet from afar some came hastening to the Lord. All that I beheld. I was sore afflicted with griefs, yet I bowed to the men's hands, meekly, eagerly. Then they took Almighty God, lifted him up from his heavy torment. The warriors left me standing, covered with blood. I was all wounded with arrows. They laid him down weary of limb, stood at the body's head, looked there upon Heaven's Lord; and he rested there a while, tired after the great struggle. Then warriors began to build him an earth-house in the sight of his slayer, carved it out of bright stone; they set there the Wielder of Triumphs. Then they began to sing him a song of sorrow, desolate in the evening. Then they wished to turn back, weary, from the great Prince; he remained with small company. Yet we stood in our places a good while, weeping. The voice of the warriors departed. The body grew cold, fair house of the spirit. Then some began to fell us to earth—that was a fearful fate! Some buried us in a deep pit. Yet thanes of the Lord, friends, learned of me there. . . . decked me in gold and silver.

"Now you might understand, my beloved man, that I had endured the work of evildoers, grievous sorrows. Now the time has come that men far and wide upon earth honor me—and all this glorious creation—and pray to this beacon. On me God's Son suffered awhile; therefore I tower now glorious under the heavens, and I may heal every one of those who hold me in awe. Of old I became the hardest of torments, most loathed by men, before I opened the right road of life to those who have voices. Behold, the Lord of Glory honored me over all the trees of the wood, the Ruler of Heaven, just as also he honored his mother Mary, Almighty God for all men’s sake, over all woman’s kind.

"Now I command you, my beloved man, that you tell men of this vision. Disclose with your words that it is of the tree of glory on which Almighty God suffered for mankind’s many sins and the deeds Adam did of old. He tasted death there; yet the Lord arose again to help mankind in his great might. Then he climbed to the heavens. He will come again hither on this earth to seek mankind on Doomsday, the Lord himself, Almighty God, and his angels with him, for then he will judge, he who has power to judge, each one just as in this brief life he has deserved. Nor may any one be unafraid of the word the Ruler will speak. Before his host he will ask where the man is who in the name of the Lord would taste bitter death as he did on the Cross. But then they will be afraid, and will think of little to begin to say to Christ. There need none be afraid who bears on his breast the best of tokens, but through the Cross shall the kingdom be sought by each soul on this earthly journey that thinks to dwell with the Lord."

Then I prayed to the tree, blithe-hearted, confident, there where I was alone with small company. My heart’s thoughts were urged on the way hence. I endured many times of longing. Now is there hope of life for me, that I am permitted to seek the tree of triumph, more often than other men honor it well, alone. For it my heart’s desire is great, and my hope of protection is directed to the Cross. I do not possess many powerful friends on earth, but they have gone hence from the delights of the world, sought for themselves the King of Glory. They live now in the heavens with the High Father, dwell in glory. And every day I look forward to when the Lord’s Cross that I beheld here on earth will fetch me from this short life and bring me then where joy is great, delight in the heavens, where the Lord’s folk are seated at the feast, where bliss is eternal. And then may it place me where thenceforth I may dwell in glory, fully enjoy bliss with the saints. May the Lord be my friend, who once here on earth suffered on the gallows-tree for man’s sins: he freed us and granted us life, a heavenly home. Hope was renewed, with joys and with bliss, to those who endured fire. The Son was victorious in that foray, mighty and successful. Then he came with his multitude, a host of spirits, into God’s kingdom, the Almighty Ruler; and the angels and all the saints who dwelt then in glory rejoiced when their Ruler, Almighty God, came where his home was.

1. This and the following sentences refer to the Harrowing (i.e., pillaging) of Hell; after His death on the Cross, Christ descended into Hell, from which He released the souls of certain of the patriarchs and prophets, conducting them triumphantly to Heaven.

BEOWULF

Beowulf, the oldest of the great long poems written in English, may have been composed more than twelve hundred years ago, in the first half of the eighth century, although some scholars would place it as late as the tenth century. As is the case with most Old English poems, the title has been assigned by modern editors, for the manuscripts do not normally give any indication of title or authorship. Linguistic evidence shows that the poem was originally composed in the dialect of what was then Mercia, the Midlands of England today. But in the unique late-tenth-century manuscript preserving the poem, it has been converted into the West-Saxon dialect of the southwest in which most of Old English literature survives. In 1731, before any modern transcript of the text had been made, the manuscript was seriously damaged in a fire that destroyed the building in London that housed the extraordinary collection of medieval English manuscripts made by Sir Robert Bruce Cotton (1571—1631). As a result of the fire and subsequent deterioration, a number of lines and words have been lost from the poem.

It is possible that Beowulf may be the lone survivor of a genre of Old English long epics, but it must have been a remarkable and difficult work even in its own day. The poet was reviving the heroic language, style, and pagan world of ancient Germanic oral poetry, a world that was already remote for his contemporaries and that is stranger to the modern reader, in many respects, than the epic world of Homer and Virgil. With the help of Beowulf itself, a few shorter heroic poems in Old English, and later poetry and prose in Old Saxon, Old Icelandic, and Middle High German, we can only conjecture what Germanic oral epic must have been like when performed by the Germanic scop, or bard. The Beowulf poet himself imagines such oral performances by having King Hrothgar’s court poet recite a heroic lay at a feast celebrating Beowulf’s defeat of Grendel. Many of the words and formulaic expressions in Beowulf can be found in other Old English poems, but there are also an extraordinary number of what linguists call hapax legomena—that is, words recorded only once in a language. The poet may have found them elsewhere, but the high incidence of such words suggests that he was an original wordsmith in his own right.

Although the poem itself is English in language and origin, it deals not with native Englishmen but with their Germanic forebears, especially with two south Scandinavian tribes, the Danes and the Geats, who lived on the Danish island of Zealand and in southern Sweden. Thus the historical period the poem concerns—insofar as it may be said to refer to history at all—is some centuries before it was written—that is, a time after the initial invasion of England by Germanic tribes in the middle of the fifth century but before the Anglo-Saxon migration was completed. The one datable fact of history mentioned in the poem is a raid on the Franks in which Hygelac, the king of the Geats and Beowulf’s lord, was killed, and this raid occurred in the year 520. Yet the poet’s elliptical references to quasihistorical and legendary material show that his audience was still familiar with many old stories, the outlines of which we can only infer, sometimes with the help of later analogous tales in other Germanic languages. This knowledge was probably kept alive by other heroic poetry, of which little has been preserved in English, although much may once have existed.

It is now widely believed that Beowulf is the work of a single poet who was a Christian and that his poem reflects well-established Christian tradition. The conversion of the Germanic settlers in England had been largely completed during the seventh century. The Danish king Hrothgar’s poet sings a song about the Creation (lines 87—96) reminiscent of Caedmon’s Hymn. The monster Grendel is said to be a descendant of Cain. There are allusions to God’s judgment and to fate (wyrd) but none to pagan deities. References to the New Testament are notably absent, but Hrothgar and Beowulf often speak of God as though their religion is monotheistic. With sadness the poet relates that, made desperate by Grendel’s attacks, the Danes pray for help at heathen shrines—apparently backsliding as the children of Israel had sometimes lapsed into idolatry.

Although Hrothgar and Beowulf are portrayed as morally upright and enlightened pagans, they fully espouse and frequently affirm the values of Germanic heroic poetry. In the poetry depicting this warrior society, the most important of human relationships was that which existed between the warrior—the thane—and his lord, a relationship based less on subordination of one man’s will to another’s than on mutual trust and respect. When a warrior vowed loyalty to his lord, he became not so much his servant as his voluntary companion, one who would take pride in defending him.
and fighting in his wars. In return, the lord was expected to take care of his thanes and to reward them richly for their valor; a good king, one like Hrothgar or Beowulf, is referred to by such poetic epithets as "ring-giver" and as the "helmet" and "shield" of his people.

The relationship between kinsmen was also of deep significance to this society. If one of his kinsmen had been slain, a man had a moral obligation either to kill the slayer or to exact the payment of wergild (man-price) in compensation. Each rank of society was evaluated at a definite price, which had to be paid to the dead man’s kin by the killer if he wished to avoid their vengeance—even if the killing had been an accident. In the absence of any legal code other than custom or any body of law enforcement, it was the duty of the family (often with the lord’s support) to execute justice. The payment itself had less significance as wealth than as proof that the kinsmen had done what was right. The failure to take revenge or to exact compensation was considered shameful. Hrothgar’s anguish over the murders committed by Grendel is not only for the loss of his men but also for the shame of his inability either to kill Grendel or to exact a "death-price" from the killer. "It is always better / to avenge dear ones than to indulge in mourning" (lines 1384—85), Beowulf says to Hrothgar, who has been thrown back into despair by the revenge-slaying of his old friend Aeschere by Grendel’s mother.

Yet the young Beowulf’s attempt to comfort the bereaved old king by invoking the code of vengeance may be one of several instances of the poet’s ironic treatment of the tragic futility of the never-ending blood feuds. The most graphic example in the poem of that irony is the Finnsburg episode, the lay sung by Hrothgar’s hall-poet. The Danish princess Hildeburh, married to the Frisian king Finn—probably to put an end to a feud between those peoples—loses both her brother and her son when a bloody fight breaks out in the hall between a visiting party of Danes and her husband’s men. The bodies are cremated together on a huge funeral pyre: "The glutton element flamed and consumed / the dead of both sides. Their great days were gone" (lines 1124-25).

Such feuds, the staple subject of Germanic epic and saga, have only a peripheral place in the poem. Instead, the poem turns on Beowulf’s three great fights against preternatural evil, which inhabits the dangerous and demonic space surrounding human society. He undertakes the fight against Grendel to save the Danes from the monster and to exact vengeance for the men Grendel has slain. Another motive is to demonstrate his strength and courage and thereby to enhance his personal glory. Hrothgar’s magnificent gifts become the material emblems of that glory. Revenge and glory also motivate Beowulf’s slaying of Grendel’s mother. He undertakes his last battle against the dragon, however, only because there is no other way to save his own people.

A somber and dignified elegiac mood pervades Beowulf. The poem opens and closes with the description of a funeral and is filled with laments for the dead. Our first view of Beowulf is of an ambitious young hero. At the end, he has become an old king, facing the dragon and death. His people mourn him and praise him, as does the poet, for his nobility, generosity, courage, and, what is less common in Germanic heroes, kindness to his people. The poet’s elegiac tone may be informed by something more than the duty to "praise a prince whom he holds dear / and cherish his memory when that moment comes / when he has to be convoyed from his bodily home" (lines 3175—77). The entire poem could be viewed as the poet’s lament for heroes like Beowulf who went into the darkness without the light of the poet’s own Christian faith.

The present verse translation is by the Irish poet Seamus Heaney, who received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1995. Selections from Heaney’s own poems appear in Volume 2 of the anthology.

4. Miscellaneous

   A. The Half-Danes (also called Shieldings) involved in the fight at Finnsburg may represent a different tribe from the Danes described above. Their king Hoc had a son, Hnaef, who succeeded him, and a daughter Hildeburh, who married Finn, king of the Jutes.

   B. The Jutes or Frisians are represented as enemies of the Danes in the fight at Finnsburg and as allies of the Franks or Hugas at the time Hygelac the Geat made the attack in which he lost his life and from which Beowulf swam home. Also allied with the Franks at this time were the Hetware.

   C. The Heatho-Bards (i.e., "Battle-Bards") are represented as inveterate enemies of the Danes. Their king Froda had been killed in an attack on the Danes, and Hrothgar's attempt to make peace with them by marrying his daughter Freawaru to Froda's son Ingeld failed when the latter attacked Heorot. The attack was repulsed, although Heorot was burned.

   * The daughter of Hygelac who was given to Eofor may have been born to him by a former wife, older than Hygd.

A NOTE ON NAMES

Old English, like Modern German, contained many compound words, most of which have been lost in Modern English. Most of the names in Beowulf are compounds. Hrothgar is a combination of words meaning "glory" and "spear"; the name of his older brother, Heorogar, comes from "army" and "spear"; Hrothgar's sons Hrethric and Hrothmund contain the first elements of their father's name combined, respectively, with tie (kingdom, empire; Modern German Reich) and mund (hand, protection). As in the case of the Danish dynasty, family names often alliterate. Masculine names of the warrior class have military associations. The importance of family and the demands of alliteration frequently lead to the designation of characters by formulas identifying them in terms of relationships. Thus Beowulf is referred to as "son of Ecgtheow" or "kinsman of Hygelac" (his uncle and lord).

The Old English spellings of names are mostly preserved in the translation. A few rules of pronunciation are worth keeping in mind. Initial H before r was sounded, and so Hrothgar's name alliterates with that of his brother Heorogar. The combination eg has the value of dg in words like "edge." The first element in the name of Beowulf's father "Ecgtheow" is the same word as "edge," and, by the figure of speech called synecdoche (a part of something stands for the whole), ecg stands for sword and Ecgtheow means "sword-servant."

* Modern syntax would be "for each of kinds." In Old English, the endings -a and -am indicate that gewylcum is an indirect object and cynna, a possessive plural.

Beowulf

[PROLOGUE: THE RISE OF THE DANISH NATION]

So. The Spear-Danes’ in days gone by and the kings who ruled them had courage and greatness.
We have heard of those princes’ heroic campaigns.
There was Shield Sheafson, a scourge of many tribes,
as a wrecker of mead-benches, rampaging among foes.
This terror of the hall-troops had come far.
A foundling to start with, he would flourish later on as his powers waxed and his worth was proved.
In the end each clan on the outlying coasts beyond the whale-road had to yield to him and begin to pay tribute. That was one good king.
Afterward a boy-child was born to Shield, a cub in the yard, a comfort sent by God to that nation. He knew what they had tholed, is the long times and troubles they’d come through without a leader; so the Lord of Life, the glorious Almighty, made this man renowned.
Shield had fathered a famous son:
Beow’s name was known through the north.
And a young prince must be prudent like that, giving freely while his father lives
so that afterward in age when fighting starts steadfast companions will stand by him and hold the line. Behavior that’s admired is the path to power among people everywhere.
Shield was still thriving when his time came and he crossed over into the Lord’s keeping.
His warrior band did what he bade them
when he laid down the law among the Danes:
so they shouldered him out to the sea’s flood,
the chief they revered who had long ruled them.
A ring-whorled prow rode in the harbor,
ice-clad, outbound, a craft for a prince.
They stretched their beloved lord in his boat, 35 laid out by the mast, amidships,
the great ring-giver. Far-fetched treasures were piled upon him, and precious gear.

1. There are different compound names for tribes, often determined by alliteration in Old English poetry. Line 1 reads, “Hwset, we Gar-dena in gear-dagum,” where alliteration falls on Gar (spear) and gear (year). Old English hard and soft g (spelled y in Modern English) alliterate. The compound gear-dagum derives from “year,” used in the special sense of ‘long ago,’ and “days” and survives in the archaic expression ‘days of yore.’

2. Shield is the name of the founder of the Danish royal line. Sheafson translates Sceaf, i.e., sheaf + the patronymic suffix -mg. Because Sheaf was a “foundling” (line 7: feasceaft funden, i.e., found destitute) who arrived by sea (lines 45-46), it is likely that as a child Shield brought with him only a sheaf, a symbol of fruitfulness.

I never heard before of a ship so well furbished with battle-tackle, bladed weapons and coats of mail. The massed treasure was loaded on top of him: it would travel fat-on out into the ocean's sway. They decked his body no less bountifully with offerings than those first ones did who cast him away when he was a child and launched him alone out over the waves. And they set a gold standard up high above his head and let him drift to wind and tide, bewailing him and mourning their loss. No man can tell, no wise man in hall or weathered veteran knows for certain who salvaged that load.

Then it fell to Beow to keep the forts. He was well regarded and ruled the Danes for a long time after his father took leave of his life on earth. And then his heir, the great Halfdane, held sway for as long as he lived, their elder and warlord. He was four times a father, this fighter prince: one by one they entered the world, Heorogar, Hrothgar, the good Halga, and a daughter, I have heard, who was Onela's queen, a balm in bed to the battle-scarred Swede.

The fortunes of war favored Hrothgar. Friends and kinsmen flocked to his ranks, young followers, a force that grew to be a mighty army. So his mind turned to hall-building: he handed down orders for men to work on a great mead-hall meant to be a wonder of the world forever; it would be his throne-room and there he would dispense his God-given goods to young and old—but not the common land or people's lives.

Far and wide through the world, I have heard, orders for work to adorn that wallstead were sent to many peoples. And soon it stood there finished and ready, in full view, the hall of halls. Heorot was the name he had settled on it, whose utterance was law.

Nor did he renege, but doled out rings and torques at the table. The hall towered, its gables wide and high and awaiting a barbarous burning. That doom abided,

4. See n. 2, above. Since Shield was found destitute, "no less bountifully" is litotes or understatement; the ironic reminder that he came with nothing (line 43) emphasizes the reversal of his fortunes.
5. Probably named so because, according to one source, his mother was a Swedish princess.
6. The king could not dispose of land used by all, such as a common pasture, or of slaves.
7. I.e., "Hart," from antlers fastened to the gables or because the crossed gable-ends resembled a stag's antlers; the hart was also an icon of royalty.
8. An allusion to the future destruction of Heorot by fire, probably in a raid by the Heatho-Bards.
but in time it would come: the killer instinct unleashed among in-laws, the blood-lust rampant.\(^9\)

[HÆOROT IS ATTACKED]

Then a powerful demon,\(^1\) a prowler through the dark, nursed a hard grievance. It harrowed him to hear the din of the loud banquet every day in the hall, the harp being struck and the clear song of a skilled poet telling with mastery of man's beginnings, how the Almighty had made the earth
a gleaming plain girdled with waters;
in His splendor He set the sun and the moon to be earth's lamplight, lanterns for men, and filled the broad lap of the world with branches and leaves; and quickened life in every other thing that moved.
So times were pleasant for the people there until finally one, a fiend out of hell, began to work his evil in the world.
Grendel was the name of this grim demon haunting the marches, marauding round the heath and the desolate fens; he had dwelt for a time in misery among the banished monsters, Cain's clan, whom the Creator had outlawed and condemned as outcasts.\(^2\) For the killing of Abel
the Eternal Lord had exacted a price:
Cain got no good from committing that murder because the Almighty made him anathema and out of the curse of his exile there sprang ogres and elves and evil phantoms and the giants too who strove with God time and again until He gave them their reward.
So, after nightfall, Grendel set out for the lofty house, to see how the Ring-Danes were settling into it after their drink, and there he came upon them, a company of the best asleep from their feasting, insensible to pain and human sorrow. Suddenly then the God-cursed brute was creating havoc:
greedy and grim, he grabbed thirty men from their resting places and rushed to his lair, flushed up and inflamed from the raid,
blundering back with the butchered corpses.
Then as dawn brightened and the day broke,
Grendel's powers of destruction were plain:
their wassail was over, they wept to heaven and mourned under morning. Their mighty prince,

9. As told later (lines 2020-69), Hrothgar plans to marry a daughter to Ingeld, chief of the Hœsdas, chiefs of the Hœsdas, in hopes of resolving a long-standing feud.
See previous note.
1. The poet withholds the name for several lines.
He does the same with the name of the hero as well as others.
2. See Genesis 4.9-12.
the storied leader, sat stricken and helpless, humiliated by the loss of his guard, bewildered and stunned, staring aghast
at the demon's trail, in deep distress.
He was numb with grief, but got no respite for one night later merciless Grendel struck again with more gruesome murders.
Malignant by nature, he never showed remorse.
It was easy then to meet with a man shifting himself to a safer distance to bed in the bothies, for who could be blind to the evidence of his eyes, the obviousness of the hall-watcher's hate? Whoever escaped kept a weather-eye open and moved away.
So Grendel ruled in defiance of right,
one against all, until the greatest house
in the world stood empty, a deserted wallstead.
For twelve winters, seasons of woe,
the lord of the Shieldings suffered under his load of sorrow; and so, before long,
the news was known over the whole world.
Sad lays were sung about the beset king,
the vicious raids and ravages of Grendel,
his long and unrelenting feud, nothing but war; how he would never parley or make peace with any Dane nor stop his death-dealing nor pay the death-price.¹
No counselor could ever expect fair reparation from those rabid hands.
All were endangered; young and old were hunted down by that dark death-shadow who lurked and swooped in the long nights on the misty moors; nobody knows where these reavers from hell roam on their errands.
So Grendel waged his lonely war, inflicting constant cruelties on the people,
atrocious hurt. He took over Heorot, haunted the glittering hall after dark,
but the throne itself, the treasure-seat,
he was kept from approaching; he was the Lord's outcast.
These were hard times, heartbreaking for the prince of the Shieldings; powerful counselors,
the highest in the land, would lend advice, plotting how best the bold defenders might resist and beat off sudden attacks.
Sometimes at pagan shrines they vowed offerings to idols, swore oaths that the killer of souls² might come to their aid

3. Huts, outlying buildings. Evidently Grendel wants only to dominate the hall.
4. The descendants of Shield, another name for the Danes.
5. I.e., wergild (man-price); monetary compensation for the life of the slain man is the only way, according to Germanic law, to settle a feud peacefully.
6. I.e., the devil. Heathen gods were thought to be devils.
and save the people. That was their way, their heathenish hope; deep in their hearts they remembered hell. The Almighty Judge of good deeds and bad, the Lord God, Head of the Heavens and High King of the World, was unknown to them. Oh, cursed is he who in time of trouble has to thrust his soul in the fire’s embrace, forfeiting help; he has nowhere to turn. But blessed is he who after death can approach the Lord and find friendship in the Father’s embrace.

[THE HERO COMES TO HEOROT]

So that troubled time continued, woe that never stopped, steady affliction for Halfdane’s son, too hard an ordeal. There was panic after dark, people endured raids in the night, riven by the terror.

When he heard about Grendel, Hygelac’s thane was on home ground, over in Geatland. There was no one else like him alive. In his day, he was the mightiest man on earth, highborn and powerful. He ordered a boat that would ply the waves. He announced his plan: to sail the swan’s road and seek out that king, the famous prince who needed defenders. Nobody tried to keep him from going, no elder denied him, dear as he was to them. Instead, they inspected omens and spurred his ambition to go, whilst he moved about like the leader he was, enlisting men, the best he could find; with fourteen others the warrior boarded the boat as captain, a canny pilot along coast and currents.

Time went by, the boat was on water, in close under the cliffs. Men climbed eagerly up the gangplank, sand churned in surf, warriors loaded a cargo of weapons, shining war-gear in the vessel’s hold, then heaved out, away with a will in their wood-wreathed ship. Over the waves, with the wind behind her and foam at her neck, she flew like a bird until her curved prow had covered the distance, and on the following day, at the due hour, those seafarers sighted land, sunlit cliffs, sheer crags and looming headlands, the landfall they sought. It was the end of their voyage and the Geats vaulted over the side, out on to the sand, and moored their ship. There was a clash of mail and a thresh of gear. They thanked God for that easy crossing on a calm sea.

When the watchman on the wall, the Shieldings' lookout whose job it was to guard the sea-cliffs, saw shields glittering on the gangplank

and battle-equipment being unloaded

he had to find out who and what the arrivals were. So he rode to the shore,

this horseman of Hrothgar's, and challenged them in formal terms, flourishing his spear:

"What kind of men are you who arrive rigged out for combat in your coats of mail, sailing here over the sea-lanes in your steep-hulled boat? I have been stationed as lookout on this coast for a long time.

My job is to watch the waves for raiders,

any danger to the Danish shore.

Never before has a force under arms disembarked so openly—not bothering to ask if the sentries allowed them safe passage or the clan had consented. Nor have I seen a mightier man-at-arms on this earth than the one standing here: unless I am mistaken, he is truly noble. This is no mere hanger-on in a hero's armor.

So now, before you fare inland as interlopers, I have to be informed about who you are and where you hail from.

Outsiders from across the water,

I say it again: the sooner you tell where you come from and why, the better."

The leader of the troop unlocked his word-hoard;

the distinguished one delivered this answer:

"We belong by birth to the Geat people and owe allegiance to Lord Hygelac.

In his day, my father was a famous man,

a noble warrior-lord named Ecgtheow.

He outlasted many a long winter and went on his way. All over the world men wise in counsel continue to remember him.

We come in good faith to find your lord and nation's shield, the son of Halfdane.

Give us the right advice and direction.

We have arrived here on a great errand to the lord of the Danes, and I believe therefore there should be nothing hidden or withheld between us.

So tell us if what we have heard is true about this threat, whatever it is,

this danger abroad in the dark nights,

this corpse-maker mongering death in the Shieldings' country. I come to proffer my wholehearted help and counsel.

I can show the wise Hrothgar a way to defeat his enemy and find respite—if any respite is to reach him, ever.

I can calm the turmoil and terror in his mind.
Otherwise, he must endure woes and live with grief for as long as his hall stands at the horizon on its high ground."

Undaunted, sitting astride his horse,
the coast-guard answered: "Anyone with gumption and a sharp mind will take the measure of two things: what’s said and what’s done.
I believe what you have told me, that you are a troop loyal to our king. So come ahead with your arms and your gear, and I will guide you.
What’s more, I’ll order my own comrades on their word of honor to watch your boat down there on the strand—keep her safe in her fresh tar, until the time comes for her curved prow to preen on the waves and bear this hero back to Geatland.
May one so valiant and venturesome come unharmed through the clash of battle."

So they went on their way. The ship rode the water, wide-beamed, bound by its hawser and anchored fast. Boar-shapes’ flashed above their cheek-guards, the brightly forged work of goldsmiths, watching over those stern-faced men. They marched in step, hurrying on till the timbered hall
rose before them, radiant with gold.
Nobody on earth knew of another building like it. Majesty lodged there, its light shone over many lands.
So their gallant escort guided them to that dazzling stronghold and indicated the shortest way to it; then the noble warrior wheeled on his horse and spoke these words:
"It is time for me to go. May the Almighty Father keep you and in His kindness watch over your exploits. I’m away to the sea, back on alert against enemy raiders."

It was a paved track, a path that kept them in marching order. Their mail-shirts glinted, hard and hand-linked; the high-gloss iron of their armor rang. So they duly arrived in their grim war-graith8 and gear at the hall, and, weary from the sea, stacked wide shields of the toughest hardwood against the wall, then collapsed on the benches; battle-dress and weapons clashed. They collected their spears in a seafarers’ stook, a stand of grayish tapering ash. And the troops themselves were as good as their weapons. Then a proud warrior questioned the men concerning their origins: "Where do you come from, carrying these decorated shields and shirts of mail, these cheek-hinged helmets and javelins? I am Hrothgar’s herald and officer. I have never seen so impressive or large an assembly of strangers. Stoutness of heart, bravery not banishment, must have brought you to Hrothgar."

The man whose name was known for courage, the Geat leader, resolute in his helmet, answered in return: “We are retainers from Hygelac’s band. Beowulf is my name. If your lord and master, the most renowned son of Halfdane, will hear me out and graciously allow me to greet him in person, I am ready and willing to report my errand."

Wulfgar replied, a Wendel chief renowned as a warrior, well known for his wisdom and the temper of his mind: "I will take this message, in accordance with your wish, to our noble king, our dear lord, friend of the Danes, the giver of rings. I will go and ask him about your coming here, then hurry back with whatever reply it pleases him to give."

With that he turned to where Hrothgar sat, an old man among retainers; the valiant follower stood foursquare in front of his king: he knew the courtesies. Wulfgar addressed his dear lord: "People from Geatland have put ashore. They have sailed far over the wide sea. They call the chief in charge of their band by the name of Beowulf. They beg, my lord, an audience with you, exchange of words and formal greeting. Most gracious Hrothgar, do not refuse them, but grant them a reply. From their arms and-appointment, they appear well born and worthy of respect, especially the one who has led them this far: he is formidable indeed."

Hrothgar, protector of Shieldings, replied: "I used to know him when he was a young boy. His father before him was called Ecgtheow. Hrethel the Geat gave Ecgtheow his daughter in marriage. This man is their son, here to follow up an old friendship. A crew of seamen who sailed for me once with a gift-cargo across to Geatland returned with marvelous tales about him: a thane, they declared, with the strength of thirty

This is my hope; and for his heroism

he has in attendance to assemble and enter.
Say, moreover, when you speak to them,
they are welcome to Denmark."

At the door of the hall,

Wulfgar duly delivered the message:
"My lord, the conquering king of the Danes,
bids me announce that he knows your ancestry;
also that he welcomes you here to Heorot and salutes your arrival from across the sea.

You are free now to move forward to meet Hrothgar in helmets and armor, but shields must stay here and spears be stacked until the outcome of the audience is clear."

The hero arose, surrounded closely by his powerful thanes. A party remained under orders to keep watch on the arms;

the rest proceeded, led by their prince under Heorot's roof. And standing on the hearth in webbed links that the smith had woven,

the fine-forged mesh of his gleaming mail-shirt, resolute in his helmet, Beowulf spoke:
"Greetings to Hrothgar. I am Hygelac's kinsman, one of his hall-troop. When I was younger,
I had great triumphs. Then news of Grendel, hard to ignore, reached me at home:
sailors brought stories of the plight you suffer in this legendary hall, how it lies deserted, empty and useless once the evening light hides itself under heaven's dome.

So every elder and experienced councilman among my people supported my resolve to come here to you, King Hrothgar, because all knew of my awesome strength.
They had seen me boltered\(^1\) in the blood of enemies

when I battled and bound five beasts, raided a troll-nest and in the night-sea slaughtered sea-brutes. I have suffered extremes and avenged the Geats (their enemies brought it upon themselves; I devastated them).

Now I mean to be a match for Grendel, settle the outcome in single combat.
And so, my request, O king of Bright-Danes,
dear prince of the Shieldings, friend of the people and their ring of defense, my one request is that you won't refuse me, who have come this far,

\(^1\) Clotted, sticky.
the privilege of purifying Heorot,
with my own men to help me, and nobody else.
I have heard moreover that the monster scorns in his reckless way to use weapons;
therefore, to heighten Hygelac's fame and gladden his heart, I hereby renounce sword and the shelter of the broad shield, the heavy war-board: hand-to-hand is how it will be, a life-and-death fight with the fiend. Whichever one death fells must deem it a just judgment by God.
If Grendel wins, it will be a gruesome day;
he will glut himself on the Geats in the war-hall, swoop without fear on that flower of manhood as on others before. Then my face won't be there to be covered in death: he will carry me away as he goes to ground, gorged and bloodied;
he will run gloat ing with my raw corpse and feed on it alone, in a cruel frenzy fouling his moor-nest. No need then to lament for long or lay out my body:
if the battle takes me, send back this breast-webbing that Weland fashioned and Hrethel gave me, to Lord Hygelac.
Fate goes ever as fate must."

Hrothgar, the helmet of Shieldings, spoke:
"Beowulf, my friend, you have traveled here to favor us with help and to fight for us.
There was a feud one time, begun by your father.
With his own hands he had killed Heatholaf who was a Wulfing; so war was looming and his people, in fear of it, forced him to leave.
He came away then over rolling waves to the South-Danes here, the sons of honor.
I was then in the first flush of kingship, establishing my sway over the rich strongholds of this heroic land. Heorogar, my older brother and the better man,
also a son of Halfdane's, had died.
Finally I healed the feud by paying:
I shipped a treasure-trove to the Wulfings,
and Ecgtheow acknowledged me with oaths of allegiance.
"It bothers me to have to burden anyone with all the grief that Grendel has caused and the havoc he has wreaked upon us in Heorot, our humiliations. My household guard are on the wane, fate sweeps them away into Grendel's clutches—but God can easily halt these raids and harrowing attacks!
"Time and again, when the goblets passed

Beowulf an expensive funeral.

and seasoned fighters got flushed with beer
they would pledge themselves to protect Heorot and wait for Grendel with their whetted swords.
But when dawn broke and day crept in over each empty, blood-spattered bench, the floor of the mead-hall where they had feasted would be slick with slaughter. And so they died, faithful retainers, and my following dwindled.
Now take your place at the table, relish
the triumph of heroes to your heart’s content.

[FEAST AT HEOROT]

Then a bench was cleared in that banquet hall
so the Geats could have room to be together and the party sat, proud in their bearing, strong and stalwart. An attendant stood by with a decorated pitcher, pouring bright helpings of mead. And the minstrel sang, filling Heorot with his head-clearing voice, gladdening that great rally of Geats and Danes.

From where he crouched at the king’s feet, Unferth, a son of Ecglaef’s, spoke contrary words. Beowulf’s coming, his sea-braving, made him sick with envy:
he could not brook or abide the fact that anyone else alive under heaven might enjoy greater regard than he did:
“Are you the Beowulf who took on Breca in a swimming match on the open sea, risking the water just to prove that you could win?
It was sheer vanity made you venture out on the main deep. And no matter who tried, friend or foe, to deflect the pair of you,
neither would back down: the sea-test obsessed you.
You waded in, embracing water,
taking its measure, mastering currents, riding on the swell. The ocean swayed, winter went wild in the waves, but you vied for seven nights; and then he outswam you, came ashore the stronger contender.
He was cast up safe and sound one morning
among the Heatho-Reams, then made his way to where he belonged in Branding country, home again, sure of his ground in strongroom and bawn.4 So Breca made good his boast upon you and was proved right.

No matter, therefore, how you may have fared in every bout and battle until now, this time you’ll be worsted; no one has ever outlasted an entire night against Grendel."

Beowulf, Ecgtheow’s son, replied:

“\textit{Well, friend Unferth, you have had your say about Breca and me. But it was mostly beer that was doing the talking. The truth is this: when the going was heavy in those high waves, I was the strongest swimmer of all.}"

We’d been children together and we grew up daring ourselves to outdo each other, boasting and urging each other to risk our lives on the sea. And so it turned out. Each of us swam holding a sword, a naked, hard-proofed blade for protection against the whale-beasts. But Breca could never move out farther or faster from me than I could manage to move from him. Shoulder to shoulder, we struggled on for five nights, until the long flow and pitch of the waves, the perishing cold, night falling and winds from the north drove us apart. The deep boiled up and its wallowing sent the sea-brutes wild.

My armor helped me to hold out; my hard-ringed chain-mail, hand-forged and linked, a fine, close-fitting filigree of gold, kept me safe when some ocean creature pulled me to the bottom. Pinioned fast and swathed in its grip, I was granted one final chance: my sword plunged and the ordeal was over. Through my own hands, the fury of battle had finished off the sea-beast.

“Time and again, foul things attacked me, lurking and stalking, but I lashed out, gave as good as I got with my sword. My flesh was not for feasting on, there would be no monsters gnawing and gloating over their banquet at the bottom of the sea.

Instead, in the morning, mangled and sleeping the sleep of the sword, they slopped and floated like the ocean’s leavings. From now on sailors would be safe, the deep-sea raids were over for good. Light came from the east, bright guarantee of God, and the waves went quiet; I could see headlands and buffeted cliffs. Often, for undaunted courage, fate spares the man it has not already marked. However it occurred, my sword had killed nine sea-monsters. Such night dangers and hard ordeals I have never heard of nor of a man more desolate in surging waves. But worn out as I was, I survived, came through with my life. The ocean lifted and laid me ashore, I landed safe.
on the coast of Finland.

Now I cannot recall any fight you entered, Unferth, that bears comparison. I don't boast when I say that neither you nor Breca were ever much celebrated for swordsmanship or for facing danger on the field of battle.
You killed your own kith and kin,
so for all your cleverness and quick tongue,
you will suffer damnation in the depths of hell.

The fact is, Unferth, if you were truly as keen or courageous as you claim to be Grendel would never have got away with such unchecked atrocity, attacks on your king, havoc in Heorot and horrors everywhere.

But he knows he need never be in dread of your blade making a mizzle of his blood or of vengeance arriving ever from this quarter—from the Victory-Shieldings, the shoulderers of the spear.
He knows he can trample down you Danes to his heart's content, humiliate and murder without fear of reprisal. But he will find me different.
I will show him how Geats shape to kill in the heat of battle. Then whoever wants to may go bravely to mead, when the morning light, scarfed in sun-dazzle, shines forth from the south and brings another daybreak to the world."

Then the gray-haired treasure-giver was glad;
far-famed in battle, the prince of Bright-Danes and keeper of his people counted on Beowulf, on the warrior's steadfastness and his word.
So the laughter started, the din got louder and the crowd was happy. Wealththeow came in,
Hrothgar's queen, observing the courtesies.
Adorned in her gold, she graciously saluted
the men in the hall, then handed the cup first to Hrothgar, their homeland's guardian, urging him to drink deep and enjoy it because he was dear to them. And he drank it down like the warlord he was, with festive cheer.

So the Helming woman went on her rounds, queenly and dignified, decked out in rings,
offering the goblet to all ranks,
treating the household and the assembled troop,
until it was Beowulf's turn to take it from her hand.

With measured words she welcomed the Geat and thanked God for granting her wish that a deliverer she could believe in would arrive to ease their afflictions. He accepted the cup, a daunting man, dangerous in action and eager for it always. He addressed Wealththeow; Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, said:
"I had a fixed purpose when I put to sea.
As I sat in the boat with my band of men,
I meant to perform to the uttermost what your people wanted or perish in the attempt, in the fiend's clutches. And I shall fulfill that purpose, prove myself with a proud deed or meet my death here in the mead-hall."
This formal boast by Beowulf the Geat pleased the lady well and she went to sit by Hrothgar, regal and arrayed with gold.
Then it was like old times in the echoing hall,
proud talk and the people happy,
loud and excited; until soon enough Halidane's heir had to be away to his night's rest. He realized that the demon was going to descend on the hall, that he had plotted all day, from dawn light until darkness gathered again over the world and stealthy night-shapes came stealing forth under the cloud-murk. The company stood as the two leaders took leave of each other:
Hrothgar wished Beowulf health and good luck,
named him hall-warden and announced as follows:
"Never, since my hand could hold a shield have I entrusted or given control of the Danes' hall to anyone but you.
Ward and guard it, for it is the greatest of houses.
Be on your mettle now, keep in mind your fame, beware of the enemy. There's nothing you wish for that won't be yours if you win through alive."

[THE FIGHT WITH GRENDEL]

Hrothgar departed then with his house-guard.
The lord of the Shieldings, their shelter in war, left the mead-hall to lie with Wealth-theow, his queen and bedmate. The King of Glory (as people learned) had posted a lookout who was a match for Grendel, a guard against monsters, special protection to the Danish prince.
And the Geat placed complete trust in his strength of limb and the Lord's favor.
He began to remove his iron breast-mail, took off the helmet and handed his attendant
the patterned sword, a smith's masterpiece, ordering him to keep the equipment guarded.
And before he bedded down, Beowulf, that prince of goodness, proudly asserted:
"When it comes to fighting, I count myself
as dangerous any day as Grendel.
So it won't be a cutting edge I'll wield to mow him down, easily as I might.
He has no idea of the arts of war,
of shield or sword-play, although he does possess a wild strength. No weapons, therefore,

685 if face me he dares. And may the Divine Lord in His wisdom grant the glory of victory to whichever side He sees fit."

Then down the brave man lay with his bolster under his head and his whole company

690 of sea-rovers at rest beside him.
None of them expected he would ever see his homeland again or get back to his native place and the people who reared him.
They knew too well the way it was before,

695 how often the Danes had fallen prey to death in the mead-hall. But the Lord was weaving a victory on His war-loom for the Weather-Geats.
Through the strength of one they all prevailed;
they would crush their enemy and come through 700 in triumph and gladness. The truth is clear:

Almighty God rules over mankind and always has.

Then out of the night
came the shadow-stalker, stealthy and swift.
The hall-guards were slack, asleep at their posts,

705 all except one; it was widely understood that as long as God disallowed it,
the fiend could not bear them to his shadow-bourne.
One man, however, was in fighting mood,
awake and on edge, spoiling for action.

710 In off the moors, down through the mist-bands
God-cursed Grendel came greedily loping.
The bane of the race of men roamed forth, hunting for a prey in the high hall.

715 until it shone above him, a sheer keep of fortified gold. Nor was that the first time he had scouted the grounds of Hrothgar’s dwelling—although never in his life, before or since,
did he find harder fortune or hall-defenders.

720 Spurned and joyless, he journeyed on ahead and arrived at the bawn.3 The iron-braced door turned on its hinge when his hands touched it.
Then his rage boiled over, he ripped open the mouth of the building, maddening for blood,

725 pacing the length of the patterned floor with his loathsome tread, while a baleful light, flame more than light, flared from his eyes.
He saw many men in the mansion, sleeping,
a ranked company of kinsmen and warriors

730 quartered together. And his glee was demonic, picturing the mayhem: before morning
he would rip life from limb and devour them,

5. See p. 44, n. 4.
feed on their flesh; but his fate that night was due to change, his days of ravening 735 had come to an end.

Mighty and canny,
Hygelac's kinsman was keenly watching for the first move the monster would make.
Nor did the creature keep him waiting but struck suddenly and started in;
740 he grabbed and mauled a man on his bench, bit into his bone-lappings, bolted down his blood and gorged on him in lumps, leaving the body utterly lifeless, eaten up derm and foot. Venturing closer, 745 his talon was raised to attack Beowulf where he lay on the bed, he was bearing in with open claw when the alert hero's comeback and armlock forestalled him utterly.
The captain of evil discovered himself 750 in a handgrip harder than anything he had ever encountered in any man on the face of the earth. Every bone in his body quailed and recoiled, but he could not escape.
He was desperate to flee to his den and hide 755 with the devil's litter, for in all his days he had never been clamped or cornered like this.
Then Hygelac's trusty retainer recalled his bedtime speech, sprang to his feet and got a firm hold. Fingers were bursting, 760 the monster back-tracking, the man overpowering.
The dread of the land was desperate to escape, to take a roundabout road and flee to his lair in the fens. The latching power in his fingers weakened; it was the worst trip 765 the terror-monger had taken to Heorot.
And now the timbers trembled and sang,
a hall-session⁶ that harrowed every Dane inside the stockade: stumbling in fury,
the two contenders crashed through the building.
770 The hall clattered and hammered, but somehow survived the onslaught and kept standing:
it was handsomely structured, a sturdy frame braced with the best of blacksmith's work inside and out. The story goes 775 that as the pair struggled, mead-benches were smashed and sprung off the floor, gold fittings and all.
Before then, no Shielding elder would believe there was any power or person upon earth capable of wrecking their horn-rigged hall 780 unless the burning embrace of a fire engulf it in flame. Then an extraordinary

⁶ In Hiberno-English the word "session" (seissiun in Irish) can mean a gathering where musicians and singers perform for their own enjoyment [Translator's note].
wail arose, and bewildering fear came over the Danes. Everyone felt it who heard that cry as it echoed off the wall, a God-cursed scream and strain of catastrophe,
the howl of the loser, the lament of the hell-serf keening his wound. He was overwhelmed, manacled tight by the man who of all men was foremost and strongest in the days of this life.

But the earl-troop's leader was not inclined to allow his caller to depart alive:
he did not consider that life of much account to anyone anywhere. Time and again, Beowulf's warriors worked to defend their lord's life, laying about them as best they could, with their ancestral blades.
Stalwart in action, they kept striking out on every side, seeking to cut straight to the soul. When they joined the struggle there was something they could not have known at the time, that no blade on earth, no blacksmith's art could ever damage their demon opponent.
He had conjured the harm from the cutting edge of every weapon. But his going away out of this world and the days of his life would be agony to him, and his alien spirit would travel far into fiends' keeping.
Then he who had harrowed the hearts of men with pain and affliction in former times and had given offense also to God found that his bodily powers failed him.
Hygelac's kinsman kept him helplessly locked in a handgrip. As long as either lived, he was hateful to the other. The monster's whole body was in pain; a tremendous wound appeared on his shoulder. Sinews split and the bone-lappings burst. Beowulf was granted the glory of winning; Grendel was driven under the fen-banks, fatally hurt, to his desolate lair. His days were numbered,
the end of his life was coming over him,
he knew it for certain; and one bloody clash had fulfilled the dearest wishes of the Danes.
The man who had lately landed among them,
proud and sure, had purged the hall,
kept it from harm; he was happy with his nightwork and the courage he had shown. The Geat captain had boldly fulfilled his boast to the Danes:
he had healed and relieved a huge distress,
unremitting humiliations,
the hard fate they'd been forced to undergo, no small affliction. Clear proof of this could be seen in the hand the hero displayed high up near the roof: the whole of Grendel’s shoulder and arm, his awesome grasp.

[CELEBRATION AT HEOROT]

Then morning came and many a warrior gathered, as I’ve heard, around the gift-hall, clan-chiefs flocking from far and near down wide-ranging roads, wondering greatly at the monster’s footprints. His fatal departure was regretted by no one who witnessed his trail, the ignominious marks of his flight where he’d skulked away, exhausted in spirit and beaten in battle, bloodying the path, hauling his doom to the demons’ mere. The bloodshot water wallowed and surged, there were loathsome upthrows and overturnings of waves and gore and wound-slurry. With his death upon him, he had dived deep into his marsh-den, drowned out his life and his heathen soul: hell claimed him there. Then away they rode, the old retainers with many a young man following after, a troop on horseback, in high spirits on their bay steeds. Beowulf’s doings were praised over and over again. Nowhere, they said, north or south between the two seas or under the tall sky on the broad earth was there anyone better to raise a shield or to rule a kingdom. Yet there was no laying of blame on their lord, the noble Hrothgar; he was a good king. At times the war-band broke into a gallop, letting their chestnut horses race wherever they found the going good on those well-known tracks. Meanwhile, a thane of the king’s household, a carrier of tales, a traditional singer deeply schooled in the lore of the past, linked a new theme to a strict meter. The man started to recite with skill, rehearsing Beowulf’s triumphs and feats in well-fashioned lines, entwining his words.

He told what he’d heard repeated in songs about Sigemund’s exploits, all of those many feats and marvels, the struggles and wanderings of Waels’s son.

8. A lake or pool, although we learn later that it has an outlet to the sea, Grendel’s habitat.
9. i.e., an extemporaneous heroic poem in alliterative verse about Beowulf’s deeds.
1. Tales about Sigemund, his nephew SinQuel (Fitela), and his son Sigurth are found in a 13th-century Old Icelandic collection of legends known as the Volsung Saga. Analogous stories must have been known to the poet and his audience, though details differ.
2. Waels is the father of Sigemund.
things unknown to anyone except to Fitela, feuds and foul doings confided by uncle to nephew when he felt the urge to speak of them: always they had been partners in the fight, friends in need.
They killed giants, their conquering swords had brought them down.

After his death
Sigemund’s glory grew and grew because of his courage when he killed the dragon, the guardian of the hoard. Under gray stone he had dared to enter all by himself to face the worst without Fitela.
But it came to pass that his sword plunged right through those radiant scales and drove into the wall. The dragon died of it.
His daring had given him total possession of the treasure-hoard, his to dispose of however he liked. He loaded a boat:

Waels’s son weighted her hold with dazzling spoils. The hot dragon melted.
Sigemund’s name was known everywhere.
He was utterly valiant and venturesome, a fence round his fighters and flourished therefore after King Heremod’s3 prowess declined and his campaigns slowed down. The king was betrayed, ambushed in fylfot, overpowered and done away with. The waves of his grief had beaten him down, made him a burden,

a source of anxiety to his own nobles:
that expedition was often condemned in those earlier times by experienced men, men who relied on his lordship for redress, who presumed that the part of a prince was to thrive on his father’s throne and defend the nation,
the Shielding land where they lived and belonged, its holdings and strongholds. Such was Beowulf in the affection of his friends and of everyone alive.
But evil entered into Heremod.

They kept racing each other, urging their mounts down sandy lanes. The light of day broke and kept brightening. Bands of retainers galloped in excitement to the gabled hall to see the marvel; and the king himself, guardian of the ring-hoard, goodness in person, walked in majesty from the women’s quarters with a numerous train, attended by his queen and her crowd of maidens, across to the mead-hall.

When Hrothgar arrived at the hall, he spoke,
standing on the steps, under the steep eaves,

3. Heremod was a bad king, held up by the bard as the opposite of Beowulf, as Sigemund is held up as a heroic prototype of Beowulf.
gazing toward the roofwork and Grendel's talon:

'First and foremost, let the Almighty Father be thanked for this sight. I suffered a long harrowing by Grendel. But the Heavenly Shepherd can work His wonders always and everywhere.
Not long since, it seemed I would never be granted the slightest solace or relief from any of my burdens: the best of houses glittered and reeked and ran with blood.

This one worry outweighed all others—a constant distress to counselors entrusted with defending the people's forts from assault by monsters and demons. But now a man, with the Lord's assistance, has accomplished something none of us could manage before now for all our efforts. Whoever she was who brought forth this flower of manhood, if she is still alive, that woman can say that in her labor the Lord of Ages bestowed a grace on her. So now, Beowulf,
I adopt you in my heart as a dear son.
Nourish and maintain this new connection, you noblest of men; there'll be nothing you'll want for,
no worldly goods that won't be yours.

I have often honored smaller achievements, recognized warriors not nearly as worthy,
lavished rewards on the less deserving.
But you have made yourself immortal by your glorious action. May the God of Ages continue to keep and requite you well.'

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
'We have gone through with a glorious endeavor and been much favored in this fight we dared against the unknown. Nevertheless, if you could have seen the monster himself
where he lay beaten, I would have been better pleased.
My plan was to pounce, pin him down in a tight grip and grapple him to death—have him panting for life, powerless and clasped in my bare hands, his body in thrall.
But I couldn't stop him from slipping my hold.
The Lord allowed it, my lock on him wasn't strong enough; he struggled fiercely and broke and ran. Yet he bought his freedom at a high price, for he left his hand and arm and shoulder to show he had been here,
a cold comfort for having come among us.
And now he won't be long for this world.
He has done his worst but the wound will end him.

He is hasped and hooped and hirpling with pain, limping and looped in it. Like a man outlawed for wickedness, he must await the mighty judgment of God in majesty.'
There was less tampering and big talk then from Unferth the boaster, less of his blather as the hall-thanes eyed the awful proof of the hero's prowess, the splayed hand up under the eaves. Every nail, claw-scale and spur, every spike and welt on the hand of that heathen brute was like barbed steel. Everybody said there was no honed iron hard enough to pierce him through, no time-proofed blade that could cut his brutal, blood-caked claw.

Then the order was given for all hands to help to refurbish Heorot immediately:
men and women thronging the wine-hall, getting it ready. Gold thread shone in the wall-hangings, woven scenes that attracted and held the eye's attention.
But iron-braced as the inside of it had been,
that bright room lay in ruins now.
The very doors had been dragged from their hinges.
Only the roof remained unscathed
by the time the guilt-fouled fiend turned tail in despair of his life. But death is not easily escaped from by anyone:
all of us with souls, earth-dwellers and children of men, must make our way to a destination already ordained where the body, after the banqueting, sleeps on its deathbed.

Then the due time arrived for Halfdane's son to proceed to the hall.
The king himself would sit down to feast.
No group ever gathered in greater numbers or better order around their ring-giver.
The benches filled with famous men who fell to with relish; round upon round of mead was passed; those powerful kinsmen, Hrothgar and Hrothulf, were in high spirits in the raftered hall. Inside Heorot there was nothing but friendship. The Shielding nation was not yet familiar with feud and betrayal. 4

Then Halfdane's son presented Beowulf with a gold standard as a victory gift, an embroidered banner; also breast-mail and a helmet; and a sword carried high,
that was both precious object and token of honor.
So Beowulf drank his drink, at ease;

it was hardly a shame to be showered with such gifts in front of the hall-troops. There haven't been many moments, I am sure, when men exchanged

although no such treachery is recorded of Hrothulf, who is the hero of other Germanic stories.
four such treasures at so friendly a sitting.
An embossed ridge, a band lapped with wire arched over the helmet: head-protection to keep the keen-ground cutting edge from damaging it when danger threatened and the man was battling behind his shield.
Next the king ordered eight horses with gold bridle to be brought through the yard into the hall. The harness of one included a saddle of sumptuous design, the battle-seat where the son of Halfdane rode when he wished to join the sword-play:
wherever the killing and carnage were the worst,
he would be to the fore, fighting hard.
Then the Danish prince, descendant of Ing, handed over both the arms and the horses,
urging Beowulf to use them well.
And so their leader, the lord and guard of coffers and strongroom, with customary grace bestowed upon Beowulf both sets of gifts.
A fair witness can see how well each one behaved.
The chieftain went on to reward the others:
each man on the bench who had sailed with Beowulf and risked the voyage received a bounty, some treasured possession. And compensation,
a price in gold, was settled for the Geat Grendel had cruelly killed earlier—as he would have killed more, had not mindful God and one man’s daring prevented that doom.
Hence, understanding is always best and a prudent mind. Whoever remains for long here in this earthly life will enjoy and endure more than enough.
They sang then and played to please the hero, words and music for their warrior prince,
harp tunes and tales of adventure:
there were high times on the hall benches, and the king’s poet performed his part with the saga of Finn and his sons, unfolding the tale of the fierce attack in Friesland where Hnaef, king of the Danes, met death.5 5. The bard’s lay is known as the Finnsburg Episode. Its situation and details are obscure in many details, although some can be filled in from a fragmentary Old English lay, which modern editors have entitled The Fight at Finnsburg. Hildeburh, the daughter of the former Danish king Hoc, was married to Finn, king of Friesland, presumably to help end a feud between their peoples. As the episode opens, the feud has already broken out again when a visiting party of Danes, led by Hildeburh’s brother Hnaef, who has succeeded their father, is attacked by a tribe called the Jutes. The Jutes are subject to Finn but may be a clan distinct from the Frisians, and Finn does not seem to have instigated the attack. In the ensuing battle, both Hnaef and the son of Hildeburh and Finn are killed, and both sides suffer heavy losses.
to credit the Jutes:
son and brother,
she lost them both
on the battlefield.
She, bereft and blameless, they foredoomed, cut down and spear-gored. Site,
the woman in shock,
waylaid by grief,
Hoe's daughter—
how could she not lament her fate when morning came and the light broke on her murdered dears?
And so farewell delight on earth,

war carried away
Finn's troop of thanes
all but a few.
How then could Finn hold the line or fight on to the end with Hengest,
how save the rump of his force from that enemy chief?

So a truce was offered as follows: first separate quarters
to be cleared for the Danes, hall and throne
to be shared with the Frisians.
Then, second:
every day
at the dole-out of gifts
Finn, son of Focwald, should honor the Danes, bestow with an even hand to Hengest
and Hengest's men
the wrought-gold rings, bounty to match
the measure he gave his own Frisians—to keep morale
in the beer-hall high.

Both sides then sealed their agreement.
With oaths to Hengest

6. The truce was offered by Finn to Hengest, who succeeded Hnaef as leader of the Danes.
Finn swore openly, solemnly, that the battle survivors would be guaranteed honor and status.
No infringement
by word or deed,
no provocation
would be permitted.
Their own ring-giver
after all was dead and gone,
they were leaderless,
in forced allegiance to his murderer.
So if any Frisian stirred up bad blood with insinuations or taunts about this,
the blade of the sword
would arbitrate it.
A funeral pyre was then prepared, effulgent gold
brought out from the hoard.
The pride and prince of the Shieldings lay awaiting the flame.
Everywhere
there were blood-plastered coats of mail.
The pyre was heaped with boar-shaped helmets forged in gold,
with the gashed corpses of wellborn Danes—
many had fallen.

Then Hildeburh ordered her own son's body
be burnt with Hnaef's,
the flesh on his bones to sputter and blaze
beside his uncle's.
The woman wailed
and sang keens,
the warrior went up.7
Carcass flame
swirled and fumed,
they stood round the burial

7. The meaning may be that the warrior was placed up on the pyre, or went up in smoke. "Keens": lamentations or dirges for the dead.
mound and howled
as heads melted, crusted gashes spattered and ran bloody matter.
The glutton element
flamed and consumed

The dead of both sides.
Their great days were gone.

Warriors scattered to homes and forts
all over Friesland, fever now, feeling
loss of friends.
Hengest stayed,
lived out that whole resentful, blood-sullen

winter with Finn, homesick and helpless.
No ring-whorled prow could up then
and away on the sea.
Wind and water
raged with storms, wave and shingle were shackled in ice until another year

appeared in the yard
as it does to this day,
the seasons constant,
the wonder of light
coming over us.
Then winter was gone,
earth’s lap grew lovely,
longing woke in the cooped-up exile for a voyage home—

but more for vengeance, some way of bringing things to a head:
his sword arm hanlzered
to greet the Jutes.
So he did not balk once Hunlafing placed on his lap Dazzle-the-Duel,
the best sword of all.⁸

whose edges Jutes knew only too well.
Thus blood was spilled.

---

⁸ Hunlafing may be the son of a Danish warrior called Hunafl. The placing of the sword in Hengest’s lap is a symbolic call for revenge.
The gallant Finn slain in his home after Guthlaf and Oslaf back from their voyage
the brutal ambush,
the fate they had suffered,
all blamed on Finn.
The wildness in them
had to brim over.
The hall ran red with blood of enemies.
Finn was cut down,
the queen brought away and everything inside Finn's walls—the Frisian king's gold collars and gemstones—swept off to the ship.
Over sea-lanes then back to Daneland
the warrior troop
bore that lady home.

The poem was over,
the poet had performed, a pleasant murmur started on the benches, stewards did the rounds with wine in splendid jugs, and Wealthow came to sit in her gold crown between two good men, uncle and nephew, each one of whom still trusted the other;¹ and the forthright Unferth, adored by all for his mind and courage
although under a cloud for killing his brothers, reclined near the king.

The queen spoke:
"Enjoy this drink, my most generous lord;
raise up your goblet, entertain the Geats duly and gently, discourse with them, be open-handed, happy and fond.
Relish their company, but recollect as well
all of the boons that have been bestowed on you.
The bright court of Heorot has been cleansed and now the word is that you want to adopt this warrior as a son. So, while you may, bask in your fortune, and then bequeath kingdom and nation to your kith and kin, before your decease. I am certain of Hrothulf.

He is noble and will use the young ones well.
He will not let you down. Should you die before him, he will treat our children truly and fairly. He will honor, I am sure, our two sons, repay them in kind, when he recollects all the good things we gave him once, the favor and respect he found in his childhood."

She turned then to the bench where her boys sat, Hrethric and Hrothmund, with other nobles' sons, all the youth together; and that good man, Beowulf the Geat, sat between the brothers.

The cup was carried to him, kind words spoken in welcome and a wealth of wrought gold graciously bestowed: two arm bangles, a mail-shirt and rings, and the most resplendent torque of gold I ever heard tell of anywhere on earth or under heaven. There was no hoard like it since Hama snatched the Brosings' neck-chain and bore it away with its gems and settings to his shining fort, away from Eormenric's wiles and hatred, and thereby ensured his eternal reward. Hygelac the Geat, grandson of Swerting, wore this neck-ring on his last raid; at bay under his banner, he defended the booty, treasure he had won. Fate swept him away because of his proud need to provoke a feud with the Frisians. He fell beneath his shield, in the same gem-crusted, kingly gear he had worn when he crossed the frothing wave-vat.

So the dead king fell into Frankish hands. They took his breast-mail, also his neck-torque, and punier warriors plundered the slain when the carnage ended; Geat corpses covered the field.

Applause filled the hall.

Then Wealhtheow pronounced in the presence of the company: "Take delight in this torque, dear Beowulf, wear it for luck and wear also this mail from our people's armory: may you prosper in them! Be acclaimed for strength, for kindly guidance to these two boys, and your bounty will be sure. You have won renown: you are known to all men far and near, now and forever. Your sway is wide as the wind's home, as the sea around cliffs. And so, my prince, I wish you a lifetime's luck and blessings to enjoy this treasure. Treat my sons

2. The necklace presented to Beowulf is compared to one worn by the goddess Freya in Germanic mythology. In another story it was stolen by Hama from the Gothic king Eormenric, who is treated as a tyrant in Germanic legend, but how Eormenric came to possess it is not known.

3. Later we learn that Beowulf gave the necklace to Hygd, the queen of his lord Hygelac. Hygelac is here said to have been wearing it on his last expedition. This is the first of several allusions to Hygelac's death on a raid up the Rhine, the one incident in the poem that can be connected to a historical event documented elsewhere.
with tender care, be strong and kind. Here each comrade is true to the other, loyal to lord, loving in spirit.

1220 The thanes have one purpose, the people are ready: having drunk and pledged, the ranks do as I bid.’

She moved then to her place. Men were drinking wine at that rare feast; how could they know fate, the grim shape of things to come, 1225 the threat looming over many thanes as night approached and King Hrothgar prepared to retire to his quarters? Retainers in great numbers were posted on guard as so often in the past.

Benches were pushed back, bedding gear and bolsters spread across the floor, and one man lay down to his rest, already marked for death. At their heads they placed their polished timber battle-shields; and on the bench above them, each man’s kit was kept to hand:

1230 a towering war-helmet, webbed mail-shirt and great-shafted spear. It was their habit always and everywhere to be ready for action, at home or in the camp, in whatever case and at whatever time the need arose to rally round their lord. They were a right people.

[ANOTHER ATTACK]

They went to sleep. And one paid dearly for his night’s ease, as had happened to them often, ever since Grendel occupied the gold-hall, committing evil until the end came,

1235 death after his crimes. Then it became clear, obvious to everyone once the fight was over, that an avenger lurked and was still alive, grimly biding time. Grendel’s mother, monstrous hell-bride, brooded on her wrongs.

1240 She had been forced down into fearful waters, the cold depths, after Cain had killed his father’s son, felled his own brother with a sword. Branded an outlaw, marked by having murdered, he moved into the wilds, shunned company and joy. And from Cain there sprang misbegotten spirits, among them Grendel, the banished and accursed, due to come to grips with that watcher in Heorot waiting to do battle.

The monster wrenched and wrestled with him, but Beowulf was mindful of his mighty strength, the wondrous gifts God had showered on him: he relied for help on the Lord of All, on His care and favor. So he overcame the foe, brought down the hell-brute. Broken and bowed, outcast from all sweetness, the enemy of mankind made for his death-den. But now his mother had sallied forth on a savage journey, grief-racked and ravenous, desperate for revenge.

She came to Heorot. There, inside the hall,
Danes lay asleep, earls who would soon endure
a great reversal, once Grendel's mother attacked and entered. Her onslaught was less only by as much as an amazon warrior's strength is less than an armed man's when the hefted sword, its hammered edge and gleaming blade slathered in blood, razes the sturdy boar-ridge off a helmet.

Then in the hall, hard-honed swords were grabbed from the bench, many a broad shield lifted and braced; there was little thought of helmets or woven mail when they woke in terror.
The hell-dam was in panic, desperate to get out,
in mortal terror the moment she was found.
She had pounced and taken one of the retainers
in a tight hold, then headed for the fen.
To Hrothgar, this man was the most beloved of the friends he trusted between the two seas.
She had done away with a great warrior, ambushed him at rest.

Beowulf was elsewhere.

Earlier, after the award of the treasure,
the Geat had been given another lodging.
There was uproar in Heorot. She had snatched their trophy, Grendel's bloodied hand. It was a fresh blow to the afflicted bawn. The bargain was hard, both parties having to pay with the lives of friends. And the old lord, the gray-haired warrior, was heartsore and weary when he heard the news: his highest-placed adviser, his dearest companion, was dead and gone.

Beowulf was quickly brought to the chamber:
the winner of fights, the arch-warrior, came first-footing in with his fellow troops to where the king in his wisdom waited, still wondering whether Almighty God would ever turn the tide of his misfortunes.
So Beowulf entered with his band in attendance and the wooden floorboards banged and rang as he advanced, hurrying to address the prince of the Ingwins, asking if he'd rested since the urgent summons had come as a surprise.

Then Hrothgar, the Shieldings' helmet, spoke:
'Rest? What is rest? Sorrow has returned.
Alas for the Danes! Aeschere is dead.
He was Yrmenlaf's elder brother and a soul-mate to me, a true mentor, my right-hand man when the ranks clashed and our boar-crests had to take a battering in the line of action. Aeschere was everything the world admires in a wise man and a friend.

Then this roaming killer came in a fury and slaughtered him in Heorot. Where she is hiding, glutting on the corpse and glorying in her escape, I cannot tell; she has taken up the feud because of last night, when you killed Grendel, wrestled and racked him in ruinous combat since for too long he had terrorized us with his depredations. He died in battle, paid with his life; and now this powerful other one arrives, this force for evil driven to avenge her kinsman’s death. Or so it seems to thanes in their grief, in the anguish every thane endures at the loss of a ring-giver, now that the hand that bestowed so richly has been stilled in death.

I have heard it said by my people in hall, counselors who live in the upland country, that they have seen two such creatures prowling the moors, huge marauders from some other world. One of these things, as far as anyone ever can discern, looks like a woman; the other, warped in the shape of a man, moves beyond the pale bigger than any man, an unnatural birth called Grendel by the country people in former days. They are fatherless creatures, and their whole ancestry is hidden in a past of demons and ghosts. They dwell apart among wolves on the hills, on windswept crags and treacherous keshes, where cold streams pour down the mountain and disappear under mist and moorland.

A few miles from here a frost-stiffened wood waits and keeps watch above a mere; the overhanging bank is a maze of tree-roots mirrored in its surface. At night there, something uncanny happens: the water burns. And the mere bottom has never been sounded by the sons of men. On its bank, the heather-stepper halts: the hart in flight from pursuing hounds will turn to face them with firm-set horns and die in the wood rather than dive beneath its surface. That is no good place. When wind blows up and stormy weather makes clouds scud and the skies weep, out of its depths a dirty surge is pitched toward the heavens. Now help depends again on you and on you alone. The gap of danger where the demon waits is still unknown to you. Seek it if you dare.

I will compensate you for settling the feud

as I did the last time with lavish wealth, coffers of coiled gold, if you come back.'

[BEOWULF FIGHTS GRENDAL’S MOTHER]

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
"Wise sir, do not grieve. It is always better to avenge dear ones than to indulge in mourning.
For every one of us, living in this world means waiting for our end. Let whoever can win glory before death. When a warrior is gone, that will be his best and only bulwark.

So arise, my lord, and let us immediately set forth on the trail of this troll-dam.
I guarantee you: she will not get away,
not to dens under ground nor upland groves nor the ocean floor. She’ll have nowhere to flee to.

Endure your troubles today. Bear up and be the man I expect you to be.”
With that the old lord sprang to his feet and praised God for Ecgtheow’s pledge.
Then a bit and halter were brought for his horse with the plaited mane. The wise king mounted the royal saddle and rode out in style with a force of shield-bearers. The forest paths were marked all over with the monster’s tracks, her trail on the ground wherever she had gone across the dark moors, dragging away the body of that thane, Hrothgar’s best counselor and overseer of the country.
So the noble prince proceeded undismayed up fells and screes, along narrow footpaths and ways where they were forced into single file, ledges on cliffs above lairs of water-monsters.
He went in front with a few men,
good judges of the lie of the land,
and suddenly discovered the dismal wood, mountain trees growing out at an angle above gray stones: the bloodshot water surged underneath. It was a sore blow to all of the Danes, friends of the Shieldings, a hurt to each and every one of that noble company when they came upon Aeschere’s head at the foot of the cliff.
Everybody gazed as the hot gore kept wallowing up and an urgent war-horn repeated its notes: the whole party sat down to watch. The water was infested with all kinds of reptiles. There were writhing sea-dragons and monsters slouching on slopes by the cliff, serpents and wild things such as those that often surface at dawn to roam the sail-road and doom the voyage. Down they plunged, lashing in anger at the loud call of the battle-bugle. An arrow from the bow of the Geat chief got one of them as he surged to the surface: the seasoned shaft 145 stuck deep in his flank and his freedom in the water got less and less. It was his last swim.
He was swiftly overwhelmed in the shallows, prodded by barbed boar-spears,
cornered, beaten, pulled up on the bank,
a strange lake-birth, a loathsome catch men gazed at in awe.

Beowulf got ready,
donned his war-gear, indifferent to death;
his mighty, hand-forged, fine-webbed mail would soon meet with the menace underwater.
146 It would keep the bone-cage of his body safe:
no enemy’s clasp could crush him in it,
no vicious armlock choke his life out.
To guard his head he had a glittering helmet that was due to be muddied on the mere bottom 147 and blurred in the upswirl. It was of beaten gold, princely headgear hooped and hasped
by a weapon-smith who had worked wonders in days gone by and adorned it with boar-shapes;
since then it had resisted every sword.

148 And another item lent by Unferth at that moment of need was of no small importance:
the brehon handed him a hilted weapon,
a rare and ancient sword named Hrunting.
The iron blade with its ill-boding patterns 149 had been tempered in blood. It had never failed the hand of anyone who hefted it in battle, anyone who had fought and faced the worst in the gap of danger. This was not the first time it had been called to perform heroic feats.

150 When he lent that blade to the better swordsman, Unferth, the strong-built son of Ecglaf, could hardly have remembered the ranting speech he had made in his cups. He was not man enough to face the turmoil of a fight under water 151 and the risk to his life. So there he lost fame and repute. It was different for the other rigged out in his gear, ready to do battle.
152 Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
4 Wisest of kings, now that I have come to the point of action, I ask you to recall what we said earlier: that you, son of Halfdane and gold-friend to retainers, that you, if I should fall and suffer death while serving your cause, would act like a father to me afterward.

4. One of an ancient class of lawyers in Ireland [Translator’s note]. The Old English word for Unferth’s office, thyle, has been interpreted as “orator” and “spokesman.”
If this combat kills me, take care of my young company, my comrades in arms.
And be sure also, my beloved Hrothgar,
to send Hygelac the treasures I received.
Let the lord of the Geats gaze on that gold, let Hrethel’s son take note of it and see that I found a ring-giver of rare magnificence and enjoyed the good of his generosity.
And Unferth is to have what I inherited:
to that far-famed man I bequeath my own sharp-honed, wave-sheened wonder-blade.
With Hrunting I shall gain glory or die.”

After these words, the prince of the Weather-Geats was impatient to be away and plunged suddenly:
without more ado, he dived into the heaving depths of the lake. It was the best part of a day before he could see the solid bottom.
Quickly the one who haunted those waters,
who had scavenged and gone her gluttonous rounds for a hundred seasons, sensed a human observing her outlandish lair from above.
So she lunged and clutched and managed to catch him in her brutal grip; but his body, for all that, remained unscathed: the mesh of the chain-mail saved him on the outside. Her savage talons failed to rip the web of his war-shirt.
Then once she touched bottom, that wolfish swimmer carried the ring-mailed prince to her court so that for all his courage he could never use the weapons he carried; and a bewildering horde came at him from the depths, droves of sea-beasts who attacked with tusks and tore at his chain-mail in a ghastly onslaught. The gallant man could see he had entered some hellish turn-hole because the hall-roofing held off the force of the current; then he saw firelight, a gleam and flare-up, a glimmer of brightness.
The hero observed that swamp-thing from hell,
the tarn-hag in all her terrible strength,
then heaved his war-sword and swung his arm:
the decorated blade came down ringing and singing on her head. But he soon found his battle-torch extinguished; the shining blade refused to bite. It spared her and failed the man in his need. It had gone through many hand-to-hand fight, had hewed the armor and helmets of the doomed, but here at last the fabulous powers of that heirloom failed.
Hygelac’s kinsman kept thinking about his name and fame: he never lost heart.
Then, in a fury, he flung his sword away.
The keen, inlaid, worm-loop-patterned steel was hurled to the ground: he would have to rely on the might of his arm. So must a man do who intends to gain enduring glory in a combat. Life doesn't cost him a thought. Then the prince of War-Geats, warming to this fight with Grendel's mother, gripped her shoulder and laid about him in a battle frenzy: he pitched his killer opponent to the floor but she rose quickly and retaliated, grappled him tightly in her grim embrace. The sure-footed fighter felt daunted, the strongest of warriors stumbled and fell. So she pounced upon him and pulled out a broad, whetted knife: now she would avenge her only child. But the mesh of chain-mail on Beowulf's shoulder shielded his life, turned the edge and tip of the blade. The son of Ecgtheow would have surely perished and the Geats lost their warrior under the wide earth had the strong links and locks of his war-gear not helped to save him: holy God decided the victory. It was easy for the Lord, the Ruler of Heaven, to redress the balance once Beowulf got back up on his feet. Then he saw a blade that boded well, a sword in her armory, an ancient heirloom from the days of the giants, an ideal weapon, one that any warrior would envy, but so huge and heavy of itself only Beowulf could wield it in a battle. So the Shieldings' hero hard-pressed and enraged, took a firm hold of the hilt and swung the blade in an arc, a resolute blow that bit deep into her neck-bone and severed it entirely, toppling the doomed house of her flesh; she fell to the floor. The sword dripped blood, the swordsman was elated. A light appeared and the place brightened the way the sky does when heaven's candle is shining clearly. He inspected the vault: with sword held high, its hilt raised to guard and threaten, Hygelac's thane scouted by the wall in Grendel's wake. Now the weapon was to prove its worth. The warrior determined to take revenge for every gross act Grendel had committed—and not only for that one occasion when he'd come to slaughter the sleeping troops, fifteen of Hrothgar's house-guards surprised on their benches and ruthlessly devoured, and as many again carried away, a brutal plunder. Beowulf in his fury now settled that score: he saw the monster in his resting place, war-weary and wrecked, a lifeless corpse, a casualty of the battle in Heorot. The body gaped at the stroke dealt to it after death:

1900 Beowulf cut the corpse’s head off.

Immediately the counselors keeping a lookout with Hrothgar, watching the lake water, saw a heave-up and surge of waves and blood in the backwash. They bowed gray heads, spoke in their sage, experienced way about the good warrior, how they never again expected to see that prince returning in triumph to their king. It was clear to many that the wolf of the deep had destroyed him forever.

1950 The ninth hour of the day arrived. The brave Shieldings abandoned the cliff-top and the king went home; but sick at heart, staring at the mere, the strangers held on. They wished, without hope, to behold their lord, Beowulf himself.

1955 Meanwhile, the sword began to wilt into gory icicles to slather and thaw. It was a wonderful thing, the way it all melted as ice melts when the Father eases the fetters off the frost and unravels the water-ropes, He who wields power over time and tide: He is the true Lord.

2000 The Geat captain saw treasure in abundance but carried no spoils from those quarters except for the head and the inlaid hilt embossed with jewels; its blade had melted and the scrollwork on it burned, so scalding was the blood of the poisonous fiend who had perished there.

2005 Then away he swam, the one who had survived the fall of his enemies, flailing to the surface.

2010 The wide water, the waves and pools, were no longer infested once the wandering fiend let go of her life and this unreliable world.

2015 The seafarers’ leader made for land, resolutely swimming, delighted with his prize, the mighty load he was lugging to the surface. His thanes advanced in a troop to meet him, thanking God and taking great delight in seeing their prince back safe and sound.

2020 Quickly the hero’s helmet and mail-shirt were loosed and unlaced. The lake settled, clouds darkened above the bloodshot depths.

2025 With high hearts they headed away along footpaths and trails through the fields, roads that they knew, each of them wrestling with the head they were carrying from the lakeside cliff, men kingly in their courage and capable of difficult work. It was a task for four to hoist Grendel’s head on a spear and bear it under strain to the bright hall.

But soon enough they neared the place,
fourteen Geats in fine fettle, striding across the outlying ground in a delighted throng around their leader.

In he came then, the thanes’ commander,
the arch-warrior, to address Hrothgar:
his courage was proven, his glory was secure.
Grendel’s head was hauled by the hair, dragged across the floor where the people were drinking,
a horror for both queen and company to behold.

They stared in awe. It was an astonishing sight.

[ANOTHER CELEBRATION AT HEOROT]

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
"So, son of Halfdane, prince of the Shieldings,
we are glad to bring this booty from the lake.
It is a token of triumph and we tender it to you.

I barely survived the battle under water.
It was hard-fought, a desperate affair that could have gone badly; if God had not helped me,
the outcome would have been quick and fatal.
Although Hrunting is hard-edged,
I could never bring it to bear in battle.
But the Lord of Men allowed me to behold—for He often helps the unbefriended—an ancient sword shining on the wall, a weapon made for giants, there for the wielding.

Then my moment came in the combat and I struck the dwellers in that den. Next thing the damascened sword blade melted; it bloated and it burned in their rushing blood. I have wrested the hilt from the enemies’ hand, avenged the evil done to the Danes; it is what was due.
And this I pledge, O prince of the Shieldings:
you can sleep secure with your company of troops in Heorot Hall. Never need you fear for a single thane of your sept or nation, young warriors or old, that laying waste of life that you and your people endured of yore."

Then the gold hilt was handed over to the old lord, a relic from long ago for the venerable ruler. That rare smithwork was passed on to the prince of the Danes when those devils perished; once death removed that murdering, guilt-steeped, God-cursed fiend, eliminating his unholy life and his mother’s as well, it was willed to that king who of all the lavish gift-lords of the north was the best regarded between the two seas.

Hrothgar spoke; he examined the hilt, that relic of old times. It was engraved all over and showed how war first came into the world and the flood destroyed the tribe of giants.
They suffered a terrible severance from the Lord;
the Almighty made the waters rise,
drowned them in the deluge for retribution.
In pure gold inlay on the sword-guards
there were rune-markings correctly incised, stating and recording for whom the sword had been first made and ornamented with its scrollworked hilt. Then everyone hushed as the son of Halfdane spoke this wisdom:
"A protector of his people, pledged to uphold truth and justice and to respect tradition, is entitled to affirm that this man was born to distinction. Beowulf, my friend, your fame has gone far and wide.
you are known everywhere. In all things you are even-tempered, prudent and resolute. So I stand firm by the promise of friendship we exchanged before. Forever you will be your people's mainstay and your own warriors' helping hand.
Heremod was different,
the way he behaved to Ecgwela's sons.
His rise in the world brought little joy to the Danish people, only death and destruction.
He vented his rage on men he caroused with,
killed his own comrades, a pariah king who cut himself off from his own kind, even though Almighty God had made him eminent and powerful and marked him from the start for a happy life. But a change happened, he grew bloodthirsty, gave no more rings to honor the Danes. He suffered in the end for having plagued his people for so long:
his life lost happiness.

So learn from this and understand true values. I who tell you have wintered into wisdom.

It is a great wonder how Almighty God in His magnificence favors our race with rank and scope and the gift of wisdom; His sway is wide.
Sometimes He allows the mind of a man of distinguished birth to follow its bent, grants him fulfillment and felicity on earth and forts to command in his own country.
He permits him to lord it in many lands until the man in his unthinkingness forgets that it will ever end for him.
He indulges his desires; illness and old age mean nothing to him; his mind is untroubled by envy or malice or the thought of enemies with their hate-honed swords. The whole world conforms to his will, he is kept from the worst until an element of overweening enters him and takes hold while the soul’s guard, its sentry, drowses, grown too distracted. A killer stalks him, an archer who draws a deadly bow.

And then the man is hit in the heart, the arrow flies beneath his defenses, the devious promptings of the demon start. His old possessions seem paltry to him now. He covets and resents; dishonors custom and bestows no gold; and because of good things that the Heavenly Powers gave him in the past he ignores the shape of things to come. Then finally the end arrives when the body he was lent collapses and falls prey to its death; ancestral possessions and the goods he hoarded are inherited by another who lets them go with a liberal hand.

"O flower of warriors, beware of that trap. Choose, dear Beowulf, the better part, eternal rewards. Do not give way to pride. For a brief while your strength is in bloom but it fades quickly; and soon there will follow illness or the sword to lay you low, or a sudden fire or surge of water or jabbing blade or javelin from the air or repellent age. Your piercing eye will dim and darken; and death will arrive, dear warrior, to sweep you away.

Just so I ruled the Ring-Danes’ country for fifty years, defended them in wartime with spear and sword against constant assaults by many tribes: I came to believe my enemies had faded from the face of the earth. Still, what happened was a hard reversal from bliss to grief. Grendel struck after lying in wait. He laid waste to the land and from that moment my mind was in dread of his depredations. So I praise God in His heavenly glory that I lived to behold this head dripping blood and that after such harrowing I can look upon it in triumph at last. Take your place, then, with pride and pleasure, and move to the feast. Tomorrow morning our treasure will be shared and showered upon you."

The Geat was elated and gladly obeyed the old man’s bidding; he sat on the bench. And soon all was restored, the same as before. Happiness came back, the hall was thronged, and a banquet set forth; black night fell and covered them in darkness.
Then the company rose for the old campaigner: the gray-haired prince was ready for bed. And a need for rest came over the brave shield-bearing Geat.
He was a weary seafarer, far from home,
so immediately a house-guard guided him out, one whose office entailed looking after whatever a thane on the road in those days might need or require. It was noble courtesy.

[BEOWULF RETURNS HOME]

That great heart rested. The hall towered, gold-shingled and gabled, and the guest slept in it until the black raven with raucous glee announced heaven's joy, and a hurry of brightness overran the shadows. Warriors rose quickly, impatient to be off: their own country was beckoning the nobles; and the bold voyager longed to be aboard his distant boat.
Then that stalwart fighter ordered Hrunting to be brought to Unferth, and bade Unferth take the sword and thanked him for lending it.

He said he had found it a friend in battle and a powerful help; he put no blame on the blade's cutting edge. He was a considerate man.
And there the warriors stood in their war-gear, eager to go, while their honored lord approached the platform where the other sat.
The undaunted hero addressed Hrothgar.
Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:
"Now we who crossed the wide sea have to inform you that we feel a desire to return to Hygelac. Here we have been welcomed and thoroughly entertained. You have treated us well.
If there is any favor on earth I can perform beyond deeds of arms I have done already, anything that would merit your affections more,
I shall act, my lord, with alacrity.
If ever I hear from across the ocean that people on your borders are threatening battle as attackers have done from time to time,
I shall land with a thousand thanes at my back to help your cause. Hygelac may be young to rule a nation, but this much I know about the king of the Geats: he will come to my aid and want to support me by word and action in your hour of need, when honor dictates that I raise a hedge of spears around you.
Then if Hrethric should think about traveling as a king's son to the court of the Geats, he will find many friends. Foreign places yield more to one who is himself worth meeting."
Hrothgar spoke and answered him:

"The Lord in his wisdom sent you those words and they came from the heart. I have never heard so young a man make truer observations. You are strong in body and mature in mind, impressive in speech. If it should come to pass that Hrethel's descendant dies beneath a spear, if deadly battle or the sword blade or disease fells the prince who guards your people and you are still alive, then I firmly believe the seafaring Geats won't find a man worthier of acclaim as their king and defender than you, if only you would undertake the lordship of your homeland. My liking for you deepens with time, dear Beowulf.

What you have done is to draw two peoples, the Geat nation and us neighboring Danes, into shared peace and a pact of friendship in spite of hatreds we have harbored in the past. For as long as I rule this far-flung land treasures will change hands and each side will treat the other with gifts; across the gannet's bath, over the broad sea, whorled prows will bring presents and tokens. I know your people are beyond reproach in every respect, steadfast in the old way with friend or foe."

Then the earls' defender furnished the hero with twelve treasures and told him to set out, sail with those gifts safely home to the people he loved, but to return promptly.

And so the good and gray-haired Dane, that highborn king, kissed Beowulf and embraced his neck, then broke down in sudden tears. Two forebodings disturbed him in his wisdom, but one was stronger: nevermore would they meet each other face to face. And such was his affection that he could not help being overcome: his fondness for the man was so deep-founded, it warmed his heart and wound the heartstrings tight in his breast.

The embrace ended and Beowulf, glorious in his gold regalia, stepped the green earth. Straining at anchor and ready for boarding, his boat awaited him. So they went on their journey, and Hrothgar's generosity was praised repeatedly. He was a peerless king until old age sapped his strength and did him mortal harm, as it has done so many.

Down to the waves then, dressed in the web of their chain-mail and war-shirts the young men marched in high spirits. The coast-guard spied them, thanes setting forth, the same as before.
His salute this time from the top of the cliff was far from unmannerly; he galloped to meet them and as they took ship in their shining gear,
he said how welcome they would be in Geatland.
Then the broad hull was beached on the sand to be cargoed with treasure, horses and war-gear.
The curved prow motioned; the mast stood high above Hrothgar’s riches in the loaded hold.
The guard who had watched the boat was given a sword with gold fittings, and in future days that present would make him a respected man at his place on the mead-bench.
Then the keel plunged and shook in the sea; and they sailed from Denmark.
Right away the mast was rigged with its sea-shawl;
sail-ropes were tightened, timbers drummed and stiff winds kept the wave-crosser
skimming ahead; as she heaved forward, her foamy neck was fleet and buoyant,
a lapped prow loping over currents, until finally the Geats caught sight of coastline and familiar cliffs. The keel reared up, wind lifted it home, it hit on the land.
The harbor guard came hurrying out to the rolling water: he had watched the offing long and hard, on the lookout for those friends.
With the anchor cables, he moored their craft right where it had beached, in case a backwash might catch the hull and carry it away.
Then he ordered the prince’s treasure-trove to be carried ashore. It was a short step from there to where Hrethel’s son and heir, Hygelac the gold-giver, makes his home on a secure cliff, in the company of retainers.
The building was magnificent, the king majestic, ensconced in his hall; and although Hygd, his queen,
was young, a few short years at court,
her mind was thoughtful and her manners sure.
Haereth’s daughter behaved generously and stinted nothing when she distributed bounty to the Geats.

5. The story of Queen Modthryth’s vices is abruptly introduced as a foil to Queen Hygd’s virtutues. A transitional passage may have been lost, but the poet’s device is similar to that of using the earlier reference to the wickedness of King Heremod to contrast with the good qualities of Sigemund and Beowulf.

6. This could refer to her husband or her father before her marriage. The story resembles folktails about a proud princess whose unsuccessful suitors are all put to death, although the unfortunate victims in this case seem to be guilty only of looking at her.
in hand-tightened shackles, racked, tortured until doom was pronounced—death by the sword, slash of blade, blood-gush, and death-qualms in an evil display. Even a queen outstanding in beauty must not overstep like that.
A queen should weave peace, not punish the innocent with loss of life for imagined insults.
But Hemming’s kinsman put a halt to her ways and drinkers round the table had another tale:
she was less of a bane to people’s lives,
less cruel-minded, after she was married to the brave Offa, a bride arrayed in her gold finery, given away by a caring father, ferried to her young prince over dim seas. In days to come she would grace the throne and grow famous for her good deeds and conduct of life, her high devotion to the hero king who was the best king, it has been said, between the two seas or anywhere else on the face of the earth. Offa was honored far and wide for his generous ways, his fighting spirit and his farseeing defense of his homeland; from him there sprang Eomer, Garmund’s grandson, kinsman of Hemming, his warriors’ mainstay and master of the field.
Heroic Beowulf and his band of men crossed the wide strand, striding along the sandy foreshore; the sun shone, the world’s candle warmed them from the south
as they hastened to where, as they had heard, the young king, Ongentheow’s killer and his people’s protector, was dispensing rings inside his bawn. Beowulf’s return was reported to Hygelac as soon as possible, news that the captain was now in the enclosure,
his battle-brother back from the fray alive and well, walking to the hall.
Room was quickly made, on the king’s orders,
and the troops filed across the cleared floor.
After Hygelac had offered greetings to his loyal thane in a lofty speech, he and his kinsman, that hale survivor, sat face to face. Haereth’s daughter moved about with the mead-jug in her hand, taking care of the company, filling the cups

7. I.e., Offa I, a legendary king of the Angles. We know nothing about Hemming other than that Offa was related to him. Offa II (757—96) was king of Mercia, and although the story is about the second Offa’s ancestor on the Continent, this is the only English connection in the poem and has been taken as evidence to date its origins to 8th-century Mercia.

8. I.e., Eomer, Offa’s son. See previous note. Gar-mund was presumably the same as Offa’s father.

9. I.e., Hygelac. Ongentheow was king of the Swedish people called the Shylfings. This is the first of the references to wars between the Geats and the Swedes. One of Hygelac’s war party named Eofer was the actual slayer of Ongentheow.
that warriors held out. Then Hygelac began to put courteous questions to his old comrade in the high hall. He hankered to know every tale the Sea-Geats had to tell: "How did you fare on your foreign voyage, dear Beowulf, when you abruptly decided to sail away across the salt water and fight at Heorot? Did you help Hrothgar much in the end? Could you ease the prince of his well-known troubles? Your undertaking cast my spirits down, I dreaded the outcome of your expedition and pleaded with you long and hard to leave the killer be, let the South-Danes settle their own blood-feud with Grendel. So God be thanked I am granted this sight of you, safe and sound."

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:

What happened, Lord Hygelac, is hardly a secret any more among men in this world—myself and Grendel coming to grips on the very spot where he visited destruction on the Victory-Shieldings and violated life and limb, losses I avenged so no earthly offspring of Grendel’s need ever boast of that bout before dawn, no matter how long the last of his evil family survives.

When I first landed I hastened to the ring-hall and saluted Hrothgar. Once he discovered why I had come, the son of Halfdane sent me immediately to sit with his own sons on the bench. It was a happy gathering. In my whole life I have never seen mead enjoyed more in any hall on earth. Sometimes the queen herself appeared, peace-pledge between nations, to hearten the young ones and hand out a torque to a warrior, then take her place. Sometimes Hrothgar’s daughter distributed ale to older ranks, in order on the benches: I heard the company call her Freawaru as she made her rounds, presenting men with the gem-studded bowl, young bride-to-be to the gracious Ingeld, in her gold-trimmed attire. The friend of the Shieldings favors her betrothal: the guardian of the kingdom sees good in it and hopes this woman will heal old wounds and grievous feuds.

But generally the spear is prompt to retaliate when a prince is killed, no matter how admirable the bride may be.

1. King of the Heatho-Bards; his father, Froda, was killed by the Danes.
"Think how the Heatho-Bards are bound to feel, their lord, Ingeld, and his loyal thanes, when he walks in with that woman to the feast:

2035 Danes are at the table, being entertained, honored guests in glittering regalia, burnished ring-mail that was their hosts' birthright, looted when the Heatho-Bards could no longer wield their weapons in the shield-clash, when they went down with their beloved comrades and forfeited their lives. Then an old spearman will speak while they are drinking, having glimpsed some heirloom that brings alive memories of the massacre; his mood will darken and heart-stricken, in the stress of his emotion, he will begin to test a young man's temper and stir up trouble, starting like this: 'Now, my friend, don't you recognize your father's sword, his favorite weapon, the one he wore when he went out in his war-mask to face the Danes on that final day? After Withergeld's death and his men were doomed, the Shieldings quickly claimed the field; and now here's a son of one or other of those same killers coming through our hall overbearing us, mouthing boasts, and rigged in armor that by right is yours.' And so he keeps on, recalling and accusing, working things up with bitter words until one of the lady's retainers lies spattered in blood, split open on his father's account. The killer knows the lie of the land and escapes with his life. Then on both sides the oath-bound lords will break the peace, a passionate hate will build up in Ingeld, and love for his bride will falter in him as the feud rankles. I therefore suspect the good faith of the Heatho-Bards, the truth of their friendship and the trustworthiness of their alliance with the Danes.

But now, my lord,

2070 I shall carry on with my account of Grendel, the whole story of everything that happened in the hand-to-hand fight.

After heaven's gem had gone mildly to earth, that maddened spirit, the terror of those twilights, came to attack us where we stood guard, still safe inside the hall. There deadly violence came down on Hondscio and he fell as fate ordained, the first to perish, rigged out for the combat. A comrade from our ranks

3. I.e., the young Danish attendant is killed because his father killed the father of the young Heatho-Bard who has been egged on by the old veteran of that campaign.
had come to grief in Grendel’s maw:

2080 he ate up the entire body.
There was blood on his teeth, he was bloated and dangerous, all roused up, yet still unready to leave the hall empty-handed;
renowned for his might, he matched himself against me, wildly reaching. He had this roomy pouch, a strange accoutrement, intricately strung and hung at the ready, a rare patchwork of devilishly fitted dragon-skins.
I had done him no wrong, yet the raging demon wanted to cram me and many another into this bag—but it was not to be once I got to my feet in a blind fury.
It would take too long to tell how I repaid the terror of the land for every life he took and so won credit for you, my king, and for all your people. And although he got away to enjoy life’s sweetness for a while longer, his right hand stayed behind him in Heorot, evidence of his miserable overthrow as he dived into murk on the mere bottom.

2090 “I got lavish rewards from the lord of the Danes for my part in the battle, beaten gold and much else, once morning came and we took our places at the banquet table.

2100 There was singing and excitement: an old reciter,
a carrier of stories, recalled the early days.
At times some hero made the timbered harp tremble with sweetness, or related true and tragic happenings; at times the king gave the proper turn to some fantastic tale, or a battle-scarred veteran, bowed with age, would begin to remember the martial deeds of his youth and prime and be overcome as the past welled up in his wintry heart.

2105 “We were happy there the whole day long and enjoyed our time until another night descended upon us. Then suddenly the vehement mother avenged her son and wreaked destruction. Death had robbed her, Geats had slain Grendel, so his ghastly dam struck back and with bare-faced defiance laid a man low. Thus life departed from the sage Aeschere, an elder wise in counsel.
But afterward, on the morning following,

2115 the Danes could not burn the dead body nor lay the remains of the man they loved on his funeral pyre. She had fled with the corpse and taken refuge beneath torrents on the mountain.
It was a hard blow for Hrothgar to bear,

2120 harder than any he had undergone before.
And so the heartsore king beseeched me in your royal name to take my chances underwater, to win glory and prove my worth. He promised me rewards.

2135 Hence, as is well known, I went to my encounter with the terror-monger at the bottom of the tarn.
For a while it was hand-to-hand between us,
then blood went curling along the currents and I beheaded Grendel’s mother in the hall

2140 with a mighty sword. I barely managed to escape with my life; my time had not yet come.
But Halfdane’s heir, the shelter of those earls,
again endowed me with gifts in abundance.

2145 “Thus the king acted with due custom.
I was paid and recompensed completely, given full measure and the freedom to choose from Hrothgar’s treasures by Hrothgar himself.
These, King Hygelac, I am happy to present to you as gifts. It is still upon your grace

2150 that all favor depends. I have few kinsmen who are close, my king, except for your kind self.’
Then he ordered the boar-framed standard to be brought,
the battle-topping helmet, the mail-shirt gray as hoar-frost,
and the precious war-sword; and proceeded with his speech:

2155 “When Hrothgar presented this war-gear to me he instructed me, my lord, to give you some account of why it signifies his special favor.
He said it had belonged to his older brother,
King Heorogar, who had long kept it,

2160 but that Heorogar had never bequeathed it to his son Heoroward, that worthy scion, loyal as he was. Enjoy it well.”

2165 I heard four horses were handed over next.
Beowulf bestowed four bay steeds to go with the armor, swift gallopers, all alike. So ought a kinsman act, instead of plotting and planning in secret to bring people to grief, or conspiring to arrange the death of comrades. The warrior king

2170 was uncle to Beowulf and honored by his nephew:
each was concerned for the other’s good.

2175 I heard he presented Hygd with a gorget,
the priceless torque that the prince’s daughter, Wealhtheow, had given him; and three horses,
supple creatures brilliantly saddled.
The bright necklace would be luminous on Hygd’s breast.

2180 Thus Beowulf bore himself with valor;
and, warrior that he was, watched and controlled his God-sent strength and his outstanding natural powers. He had been poorly regarded for a long time, was taken by the Geats
80 / BEOWULF

2185 for less than he was worth: and their lord too had never much esteemed him in the mead-hall. They firmly believed that he lacked force, that the prince was a weakling; but presently every affront to his deserving was reversed.

2190 The battle-famed king, bulwark of his earls, ordered a gold-chased heirloom of Hrethel’s to be brought in; it was the best example of a gem-studded sword in the Geat treasury. This he laid on Beowulf’s lap and then rewarded him with land as well, seven thousand hides; and a hall and a throne. Both owned land by birth in that country, ancestral grounds; but the greater right and sway were inherited by the higher born.

[THE DRAGON WAKES]

2200 A lot was to happen in later days in the fury of battle. Hygelac fell and the shelter of Heardred’s shield proved useless against the fierce aggression of the Shylfings: ruthless swordsmen, seasoned campaigners, they came against him and his conquering nation, and with cruel force cut him down so that afterwards the wide kingdom reverted to Beowulf. He ruled it well for fifty winters, grew old and wise as warden of the land until one began to dominate the dark, a dragon on the prowl, from the steep vaults of a stone-roofed barrow where he guarded a hoard; there was a hidden passage, unknown to men, but someone managed to enter by it and interfere with the heathen trove. He had handled and removed

4. There is no other mention of Beowulf’s unpromising youth. This motif of the "Cinderella hero" and others, such as Grendel’s magic pouch, are examples of folklore material, probably circulating orally, that made its way into the poem.

5. Hygelac’s father and Beowulf’s grandfather.

6. There are several references, some of them lengthy, to the wars between the Geats and the Swedes. Because these are highly allusive and not in chronological order, they are difficult to follow and keep straight. This outline, along with the Genealogies (p. 32), may serve as a guide. Phase 1: After the death of the Geat patriarch, King Hrethel (lines 2462—70), Ohthere and Onela, the sons of the Swedish king Ongentheow, invade Geat territory and inflict heavy casualties in a battle at Hreosnahill (lines 2472-78). Phase 2: The Geats invade Sweden under Hæthcyn, King Hrethel’s son who has succeeded him. At the battle of Ravenarywood, the Geats capture Ongentheow’s queen, but Ongentheow counterattacks, rescues the queen, and kills Hæthcyn. Hygelac, Hæthcyn’s younger brother, arrives with reinforcements; Ongentheow is killed in savage combat with two of Hygelac’s men; and the Swedes are routed (lines 2479-89 and 2922-90). Phase 3: Eanmund and Eadgils, the sons of Ohthere (presumably dead), are driven into exile by their uncle Onela, who is now king of the Swedes. They are given refuge by Hygelac’s son Heardred, who has succeeded his father. Onela invades Geatland and kills Heardred; his retainer Weohstan kills Eanmund; and after the Swedes withdraw, Beowulf becomes king (lines 2204-8, which follow, and 2379-90). Phase 4: Eadgils, supported by Beowulf, invades Sweden and kills Onela (lines 2391-96).

a gem-studded goblet; it gained him nothing, though with a thief’s wiles he had outwitted the sleeping dragon. That drove him into rage, as the people of that country would soon discover.

The intruder who broached the dragon’s treasure and moved him to wrath had never meant to.
It was desperation on the part of a slave fleeing the heavy hand of some master, guilt-ridden and on the run, going to ground. But he soon began to shake with terror;
the wretch panicked and ran away with the precious metalwork. There were many other heirlooms heaped inside the earth-house, because long ago, with deliberate care, some forgotten person had deposited the whole rich inheritance of a highborn race in this ancient cache. Death had come and taken them all in times gone by and the only one left to tell their tale, the last of their line, could look forward to nothing but the same fate for himself; he foresaw that his joy in the treasure would be brief.

A newly constructed barrow stood waiting, on a wide headland close to the waves, its entryway secured.
Into it the keeper of the hoard had carried all the goods and golden ware worth preserving. His words were few:
“Now, earth, hold what earls once held and heroes can no more; it was mined from you first by honorable men. My own people have been ruined in war; one by one they went down to death, looked their last on sweet life in the hall. I am left with nobody to bear a sword or to burnish plated goblets, put a sheen on the cup. The companies have departed.

The hard helmet, hasped with gold, will be stripped of its hoops; and the helmet-shiner who should polish the metal of the war-mask sleeps; the coat of mail that came through all fights, through shield-collapse and cut of sword, decays with the warrior. Nor may webbed mail range far and wide on the warlord’s back beside his mustered troops. No trembling harp, no tuned timber, no tumbling hawk swerving through the hall, no swift horse pawing the courtyard. Pillage and slaughter have emptied the earth of entire peoples.”

8. Lines 2227—30 are so damaged that they defy guesswork to reconstruct them.
And so he mourned as he moved about the world, deserted and alone, lamenting his unhappiness day and night, until death’s flood

Then an old harrower of the dark happened to find the hoard open, the burning one who hunts out barrows, the slick-skinned dragon, threatening the night sky with streamers of fire. People on the farms are in dread of him. He is driven to hunt out hoards under ground, to guard heathen gold through age-long vigils, though to little avail. For three centuries, this scourge of the people had stood guard on that stoutly protected underground treasury, until the intruder unleashed its fury; he hurried to his lord with the gold-plated cup and made his plea to be reinstated. Then the vault was rifled, the ring-hoard robbed, and the wretched man had his request granted. His master gazed on that find from the past for the first time. When the dragon awoke, trouble flared again. He rippled down the rock, writhing with anger when he saw the footprints of the prowler who had stolen too close to his dreaming head. So may a man not marked by fate easily escape exile and woe by the grace of God.

The hoard-guardian scorched the ground as he scoured and hunted for the trespasser who had troubled his sleep. Hot and savage, he kept circling and circling the outside of the mound. No man appeared in that desert waste, but he worked himself up by imagining battle; then back in he’d go in search of the cup, only to discover signs that someone had stumbled upon the golden treasures. So the guardian of the mound, the hoard-watcher, waited for the gloaming with fierce impatience; his pent-up fury at the loss of the vessel made him long to hit back and lash out in flames. Then, to his delight, the day waned and he could wait no longer behind the wall, but hurtled forth in a fiery blaze. The first to suffer were the people on the land, but before long it was their treasure-giver who would come to grief. The dragon began to belch out flames and burn bright homesteads; there was a hot glow that scared everyone, for the vile sky-winger would leave nothing alive in his wake. Everywhere the havoc he wrought was in evidence. Far and near, the Geat nation bore the brunt of his brutal assaults and virulent hate. Then back to the hoard he would dart before daybreak, to hide in his den.
He had swunged the land, swathed it in flame, in fire and burning, and now he felt secure in the vaults of his barrow; but his trust was unavailing.
Then Beowulf was given bad news,
the hard truth: his own home,
the best of buildings, had been burned to a cinder, the throne-room of the Geats. It threw the hero into deep anguish and darkened his mood:
the wise man thought he must have thwarted ancient ordinance of the eternal Lord, broken His commandment. His mind was in turmoil, unaccustomed anxiety and gloom confused his brain; the fire-dragon had razed the coastal region and reduced forts and earthworks to dust and ashes,
so the war-king planned and plotted his revenge.
The warriors’ protector, prince of the hall-troop, ordered a marvelous all-iron shield from his smithy works. He well knew that linden boards would let him down and timber burn. After many trials, he was destined to face the end of his days,
in this mortal world, as was the dragon,
for all his long leasehold on the treasure.
Yet the prince of the rings was too proud to line up with a large army against the sky-plague. He had scant regard for the dragon as a threat, no dread at all of its courage or strength, for he had kept going often in the past, through perils and ordeals of every sort, after he had purged Hrothgar’s hall, triumphed in Heorot and beaten Grendel. He outgrappled the monster and his evil kin.

One of his cruelest hand-to-hand encounters had happened when Hygelac, king of the Geats, was killed in Friesland: the people’s friend and lord, Hrethel’s son, slaked a swordblade’s thirst for blood. But Beowulf’s prodigious gifts as a swimmer guaranteed his safety:
he arrived at the shore, shouldering thirty battle-dresses, the booty he had won.
There was little for the Hetware9 to be happy about as they shielded their faces and fighting on the ground began in earnest. With Beowulf against them, few could hope to return home.
Across the wide sea, desolate and alone,

9. A tribe of the Franks allied with the Frisians.
the son of Ecgtheow swam back to his people.
There Hygd offered him throne and authority as lord of the ring-hoard: with Hygelac dead, she had no belief in her son's ability to defend their homeland against foreign invaders.
Yet there was no way the weakened nation could get Beowulf to give in and agree to be elevated over Heordred as his lord or to undertake the office of kingship.
But he did provide support for the prince, honored and minded him until he matured as the ruler of Geatland.

Then over sea-roads exiles arrived, sons of Ohthere.\(^1\)
They had rebelled against the best of all the sea-kings in Sweden, the one who held sway in the Shylfing nation, their renowned prince, lord of the mead-hall. That marked the end for Hygelac's son: his hospitality was mortally rewarded with wounds from a sword. Heordred lay slaughtered and Onela returned to the land of Sweden, leaving Beowulf to ascend the throne, to sit in majesty and rule over the Geats. He was a good king.

In days to come, he contrived to avenge the fall of his prince; he befriended Eadgils when Eadgils was friendless, aiding his cause with weapons and warriors over the wide sea, sending him men. The feud was settled on a comfortless campaign when he killed Onela. And so the son of Ecgtheow had survived every extreme, excelling himself in daring and in danger, until the day arrived when he had to come face to face with the dragon.
The lord of the Geats took eleven comrades and went in a rage to reconnoiter.
By then he had discovered the cause of the affliction being visited on the people. The precious cup had come to him from the hand of the finder, the one who had started all this strife and was now added as a thirteenth to their number. They press-ganged and compelled this poor creature to be their guide. Against his will he led them to the earth-vault he alone knew, an underground barrow near the sea-billows and heaving waves, heaped inside with exquisite metalwork. The one who stood guard was dangerous and watchful, warden of the trove buried under earth: no easy bargain would be made in that place by any man.
The veteran king sat down on the cliff-top.

1. See p. 80, n. 6, Phases 3 and 4.
He wished good luck to the Geats who had shared his hearth and his gold. He was sad at heart, unsettled yet ready, sensing his death. His fate hovered near, unknowable but certain: it would soon claim his coffered soul, part life from limb. Before long the prince's spirit would spin free from his body.

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke:

"Many a skirmish I survived when I was young and many times of war: I remember them well. At seven, I was fostered out by my father, left in the charge of my people's lord. King Hrethel kept me and took care of me, was openhanded, behaved like a kinsman. While I was his ward, he treated me no worse as a wean\textsuperscript{2} about the place than one of his own boys, Herebeald and Haethcyn, or my own Hygelac. For the eldest, Herebeald, an unexpected deathbed was laid out, through a brother's doing, when Haethcyn bent his horn-tipped bow and loosed the arrow that destroyed his life. He shot wide and buried a shaft in the flesh and blood of his own brother. That offense was beyond redress, a wrongfooting of the heart's affections; for who could avenge the prince's life or pay his death-price? It was like the misery endured by an old man who has lived to see his son's body swing on the gallows. He begins to keen and weep for his boy, watching the raven gloat where he hangs: he can be of no help. The wisdom of age is worthless to him. Morning after morning, he wakes to remember that his child is gone; he has no interest in living on until another heir is born in the hall, now that his first-born has entered death's dominion forever. He gazes sorrowfully at his son's dwelling, the banquet hall bereft of all delight, the windswept hearthstone; the horsemen are sleeping, the warriors under ground; what was is no more. No tunes from the harp, no cheer raised in the yard. Alone with his longing, he lies down on his bed and sings a lament; everything seems too large, the steadings and the fields. Such was the feeling of loss endured by the lord of the Geats after Herebeald's death. He was helplessly placed to set to rights the wrong committed, could not punish the killer in accordance with the law of the blood-feud, although he felt no love for him.

\textsuperscript{2} A young child [Northern Ireland; Translator's note].
Heartsore, wearied, he turned away from life’s joys, chose God’s light and departed, leaving buildings and lands to his sons, as a man of substance will.

"Then over the wide sea Swedes and Geats battled and feuded and fought without quarter.
Hostilities broke out when Hrethel died."

Ongentheow’s sons were unrelenting, refusing to make peace, campaigning violently from coast to coast, constantly setting up terrible ambushes around Hreosnahill.
My own kith and kin avenged
these evil events, as everybody knows, but the price was high: one of them paid with his life. Haethcyn, lord of the Geats, met his fate there and fell in the battle.
Then, as I have heard, Hygelac’s sword was raised in the morning against Ongentheow, his brother’s killer. When Eofor cleft
the old Swede’s helmet, halved it open,
he fell, death-pale: his feud-calloused hand could not stave off the fatal stroke.

"The treasures that Hygelac lavished on me
I paid for when I fought, as fortune allowed me, with my glittering sword. He gave me land and the security land brings, so he had no call to go looking for some lesser champion, some mercenary from among the Gifthas or the Spear-Danes or the men of Sweden.
I marched ahead of him, always there at the front of the line; and I shall fight like that for as long as I live, as long as this sword shall last, which has stood me in good stead late and soon, ever since I killed
Dayraven the Frank in front of the two armies.
He brought back no looted breastplate to the Frisian king but fell in battle, their standard-bearer, highborn and brave.
No sword blade sent him to his death:
my bare hands stilled his heartbeats and wrecked the bone-house. Now blade and hand, sword and sword-stroke, will assay the hoard."

Beowulf spoke, made a formal boast for the last time: "I risked my life often when I was young. Now I am old, but as king of the people I shall pursue this fight for the glory of winning, if the evil one will only abandon his earth-fort and face me in the open."

1. See p. 80, n. 6, Phases 3 and 4.
Then he addressed each dear companion
one final time, those fighters in their helmets, resolute and highborn: "I would rather not use a weapon if I knew another way to grapple with the dragon and make good my boast as I did against Grendel in days gone by.
But I shall be meeting molten venom in the fire he breathes, so I go forth in mail-shirt and shield. I won't shift a foot when I meet the cave-guard: what occurs on the wall between the two of us will turn out as fate, overseer of men, decides. I am resolved.
I scorn further words against this sky-born foe.
"Men-at-arms, remain here on the barrow, safe in your armor, to see which one of us is better in the end at bearing wounds in a deadly fray. This fight is not yours, nor is it up to any man except me to measure his strength against the monster or to prove his worth. I shall win the gold by my courage, or else mortal combat, doom of battle, will bear your lord away."
Then he drew himself up beside his shield.
The fabled warrior in his war-shirt and helmet trusted in his own strength entirely and went under the crag. No coward path.
Hard by the rock-face that hale veteran, who had gone repeatedly into combat and danger and come through, saw a stone arch and a gushing stream that burst from the barrow, blazing and wafting a deadly heat. It would be hard to survive unscathed near the hoard, to hold firm against the dragon in those flaming depths.
Then he gave a shout. The lord of the Geats unburdened his breast and broke out in a storm of anger. Under gray stone his voice challenged and resounded clearly.
Hate was ignited. The hoard-guard recognized a human voice, the time was over for peace and parleying. Pouring forth in a hot battle-fume, the breath of the monster burst from the rock. There was a rumble under ground.
Down there in the barrow, Beowulf the warrior lifted his shield: the outlandish thing writhed and convulsed and viciously turned on the king, whose keen-edged sword, an heirloom inherited by ancient right,
was already in his hand. Roused to a fury, each antagonist struck terror in the other.
Unyielding, the lord of his people loomed by his tall shield, sure of his ground, while the serpent looped and unleashed itself.
Swaddled in flames, it came gliding and flexing and racing toward its fate. Yet his shield defended the renowned leader's life and limb for a shorter time than he meant it to:
that final day was the first time when Beowulf fought and fate denied him glory in battle. So the king of the Geats raised his hand and struck hard at the enameled scales, but scarcely cut through:
the blade flashed and slashed yet the blow was far less powerful than the hard-pressed king had need of at that moment. The mound-keeper went into a spasm and spouted deadly flames:
when he felt the stroke, battle-fire billowed and spewed. Beowulf was foiled of a glorious victory. The glittering sword, infallible before that day,
failed when he unsheathed it, as it never should have.
For the son of Ecgtheow, it was no easy thing to have to give ground like that and go unwillingly to inhabit another home in a place beyond; so every man must yield the leasehold of his days.

Before long
the fierce contenders clashed again.
The hoard-guard took heart, inhaled and swelled up and got a new wind; he who had once ruled was furled in fire and had to face the worst.
No help or backing was to be had then from his highborn comrades; that hand-picked troop broke ranks and ran for their lives to the safety of the wood. But within one heart sorrow welled up: in a man of worth the claims of kinship cannot be denied.
His name was Wiglaf, a son of Weohstan's, a well-regarded Shylfing warrior related to Aelfhere. When he saw his lord tormented by the heat of his scalding helmet, he remembered the bountiful gifts bestowed on him,
how well he lived among the Waegmundings, the freehold he inherited from his father before him.
He could not hold back: one hand brandished
the yellow-timbered shield, the other drew his sword—an ancient blade that was said to have belonged to Eanmund, the son of Othhere, the one Weohstan had slain when he was an exile without friends.
He carried the arms to the victim's kinsfolk,

4. Although Wiglaf is here said to be a Shylfing (i.e., a Swede), in line 2607 we are told his family are Waegmundings, a clan of the Geats, which is also Beowulf's family. It was possible for a family to owe allegiance to more than one nation and to shift sides as a result of feuds. Nothing is known of Aelfhere.

5. I.e., Weohstan, who, as explained below, was the slayer of Onela's nephew Eanmund. Possibly, Weohstan joined the Geats under Beowulf after Eanmund's brother, with Beowulf's help, avenged Eanmund's death on Onela and became king of the Shylfings. See p. 80, n. 6, Phase 2.
2615 the burnished helmet, the webbed chain-mail and that relic of the giants. But Onela returned the weapons to him, rewarded Weohstan with Eanmund's war-gear. He ignored the blood-feud, the fact that Eanmund was his brother's son. 6 2620 Weohstan kept that war-gear for a lifetime, the sword and the mail-shirt, until it was the son's turn to follow his father and perform his part.
Then, in old age, at the end of his days
among the Weather-Geats, he bequeathed to Wiglaf 2625 innumerable weapons.

And now the youth
was to enter the line of battle with his lord,
his first time to be tested as a fighter.
His spirit did not break and the ancestral blade would keep its edge, as the dragon discovered 2630 as soon as they came together in the combat.
Sad at heart, addressing his companions,
Wiglaf spoke wise and fluent words:
"I remember that time when mead was flowing,
how we pledged loyalty to our lord in the hall, 2635 promised our ring-giver we would be worth our price, make good the gift of the war-gear, those swords and helmets, as and when his need required it. He picked us out from the army deliberately, honored us and judged us 2640 fit for this action, made me these lavish gifts—and all because he considered us the best of his arms-bearing thanes. And now, although he wanted this challenge to be one he'd face by himself alone—the shepherd of our land, 2645 a man unequaled in the quest for glory and a name for daring—now the day has come when this lord we serve needs sound men to give him their support. Let us go to him, help our leader through the hot flame
2650 and dread of the fire. As God is my witness,
I would rather my body were robed in the same burning blaze as my gold-giver's body than go back home bearing arms.
That is unthinkable, unless we have first 2655 slain the foe and defended the life of the prince of the Weather-Geats. I well know the things he has done for us deserve better.
Should he alone be left exposed to fall in battle? We must bond together, 2660 shield and helmet, mail-shirt and sword."

Then he waded the dangerous reek and went under arms to his lord, saying only:
"Go on, dear Beowulf, do everything

6. An ironic comment: since Onela wanted to kill Eanmund, he rewarded Weohstan for killing his nephew instead of exacting compensation or revenge.
you said you would when you were still young and vowed you would never let your name and fame be dimmed while you lived. Your deeds are famous, so stay resolute, my lord, defend your life now with the whole of your strength. I shall stand by you.'

After those words, a wildness rose in the dragon again and drove it to attack, heaving up fire, hunting for enemies,
the humans it loathed. Flames lapped the shield, charred it to the boss, and the body armor
on the young warrior was useless to him.
But Wiglaf did well under the wide rim
Beowulf shared with him once his own had shattered in sparks and ashes.

Inspired again
by the thought of glory, the war-king threw his whole strength behind a sword stroke and connected with the skull. And Naegling snapped.
Beowulf's ancient iron-gray sword let him down in the fight. It was never his fortune to be helped in combat by the cutting edge of weapons made of iron. When he wielded a sword, no matter how blooded and hard-edged the blade,
his hand was too strong, the stroke he dealt
(I have heard) would ruin it. He could reap no advantage.
Then the bane of that people, the fire-breathing dragon, was mad to attack for a third time.

When a chance came, he caught the hero in a rush of flame and clamped sharp fangs into his neck. Beowulf's body ran wet with his life-blood: it came welling out.
Next thing, they say, the noble son of Weohstan saw the king in danger at his side and displayed his inborn bravery and strength.
He left the head alone,' but his fighting hand was burned when he came to his kinsman's aid.
He lunged at the enemy lower down so that his decorated sword sank into its belly and the flames grew weaker.

Once again the king gathered his strength and drew a stabbing knife
he carried on his belt, sharpened for battle.
He stuck it deep in the dragon's flank.
Beowulf dealt it a deadly wound.
They had killed the enemy, courage quelled his life;
that pair of kinsmen, partners in nobility, had destroyed the foe. So every man should act, be at hand when needed; but now, for the king,
this would be the last of his many labors and triumphs in the world.

Then the wound

7. I.e., he avoided the dragon's flame-breathing head.
dealt by the ground-burner earlier began to scald and swell; Beowulf discovered deadly poison suppurating inside him,

2715 surges of nausea, and so, in his wisdom, the prince realized his state and struggled toward a seat on the rampart. He steadied his gaze on those gigantic stones, saw how the earthwork was braced with arches built over columns.

2720 And now that thane unequaled for goodness with his own hands washed his lord’s wounds, swabbed the weary prince with water,
bathed him clean, unbuckled his helmet.

Beowulf spoke: in spite of his wounds, mortal wounds, he still spoke for he well knew his days in the world had been lived out to the end—his allotted time was drawing to a close, death was very near.

2725 “Now is the time when I would have wanted to bestow this armor on my own son, had it been my fortune to have fathered an heir and live on in his flesh. For fifty years
I ruled this nation. No king of any neighboring clan would dare face me with troops, none had the power to intimidate me. I took what came, cared for and stood by things in my keeping, ever fomented quarrels, never swore to a lie. Ail this consoles me, doomed as I am and sickening for death;
because of my right ways, the Ruler of mankind need never blame me when the breath leaves my body for murder of kinsmen. Go now quickly, dearlest Wiglaf, under the gray stone
where the dragon is laid out, lost to his treasure;
hurry to feast your eyes on the hoard.
Away you go: I want to examine that ancient gold, gaze my fill on those garnered jewels; my going will be easier for having seen the treasure, a less troubled letting-go of the life and lordship I have long maintained.”

And so, I have heard, the son of Weohstan quickly obeyed the command of his languishing war-weary lord; he went in his chain-mail under the rock-piled roof of the barrow, exulting in his triumph, and saw beyond the seat
a treasure-trove of astonishing richness, wall-hangings that were a wonder to behold,
glimmering gold spread across the ground,

2750 the old dawn-scorching serpent’s den packed with goblets and vessels from the past, tarnished and corroding. Rusty helmets all eaten away. Armbands everywhere, artfully wrought. How easily treasure buried in the ground, gold hidden however skillfully, can escape from any man!
And he saw too a standard, entirely of gold,
hanging high over the hoard,
a masterpiece of filigree; it glowed with light
so he could make out the ground at his feet and inspect the valuables. Of the dragon there was no remaining sign: the sword had dispatched him.
Then, the story goes, a certain man plundered the hoard in that immemorial howe, filled his arms with flagons and plates, anything he wanted; and took the standard also,
most brilliant of banners.

Already the blade
of the old king's sharp killing-sword had done its worst: the one who had for long minded the hoard, hovering over gold, unleashing fire, surging forth midnight after midnight, had been mown down.
Wiglaf went quickly, keen to get back, excited by the treasure. Anxiety weighed on his brave heart—he was hoping he would find and found his lord bleeding profusely, his life at an end; again he began to swab his body. The beginnings of an utterance broke out from the king's breast-cage.
The old lord gazed sadly at the gold.
"To the everlasting Lord of all,
to the King of Glory, I give thanks that I behold this treasure here in front of me, that I have been allowed to leave my people
so well endowed on the day I die.
Now that I have bartered my last breath to own this fortune, it is up to you to look after their needs. I can hold out no longer.
Order my troop to construct a barrow on a headland on the coast, after my pyre has cooled.
It will loom on the horizon at Hronesness and be a reminder among my people—so that in coming times crews under sail will call it Beowulf's Barrow, as they steer ships across the wide and shrouded waters."
Then the king in his great-heartedness unclasped
the collar of gold from his neck and gave it to the young thane, telling him to use it and the war-shirt and gilded helmet well.
"You are the last of us, the only one left of the Waegmundings. Fate swept us away,

8. A headland by the sea. The name means "Whalesness."
sent my whole brave hightborn clan to their final doom. Now I must follow them.'
That was the warrior's last word.
He had no more to confide. The furious heat of the pyre would assail him. His soul fled from his breast to its destined place among the steadfast ones.

[BEOWULF'S FUNERAL]

It was hard then on the young hero, having to watch the one he held so dear there on the ground, going through his death agony. The dragon from underearth, his nightmarish destroyer, lay destroyed as well, utterly without life. No longer would his snakefolds ply themselves to safeguard hidden gold.
Hard-edged blades, hammered out and keenly filed, had finished him so that the sky-roamer lay there rigid, brought low beside the treasure-lodge.
   Never again would he glitter and glide and show himself off in midnight air, exulting in his riches: he fell to earth
through the battle-strength in Beowulf's arm.
   There were few, indeed, as far as I have heard, big and brave as they may have been,
few who would have held out if they had had to face the outpourings of that poison-breather or gone foraging on the ring-hall floor and found the deep barrow-dweller on guard and awake.

   The treasure had been won,
bought and paid for by Beowulf's death.
Both had reached the end of the road through the life they had been lent.

   Before long
the battle-dodgers abandoned the wood,
the ones who had let down their lord earlier,
the tail-turners, ten of them together.
When he needed them most, they had made off.

   Now they were ashamed and came behind shields,
in their battle-outfits, to where the old man lay.
   They watched Wiglaf, sitting worn out,
a comrade shoulder to shoulder with his lord, trying in vain to bring him round with water.

   Much as he wanted to, there was no way
he could preserve his lord's life on earth or alter in the least the Almighty's will.
What God judged right would rule what happened to every man, as it does to this day.

   Then a stern rebuke was bound to come from the young warrior to the ones who had been cowards.
   Wiglaf, son of Weohstan, spoke disdainfully and in disappointment:

Anyone ready to admit the truth will surely realize that the lord of men who showered you with gifts and gave you the armor you are standing in—when he would distribute helmets and mail-shirts to men on the mead-benches, a prince treating his thanes in hall to the best he could find, far or near—was throwing weapons uselessly away.

It would be a sad waste when the war broke out.
Beowulf had little cause to brag about his armed guard; yet God who ordains who wins or loses allowed him to strike with his own blade when bravery was needed.
There was little I could do to protect his life in the heat of the fray, but I found new strength welling up when I went to help him.

Then my sword connected and the deadly assaults of our foe grew weaker, the fire coursed less strongly from his head. But when the worst happened too few rallied around the prince.

"So it is good-bye now to all you know and love on your home ground, the open-handedness, the giving of war-swords. Every one of you with freeholds of land, our whole nation, will be dispossessed, once princes from beyond get tidings of how you turned and fled and disgraced yourselves. A warrior will sooner die than live a life of shame."

Then he ordered the outcome of the fight to be reported to those camped on the ridge, that crowd of retainers who had sat all morning, sad at heart, shield-bearers wondering about the man they loved: would this day be his last or would he return? He told the truth and did not balk, the rider who bore news to the cliff-top. He addressed them all:

"Now the people's pride and love,
the lord of the Geats, is laid on his deathbed, brought down by the dragon's attack.
Beside him lies the bane of his life, dead from knife-wounds. There was no way

Beowulf could manage to get the better of the monster with his sword. Wiglaf sits at Beowulf's side, the son of Weohstan, the living warrior watching by the dead, keeping weary vigil, holding a wake for the loved and the loathed.

Now war is looming
over our nation, soon it will be known to Franks and Frisians, far and wide, that the king is gone. Hostility has been great among the Franks since Hygelac sailed forth at the head of a war-fleet into Friesland: there the Hetware harried and attacked and overwhelmed him with great odds. The leader in his war-gear was laid low, fell among followers: that lord did not favor his company with spoils. The Merovingian king has been an enemy to us ever since.

“Nor do I expect peace or pact-keeping of any sort from the Swedes. Remember: at Ravenswood, Ongentheow slaughtered Haethcyn, Hrethel’s son, when the Geat people in their arrogance first attacked the fierce Shylfings. The return blow was quickly struck by Othhere’s father. Old and terrible, he felled the sea-king and saved his own aged wife, the mother of Onela and of Othhere, bereft of her gold rings. Then he kept hard on the heels of the foe and drove them, leaderless, lucky to get away in a desperate rout into Ravenswood. His army surrounded the weary remnant where they nursed their wounds; all through the night he howled threats at those huddled survivors, promised to axe their bodies open when dawn broke, dangle them from gallows to feed the birds. But at first light when their spirits were lowest, relief arrived. They heard the sound of Hygelac’s horn, his trumpet calling as he came to find them, the hero in pursuit, at hand with troops. “The bloody swathe that Swedes and Geats cut through each other was everywhere. No one could miss their murderous feuding. Then the old man made his move, pulled back, barred his people in: Ongentheow withdrew to higher ground. Hygelac’s pride and prowess as a fighter were known to the earl; he had no confidence that he could hold out against that horde of seamen, defend his wife and the ones he loved from the shock of the attack. He retreated for shelter behind the earthwall. Then Hygelac swooped on the Swedes at bay, his banners swarmed into their refuge, his Geat forces drove forward to destroy the camp. There in his gray hairs, Ongentheow was cornered, ringed around with swords. And it came to pass that the king’s fate was in Eofor's hands, and in his alone.

Wulf, son of Wonred, went for him in anger, split him open so that blood came spurting from under his hair. The old hero still did not flinch, but parried fast, hit back with a harder stroke:

the king turned and took him on. Then Wonred's son, the brave Wulf, could land no blow against the aged lord. Ongentheow divided his helmet so that he buckled and bowed his bloodied head and dropped to the ground. But his doom held off.

"With his brother down, the undaunted Eofor, Hygelac's thane, hefted his sword and smashed murderously at the massive helmet past the lifted shield. And the king collapsed, the shepherd of people was sheared of life. Many then hurried to help Wulf, bandaged and lifted him, now that they were left masters of the blood-soaked battle-ground.

One warrior stripped the other, looted Ongentheow's iron mail-coat, his hard sword-hilt, his helmet too, and carried the graith to King Hygelac, he accepted the prize, promised fairly that reward would come, and kept his word. For their bravery in action, when they arrived home, Eofor and Wulf were overloaded by Hrethel's son, Hygelac the Geat, with gifts of land and linked rings that were worth a fortune. They had won glory, so there was no gainsaying his generosity. And he gave Eofor his only daughter to bide at home with him, an honor and a bond.

"So this bad blood between us and the Swedes, this vicious feud, I am convinced, is bound to revive; they will cross our borders and attack in force when they find out that Beowulf is dead. In days gone by when our warriors fell and we were undefended, he kept our coffers and our kingdom safe. He worked for the people, but as well as that he behaved like a hero.

We must hurry now to take a last look at the king and launch him, lord and lavisher of rings, on the funeral road. His royal pyre will melt no small amount of gold:

2. i.e., he was at Eofor's mercy. Eofor's slaying of Ongentheow was described in lines 2486—89, where no mention is made of his brother Wulf's part in the battle. They are the sons of Wonred. Eofor means boar; Wulf is the Old English spelling of wolf.

3. Possessions, apparel.
heaped there in a hoard, it was bought at heavy cost,
and that pile of rings he paid for at the end with his own life will go up with the flame, be furred in fire: treasure no follower will wear in his memory, nor lovely woman link and attach as a torque around her neck—but often, repeatedly, in the path of exile
they shall walk bereft, bowed under woe,
now that their leader’s laugh is silenced, high spirits quenched. Many a spear dawn-cold to the touch will be taken down and waved on high; the swept harp won’t waken warriors, but the raven winging darkly over the doomed will have news, tidings for the eagle of how he hoked and ate,
how the wolf and he made short work of the dead.”
Such was the drift of the dire report that gallant man delivered. He got little wrong in what he told and predicted.

The whole troop
rose in tears, then took their way to the uncanny scene under Earnaness.
There, on the sand, where his soul had left him,
they found him at rest, their ring-giver from days gone by. The great man had breathed his last. Beowulf the king had indeed met with a marvelous death.
But what they saw first was far stranger:
the serpent on the ground, gruesome and vile, lying facing him. The fire-dragon was scaresomely burned, scorched all colors.
From head to tail, his entire length was fifty feet. He had shimmered forth on the night air once, then winged back down to his den; but death owned him now,
he would never enter his earth-gallery again.
Beside him stood pitchers and piled-up dishes, silent flagons, precious swords eaten through with rust, ranged as they had been while they waited their thousand winters under ground.
That huge cache, gold inherited from an ancient race, was under a spell—which meant no one was ever permitted to enter the ring-hall unless God Himself, mankind’s Keeper, True King of Triumphs, allowed some person pleasing to Him—and in His eyes worthy—to open the hoard.
What came about brought to nothing
the hopes of the one who had wrongly hidden riches under the rock-face. First the dragon slew that man among men, who in turn made fierce amends and settled the feud. Famous for his deeds a warrior may be, but it remains a mystery where his life will end, when he may no longer dwell in the mead-hall among his own.

So it was with Beowulf, when he faced the cruelty and cunning of the mound-guard. He himself was ignorant of how his departure from the world would happen.
The highborn chiefs who had buried the treasure declared it until doomsday so accursed that whoever robbed it would be guilty of wrong and grimly punished for their transgression, hasped in hell-bonds in heathen shrines.
Yet Beowulf's gaze at the gold treasure
when he first saw it had not been selfish.
Wiglaf, son of Weohstan, spoke:
"Often when one man follows his own will many are hurt. This happened to us.
Nothing we advised could ever convince the prince we loved, our land's guardian, not to vex the custodian of the gold,
let him lie where he was long accustomed,
lurk there under earth until the end of the world.
He held to his high destiny. The hoard is laid bare, but at a grave cost; it was too cruel a fate that forced the king to that encounter.
I have been inside and seen everything amassed in the vault. I managed to enter although no great welcome awaited me under the earthwall. I quickly gathered up a huge pile of the priceless treasures handpicked from the hoard and carried them here where the king could see them. He was still himself, alive, aware, and in spite of his weakness
he had many requests. He wanted me to greet you and order the building of a barrow that would crown
the site of his pyre, serve as his memorial, in a commanding position, since of all men to have lived and thrived and lorded it on earth his worth and due as a warrior were the greatest.
Now let us again go quickly and feast our eyes on that amazing fortune heaped under the wall. I will show the way and take you close to those coffers packed with rings and bars of gold. Let a bier be made and got ready quickly when we come out and then let us bring the body of our lord, the man we loved, to where he will lodge for a long time in the care of the Almighty."

Then Weohstan's son, stalwart to the end, had orders given to owners of dwellings,
many people of importance in the land,
to fetch wood from far and wide
for the good man’s pyre:

“Now shall flame consume
our leader in battle, the blaze darken round him who stood his ground in the steel-hail,
when the arrow-storm shot from bowstrings pelted the shield-wall. The shaft hit home.
Feather-fledged, it finned the barb in flight.”

Next the wise son of Weohstan called from among the king’s thanes a group of seven: he selected the best and entered with them, the eighth of their number, under the God-cursed roof; one raised a lighted torch and led the way.
No lots were cast for who should loot the hoard for it was obvious to them that every bit of it lay unprotected within the vault, there for the taking. It was no trouble to hurry to work and haul out the priceless store. They pitched the dragon over the cliff-top, let tide’s flow and backwash take the treasure-minder.
Then coiled gold was loaded on a cart in great abundance, and the gray-haired leader,
the prince on his bier, borne to Hronesness.
The Geat people built a pyre for Beowulf, stacked and decked it until it stood foursquare, hung with helmets, heavy war-shields and shining armor, just as he had ordered.
Then his warriors laid him in the middle of it,
mourning a lord far-famed and beloved.
On a height they kindled the hugest of all funeral fires; fumes of woodsmoke billed darkly up, the blaze roared and drowned out their weeping, wind died down and flames wrought havoc in the hot bone-house, burning it to the core. They were disconsolate and wailed aloud for their lord’s decease.

A Geat woman too sang out in grief;
with hair bound up, she unburdened herself of her worst fears, a wild litany of nightmare and lament: her nation invaded, enemies on the rampage, bodies in piles, slavery and abasement. Heaven swallowed the smoke.

Then the Geat people began to construct a mound on a headland, high and imposing,
a marker that sailors could see from far away,
and in ten days they had done the work.

It was their hero’s memorial; what remained from the fire they housed inside it, behind a wall
as worthy of him as their workmanship could make it.
And they buried torques in the barrow, and jewels and a trove of such things as trespassing men

Biblical narrative inspired Anglo-Saxon poetry from its earliest recorded beginnings: the poet Caedmon (p. 24) is said, for example, to have composed poetry on biblical subjects from Genesis to the Last Judgment. Although those texts do not survive, up to one third of surviving Anglo-Saxon poetic texts are translations of biblical material. Prose writers also produced ambitious biblical translations: at the end of the tenth century, Ælfric, Abbot of Eynsham (died ca. 1010), made partial translations of many texts that he worked into sermon material; an Anglo-Saxon version of the Pentateuch (the first five books of the Old Testament) was compiled at about the same time. The prose translations are more or less faithful to the biblical text. The poetic translations, on the other hand, are much freer: they take liberties with the narrative and style of the biblical sources, reshaping narratives and placing the stories within a recognizably Germanic cultural setting.

One of the biblical books from which Ælfric drew material was the Book of Judith. This book was regarded as apocryphal (i.e., not authentically a part of the Old Testament) by Protestant churches from the sixteenth century, but for all pre- and post-Reformation Catholic readers it was an authentic part of the Hebrew Bible. The narrative recounts the campaign of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar to punish many subject peoples who had refused to join him in his successful war against Media (another ancient empire). Nebuchadnezzar's general Holofernes plunders and razes many cities that resist his army, and others capitulate to him. He lays siege to the strategic Israelite town of Bethulia, which blocks his route to Jerusalem (Bethulia no longer exists, and its location in biblical times is uncertain). The leaders of the suffering and thirsty population of Bethulia are almost ready to surrender, but the pious, wealthy, and beautiful widow Judith rebukes them for their faintness of heart and promises to liberate them if they will hold out a few days longer. After praying to God in sackcloth and ashes, Judith dresses and adorns herself sumptuously. With only one servant she enters the enemy camp, where all, and especially Holofernes himself, are amazed at her beauty. She pretends to be fleeing a doomed people and persuades Holofernes that she will lead him to victory over all the Israelite cities. The Old English text begins four days after Judith's arrival, with Holofernes's invitation to his principal warriors to a banquet, after which he plans to go to bed with the beautiful Israelite. Judith, however, has other plans.

The poet of Judith translated from the Latin text of the Bible (the so-called 'Vulgate' Bible, produced in the late fourth century). We do not know the date for this rendering of the Book of Judith into Anglo-Saxon poetry, but it was probably composed sometime in the tenth century (the one surviving text appears in the same late tenth-century manuscript that contains Beowulf). Neither do we know the motives for this translation. Elfric, writing in the late tenth century, made his translation of Judith to encourage the Anglo-Saxons in defense of their territory against the invading Vikings. The text is, he says, 'set down in our manner in English, as an example to you people that you should defend your land with weapons against the invading army."

The opening of the poem is lost (scholars estimate that some one hundred lines are missing), but from the remainder we can see that the poet has freely reshaped the biblical source and set the narrative within terms intelligible to an Anglo-Saxon audience. The poet has stripped the geographical, historical, and political complexity of the story down to its bare essentials: the confrontation between Judith and Holofernes. Judith is the leader of an embattled people up against an exultant and terrifying enemy. Her only resources are her unfailing courage, her wits, and her faith in God. Within this concentrated narrative, the poet colors certain episodes by employing the traditional language and formulas of Anglo-Saxon poetry. Holofernes, for example, becomes riotous at the feast; "the beasts of battle" anticipate and enjoy their feast (cf. Beowulf, lines 3023—27); Judith is rewarded with Holofernes's battle gear, not with his household treasures as in the biblical narrative. Perhaps the most penetrating touch added by the Anglo-Saxon poet is the account of the net surrounding Holofernes's bed, from which he can see out but cannot be seen inside. This technology of tyrannical power undermines Holofernes's army in the end, since his men, waiting nervously around his bed because they are afraid to wake up their leader, lose precious time under attack from the Israelites.

Like the Abbess Hilda (see p. 25), Judith is one of the women of power in Anglo-Saxon history and literature. Another is St. Helen, the mother of the emperor Constantine the Great: in the poem Elene she leads a Roman army to the Holy Land to discover the cross on which Christ was crucified.

Judith

... She doubted

gifts in this wide earth; there she readily found protection from the glorious Lord, when she had most need of favour from the highest Judge, so that he, the Lord of creation, defended her against the greatest terror. The glorious Father in the skies granted her request, since she always possessed true faith in the Almighty. I have heard then that Holofernes eagerly issued invitations to a feast and provided all types of magnificent wonders for the banquets; to it the lord of men summoned

the most experienced retainers. The warriors obeyed with great haste; they came to the powerful lord and proceeded to the leader of people. That was the fourth day after Judith, prudent in mind, this woman of elfin beauty first visited him.

They went into the feast to sit down, proud men at the wine-drinking, bold mail-coated warriors, all his companions in misfortune. There, along the benches, deep bowls were carried frequently; full cups and pitchers were also carried to the sitters in the hall. They received those, doomed to die, brave warriors, though the powerful man did not expect it, that terrible lord of heroes. Then Holofernes, the gold-giving friend of his men, became joyous from the drinking. He laughed and grew vociferous, roared and clamoured, so that the children of men could hear from far away, how the fierce one stormed and yelled; arrogant and excited by mead, he frequently admonished the guests that they enjoy themselves well. So, for the entire day, the wicked one, the stern dispenser of treasures, drenched his retainers with wine until they lay unconscious, the whole of his troop were as drunk as if they had been struck down in death, drained of every ability. So, the men's lord commanded the guests to be served, until the dark night approached the children of men. Then corrupted by evil, he commanded that the blessed maiden should be hastily fetched to his bed, adorned with bracelets, decorated with rings. The retainers quickly did as their lord, the ruler of warriors, commanded them. They stepped into the tumult of the guest-hall where they found the wise Judith, and then quickly the warriors began to lead the illustrious maiden to the lofty tent, where the powerful man Holofernes, hateful to the Saviour, rested himself during the night.

There was a beautiful all-golden fly-net that the commander had hung around the bed, so that the wicked one, the lord of warriors, could look through on each of those sons of men who came in there, but not one of the race of mankind could look on him, unless, brave man, he commanded one of his very iniquitous men to come nearer to him for secret consultation. They quickly brought to bed the prudent woman. Then the resolute heroes went to inform their lord that the holy maiden had been brought into his tent. Then the notorious one, that lord of cities, became happy in his mind: he intended to violate the bright woman with defilement and with sin. The Judge of glory, the majestic Guardian, the Lord, Ruler of hosts, would not consent to that,

but he prevented him from that thing. Then the diabolical one,
the wanton and wicked man, departed with a troop of his men to find his bed, where he would lose his life forthwith within that one night. He had attained his violent end on earth, just as he had previously deserved, this severe lord of men, since he had dwelled under the roof of clouds in this world. The mighty man then fell into the middle of his bed, so drunk with wine that he possessed no sense in his mind. The warriors stepped out from that place with great haste, men sated with wine, who led the traitor, that hateful tyrant, to bed for the last time. Then the Saviour's glorious handmaiden was very mindful of how she could deprive the terrible one of life most easily, before the impure and foul one awoke. Then the Creator's maiden, with her braided locks, took a sharp sword,
a hard weapon in the storms of battle, and drew it from the sheath with her right hand. She began to call the Guardian of heaven by name, the Saviour of all the inhabitants of earth, and said these words:
"God of creation, Spirit of comfort,
Son of the Almighty, I want to beseech you for your mercy on me in my time of need, glorious Trinity. My heart is intensely inflamed within me now, and my mind is troubled, greatly afflicted with sorrows. Give me, Lord of heaven, victory and true belief so I might cut down this bestower of torment with this sword. Grant me my salvation, mighty Lord of men: I have never had more need of your mercy than now. Avenge now, mighty Lord, eminent Bestower of glory, that which is so grievous in my mind, so fervent in my heart." Then the highest Judge inspired her immediately with great zeal, as he does to each of the dwellers on earth who seek help from him with reason and with true faith. Then she felt relief in her mind, hope was renewed for the holy woman. She seized the heathen man securely by his hair, pulled him shamefully towards her with her hands, and skilfully placed the wicked and loathsome man so that she could most easily manage the miserable one well. Then, the woman with braided locks struck the enemy, that hostile one, with the shining sword, so that she cut through half of his neck, such that he lay unconscious, drunk and wounded. He was not dead yet, not entirely lifeless. The courageous woman struck the heathen hound energetically no another time so that his head rolled forwards on the floor. The foul body lay behind, dead; the spirit departed elsewhere under the deep earth and was oppressed there and fettered in torment forever after, wound round with serpents, bound with punishments, cruelly imprisoned in hell-fire after his departure. Enveloped in darkness, he had no need at all to hope that he should get out from that serpent-hall, but there he must remain always and forever, henceforth without end, in that dark home deprived of the joy of hope. Judith had won illustrious glory in the battle as God, the Lord of heaven, granted it so when he gave her her victory. Then the prudent woman immediately placed the warrior's head still bloody into the sack in which her attendant, a woman of pale complexion, an excellent handmaiden, had brought food for them both; and then Judith put it, all gory, into the hands of her thoughtful servant to carry home. Then both the courageous women went from there straightaway, until the triumphant women, elated, got away from that army so that they could clearly see the beautiful city walls of Bethulia glitter. Then, ring-adorned, they hurried forwards along the path until, glad at heart, they had reached the rampart gate. Warriors were sitting, men watching, and keeping guard in that stronghold, just as Judith the wise maiden had asked, when she had previously departed from the sorrowful people, the courageous woman. The beloved woman had returned again to the people, and the prudent woman soon asked one of the men from the spacious city to come towards her, and hastily to let them in through the gate of the city-wall; and she spoke these words to the victorious people: 'I am able to tell you a memorable thing so that you need no longer mourn in your minds. The Ruler, the Glory of kings, is well disposed towards you. It had become revealed throughout this wide world that glorious and triumphant success is approaching and that honour has been granted by fate to you because of the afflictions that you have long suffered.'

Then the city-dwellers were joyful when they heard how the holy one spoke over the high city-wall. The army was joyous and people hurried to the fortress gate, men and women, in multitudes and crowds, groups and troops pressed forward and ran towards the Lord's maiden in their thousands, old and young. The mind of each one of the people in that rejoicing city was gladdened when they perceived that Judith had returned to her native land; and then hastily and reverently, they let her in.

Then the prudent woman, adorned with gold, asked her attentive handmaiden to uncover the warrior's head and to display it, bloodied, as proof to the citizens of how she had been helped in battle.

Then the noble woman spoke to all the people:
"Victorious heroes, here you can gaze clearly on the leader of the people, on this head of the most hateful of heathen warriors, who, among men, inflicted on us the worst torments, grievous afflictions, and wished to add to these even more; but God would not grant him a longer life so that he could plague us with wrongs. I deprived him of life through God's help. Now I intend to ask each of the men of these citizens, each of the warriors, that you immediately
hasten to battle, as soon as the God of creation, that glorious King, sends his radiant beam of light from the east. Go forward carrying shields, shields in front of your breasts and corslets,
gleaming helmets, into the troop of enemies;
fell the commanders, those leaders doomed to die with shining swords. Your enemies are condemned to death, and you will possess glory, honour in conflict, just as mighty God has given you that sign by my hand."

Then a host of brave and keen men prepared quickly for the battle. Noble warriors and retainers stepped out; they carried triumphant banners; heroes in helmets went forward to battle straightaway from that holy city at dawn of that same day. Shields clashed, resounded loudly. The lean wolf rejoiced in the forest, as did the dark raven, a bloodthirsty bird: they both knew that the warriors intended to provide them with a feast from those doomed to die; but behind them flew the eagle eager for food, dewy-winged with dark plumage; the horn-beaked bird sang a battle-song. The warriors advanced, men to battle, protected by shields, hollow wooden shields, those who previously had suffered the insolence of foreigners, the insult of heathens. In the spear-play, that was all grievously requited to the Assyrians, when the Israelites under their battle-banners had gone to that camp. Then they boldly let showers of arrows fly forwards, battle arrows from horned bows, firm arrows. Angry warriors roared loudly, sent spears into the midst of the cruel ones. The native heroes were angry against the hateful race, resolute, they marched, determined, they violently aroused their ancient enemies who were drunk with mead. With their hands, the retainers drew brightly adorned swords from their sheaths, excellent sword-edges, zealously killed the Assyrian warriors, those evil schemers. They did not spare one man's life from that army, neither the lowly nor the powerful whom they could overcome. So, in the morning, the retainers pursued the foreign people the entire time, until the chief leaders of that army, of those who were the enemies, perceived that the Hebrew men had shown violent sword-brandishing to them. They went to reveal all that in words to the most senior retainers, and they aroused the warriors and announced fearfully to those drunk with mead the dreadful news, the morning’s terror, the terrible battle. Then, I have heard, immediately the warriors, doomed to perish, cast off sleep, and the subdued men thronged in crowds to the tent of the wicked man, Holofernes. They intended to announce the battle to their lord at once, before the terrible force of the Israelites came down on them. They all supposed that the leader of the warriors and the bright maiden were together in that beautiful tent: Judith the noble one, and the licentious one, terrible and fierce. There was not a single one of the men who dared to wake the warrior or inquire how the warrior had got on with the holy maiden, the Lord’s woman. The armed force of the Israelites approached; they fought vigorously

4. See Beowulf, lines 3024-27, n. 4 (p. 97).
with hard swords, violently requited
their ancient grudges, that old conflict, with shining swords. The Assyrian's 26 glory was destroyed in that day's work, their pride humbled. Warriors stood about their lord's tent very uneasy and sombre in spirit. Then together they all began to cough, to cry out loudly, to gnash their teeth, suffering grief, to no avail. Then their glory, success and brave deeds were at an end. The men considered how to awaken their lord; it did them no good.
275 It got later and later when one of the warriors became bold in that he daringly risked going into the tent, as need compelled him to.
He found on the bed his pale lord,
lying deprived of spirit, devoid of life. Immediately, he fell frozen to the floor, and began to tear at his hair and clothing, wild in mind, and he spoke these words to the warriors who were outside, dejected:
285 "Here our own destruction is made clear,
the future signified, that the time of troubles is pressing near when we shall now lose, shall perish at the battle together. Here lies our protector cut down and beheaded by the sword." Sorrowful, they 290 threw their weapons down then, and departed from him weary-spirited to hasten in flight. The mighty people fought them from behind, until the greatest part of the army lay destroyed in battle on that field of victory, cut down by swords as a pleasure for the wolves and also as a joy to bloodthirsty birds. Those who still lived fled from the wooden weapons of their enemies. Behind them came the army of the Hebrews, honoured with victory, glorified with that judgement. The Lord God, the almighty Lord, 300 helped them generously with his aid.
Then quickly the valiant heroes made a war-path through the hateful enemies with their shining swords; cut down shields, and penetrated the shield-wall. The Hebrew missile-throwers 305 were enraged in the battle, the retainers at that time greatly desired a battle of spears. There in the sand fell the greatest part of the total number of leaders of the Assyrians, that hateful nation. Few returned alive to their native land. The brave warriors turned back to retreat among the carnage, the reeking corpses. There was an opportunity for the native inhabitants to seize from the most hateful ancient enemies, the unliving ones, bloody plunder, beautiful ornaments, shield and broad sword, shining helmets, precious treasures. The guardians of the country had gloriously conquered their foes, the ancient enemy, on that battlefield, executed them with swords. Those who had been the most hateful of living men while alive rested in their tracks. Then the entire nation, the greatest of tribes, the proud braided-haired ones, for the space of one month carried and led to the bright city of Bethulia helmets and hip-swords, grey corslets, men's armour decorated with gold, more illustrious treasures than any man among the wise could say. All of that was earned by the warriors' glory, bold under the banners and in battle through the prudent counsel of Judith, the daring maiden. The brave warriors brought as her reward from that expedition the sword of Holofernes and his gory helmet, and likewise his ample mail-coat adorned with red gold, and everything that the arrogant lord of warriors owned by way of treasures or personal heirlooms, rings and bright riches; they gave that to the bright and ready-witted woman. For all of this Judith said thanks to the Lord of hosts, who had given her honour and glory in the kingdom of this earth, and also as her reward in heaven, the reward of victory in heaven's glory, because she possessed true faith in the Almighty. Indeed, at the end she did not doubt in the reward which she had long yearned for. For that be glory to the beloved Lord for ever and ever, who created wind and air, the heavens and spacious earth, likewise the raging seas and joys of heaven through his own individual grace.

KING ALFRED
849-899

From the beginning of the ninth century, the separate kingdoms of England were subject to attack from Viking raiders. After 865 these raids developed into a full-scale invasion, which led to the collapse of the principal English kingdoms except Wessex, in the south. Under the rule of King Alfred (871—99), Wessex was itself almost defeated, but by 886 Alfred managed to conclude a treaty with the Danes that established him as ruler of most of England south of the Humber.

Unsatisfied with military victory alone, Alfred set about a cultural and educational reform of what he saw as the decadent state of English learning. Whereas Anglo-Saxon poetry had a long history before Alfred's reign, there was no corresponding tradition of Old English prose. The "Preface to the Pastoral Care" offers the rationale... for Alfred’s program of prose translations from Latin into Anglo-Saxon, and for the educational reform he planned in order to exploit those translations. For Alfred, the power of a kingdom went hand in hand with the vigor of its learning. He is acutely aware that learning can only flourish “if we have peace,” but no less aware that learning will itself sustain that peace: kings in the past, he says, respected wisdom and learning. Through the application of such wisdom they enlarged their authority both at home and abroad.

Apart from foreign invasion, ignorance of languages is, by Alfred’s account, the main enemy of wisdom. For even before the Viking invasions, Alfred remembers a time when the churches throughout England were full of books that too few were capable of reading. Alfred’s solution to this decadent state of affairs is, in part, to promote education in both English and Latin literacy. Educational institutions also need teachers and books; accordingly, Alfred imported foreign scholars of high standing, and promoted the production of texts in the English language. While he deeply respected Latin learning, and clearly wanted to promote understanding of Latin, Alfred was not mesmerised by the status of that language itself. In the ‘Preface’ he ambitiously traces a ‘translation of studies,’ by which he marks the movement of learning from Greek to Roman centers, and from there to other European nations, including England. Each nation translates key texts into its own language.

Remarkably, Alfred wanted to present himself as, and very possibly was, actively engaged in the translation of these works. Alfred’s biographer Asser tells us that, as a boy, Alfred learned Anglo-Saxon poetry by heart, and that, as an adult, he learned to read and translate Latin. Alfred commissioned others to translate some works (e.g., Gregory the Great’s Dialogues, and, very possibly, both a history of the world by Orosius and Bede’s Ecclesiastical History), but many others are presented as having been translated by Alfred himself. These are translations or renderings of the following works: Gregory the Great’s Pastoral Care; Augustine’s Soliloquies; Boethius’s Consolation of Philosophy; a book of laws, and a prose version of the Psalms. Taken together, these books offer access to a remarkable range of learning. Many (those by Augustine, Orosius, Boethius, and Gregory) present key works of late Christian Antiquity, originally written between the early fifth and late sixth centuries. Just as Roman culture had adjusted to Christianity in those centuries, so too did Alfred introduce the classics of a new Christianity, with many powerful echoes of ancient, pre-Christian Platonic philosophy, to a recently pagan England. With the Ecclesiastical History translation he may have commissioned, Anglo-Saxon readers could develop a very sharp awareness of England’s own recent history. Whether Alfred really did translate these works himself we can never know. Certainly many of the additions made to the original source (particularly in the Boethius translation) discuss the pressures of kingship with great insight and personal intensity.

The ‘Preface to the Pastoral Care’ presents us with the image of a king totally committed to, and actively engaged in, learning. Alfred can see “the footprints” of former lovers of knowledge. With his long memory he is determined not to allow recent forgetfulness and destruction to obscure those traces forever.

Preface to the Pastoral Care

This Book is to go to Worcester

King Alfred sends greetings to Bishop Waerferth with his loving and friendly words, and would declare to you that it has very often come to my mind what wise men there were formerly throughout the English people, both in sacred and in secular orders; and how there were happy times then throughout England; and how the kings who had rule over the people in those days were obedient to God and his messengers, and both maintained their peace and their morality and their authority at home, and also enlarged their territory abroad; and how they prospered both in warfare and in wisdom; and also how zealous the sacred orders were both about teaching and about learning and all the services which they had to perform for God; and how men from abroad came here to this land in search of knowledge and instruction, and how we should now have to get them from abroad, if we were to have them. So complete was its decay among the English people that there were very few this side of the Humber who could comprehend their services in English, or even translate a letter from Latin into English; and I imagine that there were not many beyond the Humber. There were so few of them that I cannot even remember a single one south of the Thames when I succeeded to the kingdom. Thanks be to Almighty God that now we have any supply of teachers. And therefore I command you to do, as I believe you wish, that you disengage yourself as often as you can from the affairs of this world, so that you can apply the wisdom which God has given you wherever you are able to apply it. Think what punishments then came upon us in this world when we neither loved it ourselves nor allowed it to other men—we loved only to be called Christians, and very few loved the virtues.

When I remembered all this, then I also remembered how, before it was all ravaged and burnt, I had seen how the churches throughout all England stood filled with treasures and books, and there was also a great multitude of God’s servants—they had very little benefit from those books, because they could not understand anything of them, since they were not written in their own language. As if they had said: "Our forefathers who formerly held these places loved knowledge, and through it they acquired wealth and left it to us. One can see their footprints here still, but we cannot follow after them and therefore we have now lost both the wealth and the knowledge because we would not bend our mind to that course." When I remembered all this, then I wondered greatly at those good wise men who formerly existed throughout the English people and had fully studied all those books, that they did not wish to translate any part of them into their own language. But then I immediately answered myself and said: "They did not imagine that men should ever become so careless and learning so decayed; they refrained from it by intention and hoped that there would be the greater knowledge in this land the more languages we knew."

Then I remembered how the law was first found in the Hebrew language, and afterwards, when the Greeks learned it, they translated it all into their own language, and all the other books as well. And afterwards in the same way the Romans, when they had learned them, they translated them all into their own language through learned interpreters. And all other Christian nations also translated some part of them into their own language. Therefore it seems better to me, if it seems so to you, that we also should translate certain books which are most necessary for all men to know, into the language that we can all understand, and also arrange it, as with God’s help we very easily can if we have peace, so that all the youth of free men now among the English people, who have the means to be able to devote themselves to it, may be set to study for as long as they are of no other use, until the time they are able to read English writing well; afterwards one may teach further in the Latin language those whom one wishes to promote to holy orders.

Then when I remembered how the knowledge of Latin had previously decayed throughout the English people, and yet many could read English writing, I began amidst other various and manifold cares of this kingdom to translate into English the book which is called Pastoralis in Latin and 'Shepherd's Book' in English, sometimes word for word, sometimes in a paraphrase, as I learned it from my archbishop Plegmund, 4 and my bishop Asser, 5 and my priest Grimbold 6 and my priest John. 7 When I had learned it, I translated it into English as I understood it and as I could interpret it most intelligibly; and I will send one to every bishopric in my kingdom; and in each there will be a book-marker worth fifty mancuses. 8 And in the name of God I command that no one remove the book-marker from the book, nor the book from the minster; it is uncertain how long there may be such learned bishops, as now, thanks be to God, there are almost everywhere; therefore I desire that they should always lie at that place, unless the bishop want to have it with him, or it be anywhere on loan, or anyone be copying it.

THE WANDERER

The lament of The Wanderer is an excellent example of the elegiac mood so common in Old English poetry. The loss of a lord, of companions in arms, of a mead hall (in which Anglo-Saxon life realized itself to the full) are themes that enhance the melancholy tone of Beowulf as they are the emotional basis for such a poem as the present one. But nowhere more poignantly expressed than in The Wanderer is the loneliness of the exile in search of a new lord and hall; this is what Beowulf's father, Ecgtheow, would have suffered, had it not been for Hrothgar's hospitality. To the wretched seeker all weather is wintry, for nature seems to conspire to match a man's mood as he moves over the water from one land to another, yearning for a home and kin to replace those vanished ones that still fill his thoughts.

As is true of most Old English elegiac laments, both the language and the structure of The Wanderer are difficult. At the beginning the speaker (whom the poet identifies as an "earth-walker") voices hope of finding comfort after his many tribulations. After the poet's interruption, the wanderer continues to speak—to himself—of his long search for a new home, describing how he must keep his thoughts locked within him while he makes his search. But these thoughts form the most vivid and moving part of his soliloquy—how, floating on the sea, dazed with sorrow and fatigue, he imagines that he sees his old companions, and how, as he wakens to reality, they vanish over the water like seabirds. The second part of the poem, beginning with the seventh paragraph ("Therefore I cannot think why . . ."), expands the theme from one man to all human beings in a world wasted by war and time, and the speaker draws philosophical implications from his harsh experiences (presumably now in the past). He derives such cold comfort as he can from asking the old question Ubi sunt?—where are they who were once so glad to be alive? And he concludes with the thought that "all this earthly habitation shall be emptied" of humankind. The narrator communes with himself in private, apparently as an indication of his detachment from life. The poem concludes with a characteristic Old English injunction to practice restraint on earth, place hope only in heaven. The Wanderer is preserved only in the Exeter Book, a manuscript copied about 975, which contains the largest surviving collection of Old English poetry.

The Wanderer

"He who is alone often lives to find favor, mildness of the Lord, even though he has long had to stir with his arms the frost-cold sea, troubled in heart over the water-way had to tread the tracks of exile. Fully-fixed is his fate."

So spoke the earth-walker, remembering hardships, fierce war-slaughters—the fall of dear kinsmen.

"Often before the day dawned I have had to speak of my cares, alone: there is now none among the living to whom I dare clearly express the thought of my heart. I know indeed that it is a fine custom for a man to lock tight his heart's coffer, keep closed the hoard-case of his mind, whatever his thoughts may be. Words of a weary heart may not withstand fate, nor those of an angry spirit bring help. Therefore men eager for fame shut sorrowful thought up fast in their breast's coffer.

"Thus I, wretched with care, removed from my homeland, far from dear kinsmen, have had to fasten with fetters the thoughts of my heart—ever since the time, many years ago, that I covered my gold-friend in the darkness of the earth; and from there I crossed the woven waves, winter-sad, downcast for want of a hall, sought a giver of treasure—a place, far or near, where I might find one in a mead-hall who should know of my people, or would comfort me friendless, receive me with gladness. He who has experienced it knows how cruel a companion sorrow is to the man who has no beloved protectors. Exile's path awaits him, not twisted gold—frozen thoughts in his heart-case, no joy of earth. He recalls the hall-warriors and the taking of treasure, how in youth his gold-friend made him accustomed to feasting. All delight has gone.

"He who has had long to forgo the counsel of a beloved lord knows indeed how, when sorrow and sleep together bind the poor dweller-alone, it will seem to him in his mind that he is embracing and kissing his liege lord and laying his hands and his head on his knee, as it some times was in the old days when he took part in the gift-giving. Then he wakens again, the man with, no lord, sees the yellow waves before him, the sea-birds bathe, spread their feathers, frost and snow fall, mingled with hail.

"Then the wounds are deeper in his heart, sore for want of his dear one. His sorrow renews as the memory of his kinsmen moves through his mind: he greets them with glad words, eagerly looks at them, a company of warriors. Again they fade, moving off over the water; the spirit of these fleeting ones brings to him no familiar voices. Care renews in him who must again and again send his weary heart out over the woven waves.

"Therefore I cannot think why the thoughts of my heart should not grow dark when I consider all the life of men through this world—with what terrible swiftness they forgo the hall-floor, bold young retainers. So this middle-earth each day falls and falls. No man may indeed become wise before he has had his share of winters in this world's kingdom. The wise man must be patient, must never be too hot-hearted, nor too hasty of speech, nor too fearful, nor too glad, nor too greedy for wealth, nor ever too eager to boast before he has thought clearly. A man must wait, when he speaks in boast, until he knows clearly, sure-minded, where the thoughts of his heart may turn.

"The wise warrior must consider how ghostly it will be when all the wealth of this world stands waste, just as now here and there through this middle-earth wind-blown walls stand covered with frost-fall, storm-beaten dwellings. Wine-halls totter, the lord lies bereft of joy, all the company has fallen, bold men beside the wall. War took away some, bore them forth on their way; a bird carried one away over the deep sea; a wolf shared one with Death; another a man sad of face hid in an earth-pit.

"So the Maker of mankind laid waste this dwelling-place until the old works of giants stood idle, devoid of the noise of the stronghold's keepers. Therefore the man wise in his heart considers carefully this wall-place and this dark life, remembers the multitude of deadly combats long ago, and speaks these words: 'Where has the horse gone? Where the young warrior? Where is the giver of treasure? What has become of the feasting seats? Where are the joys of the hall? Alas, the bright cup! Alas, the mailed warrior! Alas, the prince's glory! How that time has gone, vanished beneath night's cover, just as if it never had been! The wall, wondrous high, decorated with snake-likenesses, stands now over traces of the beloved company. The ash-spears' might has borne the earls away—weapons greedy for slaughter, Fate the mighty; and storms beat on the stone walls, snow, the herald of winter, falling thick binds the earth when darkness comes and the night-shadow falls, sends harsh hailstones from the north in hatred of men. All earth's kingdom is wretched, the world beneath the skies is changed by the work of the fates. Here wealth is fleeting, here friend is fleeting, here man is fleeting, here woman is fleeting—all this earthly habitation shall be emptied.'"

So the wise man spoke in his heart, sat apart in private meditation. He is good who keeps his word; a man must never utter too quickly his breast's passion, unless he knows first how to achieve remedy, as a leader with his courage. It will be well with him who seeks favor, comfort from the Father in heaven, where for us all stability resides.

THE WIFE'S LAMENT

In modern English translation, the speaker of this poem sounds much like the speaker in The Wanderer, lamenting his exile, isolation, and the loss of his lord. But in Old English the grammatical gender of the pronouns reveals that this speaker is a woman; the man she refers to as 'my lord' must, therefore, be her husband. The story behind the lament remains obscure. All that can be made out for certain is that the speaker was married to a nobleman of another country; that her husband has left her (possibly forced into exile as a result of a feud); that his kinsmen are hostile to her; and that she is now living alone in a wilderness. Although the circumstances are shadowy, it is reasonable to conjecture that the wife may have been a "peace-weaver" (a woman married off to make peace between warring tribes), like Hildeburh and Freawaru, whose politically inspired marriages only result in further bloodshed (see Beowulf, pp. 57 and 78). The obscurity of the Old English text has led to diametrically opposed interpretations of the husband’s feeling toward his wife. One interpretation holds that, for unexplained reasons, possibly because of his kinsmen’s hostility to her, he has turned against her. The other, which is adopted in this translation, is that, in her mind at least, they share the suffering of his exile and their separation. Thus in the line here rendered "I must suffer the feud of my much-beloved," foehdu (feud) is read by some as the technical term for a blood feud—the way it is used in Beowulf when Hrothgar says he settled a great feud started by Beowulf’s father with feo (fee), i.e., monetary compensation (pp. 44—45). Others take the word in a more general sense as referring to the man’s enmity toward his wife. In either case, the woman’s themes and language resemble those of male "wraeccas" (outcasts or exiles; the Old English root survives in modern wretch and wretched) in the Old English poems called "elegies" because of their elegiac content and mood.

The Wife’s Lament

Full of grief, I make this poem about myself, my own fate. I have the right to say what miseries I have endured since I grew up, new or old—never greater than now. Endlessly I have suffered the wretchedness of exile.

First my lord went away from his people here across the storm-tossed sea. At daybreak I worried in what land my lord might be. Then I set out—a friendless exile—to seek a household to shelter me against wretched need. Hiding their thoughts, the man’s kinfolk hatched a plot to separate us so that we two should live most unhappy and farthest from one another in this wide world. And I felt longing.

My lord commanded me to stay in this place. I had few dear ones, faithful friends, in this country; that is why I am sad. Then I found my husband like-minded—luckless, gloomy, hiding murderous thoughts in his heart. With glad countenance, how often we vowed that death alone—nothing else—would drive us apart. That vow has been overthrown. Our friendship is as if it had never been. Far and near, I must suffer the feud of my much-beloved.

I was told to live in an earth-cave beneath an oak tree amid the forest. This earthen hall is old. I am overcome with longing. These dales are dark, and hills high, bitter bulwarks overgrown with briers, a joyless dwelling. Here very often my lord’s going away has wrenched me. There are couples on earth, lovers lying together in bed, while at dawn I come out of this cave to sit under the oak tree the summerlong day alone. There I weep my exile, the many burdens. Therefore I can never set my cares at rest, nor still all this life’s longing, which is my lot.

Should a young person ever be sad, harsh care at heart, he must then at one and the same time have heartache and a glad countenance, although he suffers endless surging sorrows. Whether my friend has all the world’s joy at his bidding or whether, outlawed from his homeland, he sits covered with storm-frost beneath a rocky cliff—my weary-minded friend, drenched in some dreary hall—he suffers great anguish. Too often he remembers a happier place. Woe is the one who, languishing, waits for a lover.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is a historical record in English, which takes the form of annals—that is, an annual summary of important events. Entries begin with variations of the formula "Dis gear" (This year) and may be brief or, occasionally, extended narratives. Copies of the original Chronicle, which was started in 891, were distributed to centers of learning where they were carried on independently. Seven manuscripts survive. The following selection comes from the Peterborough Chronicle (named for the monastery where it was kept), which was continued until 1154.

The Peterborough Chronicle provides an English perspective on the rule of the Normans after the conquest. In recording the death of William the Conqueror, the chronicler begins with conventional pious observations about the transitory nature of fortune in this world and the expected eulogy of the late king. But the rhetorical praise of the great man shifts into criticism and finally into doggerel rhyme satirizing William's greed and arbitrary exercise of power—especially his cruel game laws.

[OBITUARY FOR WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR]

[1087] In the same year, before the feast of the Assumption of Saint Mary, King William went from Normandy into France with an army and made war on his own lord King Philip, and killed a great number of his men, and burned down the city of Mantes and all the holy churches that were in the city; and two holy men, who served God, living there in an anchorite's cell, were burned to death. When he had done this, King William returned to Normandy. He did a wretched thing, and one more wretched happened to him. In what way more wretched? He got sick and suffered severely. Bitter death, which spares neither the powerful nor the lowly, seized him. He died in Normandy the day after the feast of the birth of Saint Mary, and they buried him in Caen at the abbey of St. Stephen. He had had it built and then endowed it richly. Oh, how false and how fickle is the wealth of this world! He who had been a powerful king and lord of many lands, of all the land then held no more than seven feet. He who was once clothed in gold and gems, now lay covered with earth. He left three sons: the oldest was called Robert, who succeeded him as duke of Normandy; the second was called William who bore the crown of England after him; the third was called Henry to whom the father bequeathed countless treasures.

If anyone wishes to know what kind of man he was, or what honor he possessed, or how many lands he was lord of, we will write about him just as he appeared to us, who beheld him and formerly lived in his court. This King William we are speaking about was a very wise man, and very powerful, and worthier and stronger than any of his predecessors. He was mild to good men who loved God and extremely harsh to men who crossed his will. On that site where God had granted him to gain possession of England, he established a famous monastery and set up monks in it and endowed it well. In his days the famous church of Canterbury was built and also many others throughout England. Moreover, this land was filled with a great many monks, and they led their life according to the rule of St. Benedict. And Christianity was such in his day that every man who wished was able to perform the duties that pertained to his religious order. Also he attached great importance to ceremony: he wore his crown three times a year as often as he was in England—at Easter he wore it at Winchester, at Pentecost at Westminster, and at Christmas at Gloucester. And at those times all the powerful men in England attended him—archbishops and bishops, abbots and earls, thanes and knights. He was also a very harsh and violent man so that no one dared do anything against his will. He put earls who acted against his will in fetters; he removed bishops from their bishoprics and abbots from their abbeys; and he threw thanes into prison. And he did not spare even his own brother, who was called Odo. The latter was a very powerful bishop in Normandy—his see was at Bayeux—and he was the foremost man next to the king. He had an earldom in England, and when the king was in Normandy, then he was master in this land. The king threw him in prison. Among other things, one must not forget the good peace that he made in this land so that any man of property might travel safely throughout the kingdom with his purse full of gold. No man dared to kill another, no matter how much harm that one had done to him. And if a man raped a woman, he immediately lost those parts with which he took pleasure.

He ruled over England and because of his management contrived that there was not a hide of land in England that he did not know who owned it and what it was worth; and he set it down in his record. The land of the Britons was in his power, and he built castles in it and completely dominated that people. Likewise he subjected Scotland because of his great strength. Normandy was his by inheritance, and he ruled over the county called Maine. And if he had lived another two years, he would have conquered Ireland with no weapon other than astute diplomacy. Truly in his time men suffered much hardship and very many injuries.

He built fortresses
And caused poor men great distress.
This king was very hard.
He took many a gold mark
From his subjects and did purloin
Hundreds more of silver coin.
He extorted it by pounds
On most illegal grounds.

His people he would bleed,
Not from any need.
Into avarice he fell
And loved greed above all.
He laid laws severe
To protect the deer.
Whoever killed a hart or hind
Was to be made blind.
The harts were forbidden, and
The wild boars were also banned.
He loved the tall deer
As if he were their father.
And the hares, he made a decree,
That they should go free.
His rich men lamented it,
And his poor men resented it.
But so stern a man was he
He cared not for all their enmity.
But they must in everything
Follow the will of the king
If they wished to live or planned
To own any land—
Estates or goods to embrace
And to remain in his good grace.
Alas, that any man should be
So filled with arrogance that he Exalts himself above all the rest
And holds himself to be the highest.
May almighty God be merciful
And grant forgiveness to his soul.

We have written these things about him, both the good and the bad, so that good men may take after the good and shun the bad in every respect and follow the path that leads us to the kingdom of heaven.

LEGENDARY HISTORIES OF BRITAIN

During the twelfth century, three authors, who wrote in Latin, Anglo-Norman French, and Middle English, respectively, created a mostly legendary history of Britain for their Norman overlords (see p. 9). This "history" was set in the remote past, beginning with a foundation myth—a heroic account of national origins—modeled on Virgil's Aeneid and ending with the Anglo-Saxon conquest of the native islanders, the Britons, in the fifth and sixth centuries. The chief architect of the history is Geoffrey of Monmouth, who was writing his History of the Kings of Britain in Latin prose ca. 1136–38. His work was freely translated into French verse by Wace in 1155, and Wace in turn was translated into English alliterative poetry by Layamon in his Brut (ca. 1190).

Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace wrote their histories of Britain primarily for an audience of noblemen and prelates who were descendants of the Norman conquerors of the Anglo-Saxons. Geoffrey wrote several dedications of his History, first to supporters of Matilda, the heiress presumptive of Henry I, and, when the Crown went instead to Stephen of Blois, to the new king's allies and to Stephen himself. Layamon tells us that Wace wrote his French version for Eleanor of Aquitaine, queen of Stephen's successor, Henry II. The prestige and power of ancient Rome still dominated the historical and political imagination of the feudal aristocracy, and the legendary history of the ancient kings of the Britons, especially of King Arthur, who had defeated Rome itself, served to flatter the self-image and ambitions of the Anglo-Norman barons. Perhaps the destruction of Arthur's kingdom also provided a timely object lesson of the disastrous consequences of civil wars such as those over the English succession in which these lords were engaged.

The selections from Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace are translated by Alfred David. The Layamon selections are translated by Rosamund Allen. For more information about Arthur, see "King Arthur" at Norton Literature Online.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH

The author of the History of the Kings of Britain was a churchman, probably of Welsh or Breton ancestry, who spent much of his life at Oxford. One of his motives in writing the work was undoubtedly to obtain advancement in the church. In the dedications of the History, Geoffrey claims that it is merely a translation into Latin of "a very old book in the British language [i.e., Welsh]," which had been loaned to him by his friend Walter, archdeacon of Oxford, but scholars have discounted this story as another one of Geoffrey's many fictions.

Geoffrey began his history with a British foundation myth modeled upon Virgil's Aeneid. Out of legends that Rome had been founded by refugees from the fall of Troy, the poet Virgil had created his epic poem the Aeneid for Augustus Caesar. Aeneas, carrying his father upon his back, had escaped from the ruins of Troy and, fulfilling prophecies, became the founding father of a new Troy in Italy. The Britons had developed an analogous foundation myth in which a great-grandson of Aeneas called Brutus had led another band of Trojan exiles to establish another Troy, which was named Britain after him. Geoffrey drew upon earlier Latin chronicles and Welsh oral tradition, but he himself provided his history with a chronology, a genealogy, a large cast of both historical and legendary characters (among many other stories, he is the first to tell of King Lear and his daughters), and a cyclical sense of the rise and fall of empires. The longest and most original part of the work (over one-fifth of the History) is devoted to the birth and reign of King Arthur. In the first part of Arthur's reign, he defeats and drives out the pagan Anglo-Saxon invaders. At the end of his reign the Saxons return at the invitation of the traitor Mordred and, though defeated again by Arthur in his last battle, they ultimately triumph over his successors.

The historicity of Geoffrey's book, although questioned by some of Geoffrey's contemporary historians, was widely accepted and not fully discredited until the seventeenth century. In the course of time Arthur was adopted as a national and cultural hero by the English against whose ancestors he had fought, and his court became the international ideal of a splendid chivalric order in the past of which contemporary knighthood was only a faint imitation. Geoffrey of Monmouth himself already declares that in Arthur's time, "Womenfolk became chaste and more virtuous and for their love the knights were ever more daring."

In the following selections, Geoffrey relates the British foundation myth, which he historicizes, amplifies, and fleshes out with details that he regards as classical.
From The History of the Kings of Britain

[THE STORY OF BRUTUS AND DIANA’S PROPHECY]

After the Trojan War, Aeneas with his son Ascanius fled from the destruction of the city and sailed to Italy. Although King Latinus would have received him there with honor, Turnus, the king of the Rutuli, was envious and made war on him. In their rivalry Aeneas prevailed and, having slain Turnus, obtained the kingdom of Italy and Latinus’s daughter, Lavinia.

At the end of Aeneas’s days, Ascanius was elevated to royal power and founded the city of Alba on the banks of the Tiber. He fathered a son whose name was Silvius. The latter had a secret love affair with a niece of Lavinia’s whom he married and got with child. When his father Ascanius learned about this he ordered his wise men to find out the sex of the child that the girl had conceived. When the wise men had made sure of the truth, they said that she would bear a son who would be the death of his father and mother. After travelling through many lands as an exile, he would nevertheless attain to the highest honor. Their prophecies did not turn out to be mistaken. For when her time had come, the woman bore a boy and died in childbirth. The boy was handed over to the midwife and named Brutus. At last, after fifteen years had gone by, the boy went hunting with his father and killed him with a mis-directed bowshot. For as the servants were driving some stags into their path, Brutus, believing that he was aiming at them, hit his father below the breast. On account of this death, his relatives, outraged that he should have done such a deed, drove him from Italy.* * *

[The exiled Brutus travels to Greece, where he discovers descendants of Trojan prisoners of war living in slavery. He organizes a successful rebellion against their Greek masters and, like Aeneas before him, leads them on a quest for a new homeland.]

Driven by favorable winds, the Trojans sailed for two days and one night until they made land on an island called Leogetia, which was uninhabited because long ago it had been devastated by pirate raids. So Brutus sent three hundred armed men to explore the island and see whether anything was living on it. They found no one but they killed several kinds of wild animals that they came across in the woods and thickets.

They came to a deserted city where they found a temple of Diana in which a statue of the goddess rendered oracles if someone should consult it. At last they returned to their ships, loaded down with game, and told their comrades about the land and the city. They suggested to their chief that he go to the temple and, after making propitiatory sacrifices, inquire of the goddess what land might afford them a permanent home. When everyone agreed, Brutus with the soothsayer Gero and twelve elders set out for the temple, taking along everything necessary for the sacrifice. When they got there, they bound their brows with headbands and, in preparation of the most ancient rite, they erected three hearths to three gods, namely to Jupiter, Mercury, and Diana. They poured out libations to each one in turn. Before the altar of the goddess, Brutus himself, holding a sacrificial vessel filled with wine and the blood of a white doe in his right hand, raised his face to her statue and broke the silence with these words:

Mighty goddess of woodlands, terror of the wild boar,
Thou who art free to traverse the ethereal heavens
And the mansions of hell, disclose my rights on this earth
And say what lands it is your wish for us to inhabit,
What dwelling-place where I shall worship you all my life,
Where I shall dedicate temples to you with virgin choirs.

After he had spoken this prayer nine times, he walked four times around the altar and poured out the wine he was holding upon the hearth. Then he spread out the hide of the doe before the altar and lay down on it. He tried to doze off and finally fell asleep. It was now the third hour of the night when sweetest slumber overcomes mortals. Then it seemed to him that the goddess was standing before him and speaking to him like this:

Brutus, where the sun sets beyond the kingdoms of Gaul
Is an isle in the ocean, closed all around by the sea.
Once on a time giants lived on that isle in the ocean,
But now it stands empty and fit to receive your people.
Seek it out, for it shall be your homeland forever;
It shall be a second Troy for your descendants.
There kings shall be born of your seed and to them
All nations of the round earth shall be subject.

When the vision vanished, Brutus remained in doubt whether what he had seen was only a phantom or whether the actual voice of the goddess had foretold the homeland to which he was to travel. Finally he called his comrades and told them point by point what had happened to him while he slept. Waves of great joy swept over them, and they urged that they return to the ships and, while the wind blew behind them, head with swiftest sail toward the ocean to seek out what the goddess had promised. Without delay they rejoined their comrades and set out on the high seas.

WACE

Wace (ca. 1110—ca. 1180) was a Norman cleric, born on the island of Jersey in the English Channel, which was then part of the dukedom of Normandy. Although educated for the church, he seems to have served the laity, perhaps in a secretarial function. All of his extant works, which include saints' lives, Le Roman de Brut (1155), and Le Roman de Rou, were written in French verse for a lay audience that would have included women like Eleanor of Aquitaine, to whom he dedicated the Brut, and Marie de France, who drew on that work in her lays. Roman in these titles refers to the fact that they are chronicles in French verse about, respectively, the dynasties of Brutus (first of the kings of Britain) and Rollo (first of the dukes of Normandy).

The Roman de Brut is a very free translation in eight-syllable couplets of Geoffrey of Monmouth’s Latin prose History of the Kings of Britain. (We have rendered Wace’s verse as prose.) Wace has cut some details and added a good deal, including the first mention of the Round Table. He is far more interested than Geoffrey in creating an atmosphere of courtliness—in the way his characters dress, think, speak, and behave. The following selection covers a challenge delivered to Arthur by the Roman emperor Lucius and Arthur’s response. This climactic sequence follows an elaborate coronation scene attended by a large gathering of kings and dukes from Britain and overseas who owe allegiance to Arthur and whose lands comprise what might be called the Arthurian Empire. At the feast following his coronation, Arthur’s authority is challenged by ambassadors who present an insulting letter from Lucius. Arthur’s reply is a masterpiece of feudal rhetoric that would have been admired by Wace’s audience.

From Le Roman de Brut

[THE ROMAN CHALLENGE]

Arthur was seated on a dais surrounded by counts and kings when a dozen white-haired, very well-dressed men came into the hall in pairs, one holding the other’s hand. Each held an olive branch. They crossed the hall very slowly in an orderly and solemn procession, approached the king and hailed him. They said they had come from Rome as messengers. They unfolded a letter, which one of them gave to Arthur on behalf of the Roman emperor. Listen to what it said:

"Lucius who holds Rome in his domain and is sovereign lord of the Romans, proclaims to King Arthur, his enemy, what he has deserved. I am disdainful in amazement and am amazed with disdain at the inordinate and insane pride with which you have set your sights on Rome. With disdain and amazement I ask myself at whose prompting and from what quarters you have undertaken to pick a quarrel with Rome as long as a single Roman remains alive. You have acted with great recklessness in attacking us who have the right to rule the world and hold supremacy over it. You still don’t know, but we shall teach you; you are blind, but we shall make you see what a great thing it is to anger Rome, which has the power to rule over everything. You have presumed beyond your place and crossed the bounds of your authority! Have you any idea who you are and where you come from—you who are taking and holding back the tribute that belongs to us? You are taking our tribute and our lands: why do you hold them, why don’t you turn them over, why do you keep them, what right do you have to them? If you keep them any longer, you will be acting most recklessly. And if you are capable of holding them without our forcing you to give them up, you might as well say—an unprecedented miracle!—that the lion flees from the lamb, the wolf from the goat, the greyhound from the hare. But that could never happen, for Nature would not suffer it. Julius Caesar, our ancestor—but maybe you have little respect for him—conquered Britain and imposed a tribute that our people have collected since that time. And we have also been receiving tribute for a long time from the other islands surrounding you. And you have foolishly presumed to take tribute from both of them. Already you were guilty of senseless behavior, but you have committed an even greater insult that touches us still more closely than the losses we have sustained: you killed our vassal Frollo¹ and illegally occupied France.

Therefore, since you are not afraid of Rome nor its great power, the Senate summons and orders you—for the summons is an order—to come before it in mid-August, ready, at whatever cost, to make full restitution of what you have taken from them. And thus you will give satisfaction for the wrongs of which we accuse you. But if you delay in any fashion to do what I command you, I will cross the Alps with an army and will deprive you of Britain and France. But I can’t imagine that you will await my coming or will defend France against me. I don’t think you will dare to face me on this side of the Channel. And even if you stay over there, you will never await my coming. You won’t know a place to hide where I won’t flush you out. I’ll lead you to Rome in chains and hand you over to the Senate.”

At these words there was a great uproar, and all were greatly enraged. You could have heard the Britons shouting loudly, calling God as witness and swearing by his name that they were going to punish the messengers. They would have showered them with abuse and insults, but the king rose to his feet and called out to them, “Silence! Silence! Don’t lay a hand on these men. They are messengers; they have a master, they are bringing his message; they can say whatever they like. No one shall do them the slightest harm.”

When the noise quieted down and the retainers recovered their composure, the king ordered his dukes and counts and his personal advisers to accompany him to a stone tower called the Giant Tower. There he wanted to seek advice on what to reply to the messengers. Side by side the barons and counts were already mounting the stairs, when Cador, the duke of Cornwall, with a smile spoke to the king, who was in front of him, as follows: “I’ve been afraid,” he said, “and have often thought that leisure and peace might spoil the Britons, for leisure is conducive to bad habits and causes many a man to become lazy. Leisure diminishes prowess, leisure promotes lechery, leisure kindles clandestine love affairs. Through prolonged repose and leisure youth gets preoccupied with entertainment and pleasure and backgammon and other games of diversion. By staying put and resting for a long time, we could lose our reputation. Well, we’ve been asleep, but God has given us a little wake-up call—let us thank him for encouraging the Romans to challenge our country and the others we have conquered. Should the Romans find it in themselves to carry out what they say in that letter, the Britons will still retain their reputation for valor and strength. I never like peace for long, nor shall I love a peace that lasts a long time.”

“My lord,” said Gawain, “in faith, you’re getting upset over nothing. Peace after war is a good thing. The land is better and more beautiful on account of it. It’s very good to amuse oneself and to make love. It’s for love and for their ladies that knights perform chivalrous deeds.”

While bantering in this way, they entered the tower and took their seats. When Arthur saw them sitting down and waiting in silence with full attention, he paused for a moment in thought, then raised his head and spoke:

“Barons,” he said, “you who are here, my companions and friends, you have stood by me in good times and bad; you have supported me when I had to go to war; you have taken my part whether I won or lost; you have been partners in my loss, and in my gain when I conquered. Thanks to you and your help, I have won many a victory. I have led you through many dangers by land and by sea, in places near and far. I have found you loyal in action and in counsel. I have tested your mettle many times and always found it good. Thanks to you the neighboring countries are subject to me. You have heard the Romans' order, the tenor of the letter, and the overbearingness and arrogance of their demands. They have provoked and threatened us enough, but if God protects us, we shall do away with the Romans. They are rich and have great power, and now we must carefully consider what we can properly and reasonably say and do. Trouble is dealt with better when a strategy has been worked out in advance. If someone sees the arrow in flight, he must get out of the way or shield himself. That is how we must proceed. The Romans want to shoot at us, and we must get ready so that they cannot wound us. They demand tribute from Britain and must have it, so they tell us; they demand the same from the other islands and from France.

"But first I shall reply how matters stand with regard to Britain. They claim that Caesar conquered it; Caesar was a powerful man and carried out his will by force. The Britons could not defend themselves against him, and he exacted tribute from them by force. But might is not right; it is force and superior power. A man does not possess by right what he has taken by force. Therefore, we are allowed to keep by right what they formerly took by force. They have held up to us the damages, losses, humiliations, the sufferings and fears that they inflicted on our ancestors. They boasted that they conquered them and extorted tribute and rents from them. We have all the more right to make them suffer; they have all the more restitution to make to us. We ought to hate those who hated our ancestors and to injure those who injured them. They remind us that they made them suffer, got tribute from them, and demand tribute from us. They want us to suffer the same shame and extortion as our ancestors. They once got tribute from Britain, and so they want to get it from us. By the same reason and with equal cause we can challenge the Romans and dispute our rights. Belinus, who was king of the Britons, and Brennus,2 duke of the Burgundians, two brothers born in Britain, valiant and wise knights, marched on Rome, laid siege to the city, and took it by assault. They hanged twenty-four hostages in plain sight of their families. When Belinus returned from Rome, he entrusted the city to his brother.

"I won't dwell on Belinus and Brennus but will speak of Constantine. He was British by birth, the son of Helen; he held Rome in his own right. Maximian, king of Britain, conquered France and Germany, crossed the Alps and Lombardy and reigned over Rome. These were my ancestors by direct descent, and each one held Rome in his possession. Now you may hear and understand that we have just as much right to possess Rome as they do to possess Britain. The Romans had our tribute, and my ancestors had theirs. They claim Britain, and I claim Rome. This is the gist of my counsel: that they may have the land and tribute who can take it away from another. As for France and the other lands we have taken from them, they have no right to dispute them since they would not or could not defend them, or perhaps had no right to them because they held them in bondage through force and greed. So let he who can hold all. There is no need to look for any other kind of right. The emperor threatens us. God forbid that he should do us any harm. He says that he will take away our lands and lead me to Rome as a prisoner. He has small regard or fear of me. But, God willing, if he comes to this land, before he leaves again he’ll have no stomach to make threats. He defies me, and I defy him: may he possess the lands who is able to take them!

2. Brennus was not a Briton but a Gaulish chief-tain who sacked Rome in the 4th century. Belinus is fictional. Constantine I, who adopted Christianity as the official religion of the Roman Empire, was believed to be British. Maximian (Maximus) was a 5th-century Roman general serving in Britain who abandoned the island when his army proclaimed him emperor and usurped the imperium in civil wars that weakened Rome and left Britain at the mercy of attacks by the Picts, Scots, and Germanic tribes. Geoffrey of Monmouth's earlier accounts of these personages had conflated a tiny amount of fact with a great deal of fiction.

When King Arthur had spoken what he wanted to his barons, the others spoke in turn while the rest listened. Hoel, king of Brittany, spoke next: “Sire,” he said, “in faith, you have spoken many just words; none could have said it better. Send after and mobilize your forces along with us who are here at court. Without delay pass over the sea, pass through Burgundy and France, pass the Alps, conquer Lombardy! Throw the emperor who is defying you into confusion and panic so that he will not have the chance to cause you harm. The Romans have begun a suit that will ruin them. God wants to exalt you: don’t hold back and lose any time! Make yourself master of the empire, which is ready to surrender to you of its own will. Remember what is written in the Sibyl’s prophecies. Three Britons will be born in Britain who shall conquer Rome by might. Two have already lived and been sovereigns over Rome. The first was Belinus and the second, Constantine. You shall be the third to possess Rome and conquer it by force; in you the Sibyl’s prophecy will be fulfilled. Why delay to seize that which God wants to bestow on you? Increase your glory and ours to which we aspire. We may say truly that we are not afraid of blows or wounds or death or hardship or prison so long as we strive for honor. As long as you are in danger, I will lead ten thousand armed knights in your host, and if that should not be enough, I shall mortgage all my lands and give you the gold and silver. I won’t keep back a farthing so long as you have need of it!”

3. Reference to the Sibylline books containing prophecies of the Roman Sibyl of Cumae, but these no longer existed and could have been known only by reputation. This prophecy was probably invented by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

LAYAMON

Layamon, an English priest, adapted Wace’s Roman de Brut into Middle English alliterative verse. His Brut (ca. 1190) runs to 16,095 lines, expanding on Wace and adding much new material.

After winning the continental campaign against Lucius, Arthur is forced to return to Britain upon learning that his nephew, Mordred, whom he had left behind as regent, has usurped Arthur’s throne and queen. The following selection, a passage added by Layamon, presents Arthur’s dream of Mordred’s treachery.

Layamon employs a long alliterative line that harks back to Old English poetry, but the two halves of his line are often linked by rhyme as well as by alliteration. Layamon reveals his ties with Germanic literary tradition in other ways. In Arthur’s nightmare, the king and Gawain are sitting astride the roof beam of a building like the mead hall Heorot in Beowulf—a symbol of the control a king wields over his house and kingdom. On the ground below, Mordred is chopping away at the foundations like the gigantic rodent in Norse mythology that is gnawing away at the roots of Yggdrasil, the great tree, which holds together earth, heaven, and hell.
Then came to pass what Merlin spoke of long before,
That the walls of Rome would fall down before Arthur;
This had already happened there in relation to the emperor
Who had fallen in the fighting with fifty thousand men:
That’s when Rome with her power was pushed to the ground.
And so Arthur really expected to possess all of Rome,
And the most mighty of kings remained there in Burgundy.

Now there arrived at this time a bold man on horseback;
News he was bringing for Arthur the king
From Modred, his sister’s son: to Arthur he was welcome,
For he thought that he was bringing very pleasant tidings.

Arthur lay there all that long night, talking with the young knight,
Who simply did not like to tell him the truth of what had happened.
The next day, as dawn broke, the household started moving,
And then Arthur got up, and, stretching his arms,
He stood up, and sat down again, as if he felt very sick.

Then a good knight questioned him: "My Lord, how did you get on last night?"
Arthur responded (his heart was very heavy):
"Tonight as I was sleeping, where I was lying in my chamber,
There came to me a dream which has made me most depressed:
I dreamed someone had lifted me right on top of some hall

And I was sitting on the hall, astride, as if I was going riding:
All the lands which I possess, all of them I was surveying,
And Gawain sat in front of me, holding in his hands my sword.
Then Modred came marching there with a countless host of men,
Carrying in his hand a massive battle-axe.

He started to hew, with horrible force,
And hacked down all the posts which were holding up the hall.
I saw Guinevere there as well, the woman I love best of all:
The whole roof of that enormous hall with her hands she was pulling down;
The hall started tottering, and I tumbled to the ground,

And broke my right arm, at which Modred said 'Take that!'
Down then fell the hall and Gawain fell as well,
Falling on the ground where both his arms were broken,
So with my left hand I clutched my beloved sword
And struck off Modred’s head and it went rolling over the ground,

And I sliced the queen in pieces with my beloved sword,
And after that I dropped her into a dingy pit,
And all my fine subjects set off in flight,
And what in Christendom became of them I had no idea,
Except that I was standing by myself in a vast plain,

Then I started roaming all around across the moors;
There I could see griffins and really gruesome birds.
"Then a golden lioness came gliding over the downs,
As really lovely a beast as any Our Lord has made.
The lioness ran up to me and put her jaws around my waist,
And off she set, moving away towards the sea,
And I could see the waves, tossing in the sea,
And taking me with her, the lioness plunged into the water.
When we two were in the sea, the waves swept her away from me;
Then a fish came swimming by and ferried me ashore.

Then I was all wet and weary, and I was sick with sorrow.
And upon waking, I started quaking,
And then I started to shudder as if burning up with fire,
And so all night I've been preoccupied with my disturbing dream,
For I know of a certainty this is the end of my felicity,
And all the rest of my life I must suffer grief.

Then the knight responded: "My Lord, you are mistaken;
Dreams should never be interpreted as harbingers of sorrow!
You are the most mighty prince who has rule in any land,
And the most intelligent of all inhabitants on the earth.
If it should have happened—as may Our Lord not allow it—
That your sister's son, Lord Modred, your own queen might have wedded,
And all your royal domains might have annexed in his own name,
Those which you entrusted to him when you intended going to Rome,
And if he should have done all this by his treacherous deeds,
Even then you might avenge yourself honorably with arms,
And once again possess your lands and rule over your people,
And destroy your enemies who wish you so much evil,
And slay them, every one alive, so that there is none who survives!"

Then Arthur answered him, most excellent of all kings:
"For as long as is for ever, I have no fear whatever,
That Modred who is my relative, the man I love best,
Would betray all my trust, not for all of my realm,
Nor would Guinevere, my queen, weaken in her allegiance,
She will not begin to, for any man in the world!"
Immediately after these words, the knight gave his answer:
"I am telling you the truth, dear king, for I am merely your underling:
Modred has done these things: he has adopted your queen,
And has placed in his own hands your lovely land;
He is king and she is queen; they don't expect your return,
For they don't believe it will be the case that you'll ever come back from Rome.
I am your loyal liegeman, and I did see this treason,
And so I have come to you in person to tell you the truth.
Let my head be as pledge of what I have told you,
The truth and no lie, about your beloved queen,
And about Modred, your sister's son, and how he has snatched Britain from you."
Then everything went still in King Arthur's hall;
There was great unhappiness for the excellent king,
And because of it the British men were utterly depressed;
Then after a while came the sound of a voice;
All over could be heard the reactions of the British
As they started to discuss in many kinds of expression.
How they wished to condemn Modred and the queen
And destroy all the population who had supported Modred.

Most courteous of all Britons, Arthur then called out aloud,
"Sit down quietly, my knights in this assembly,
And then I shall tell you some very strange tales.
Now tomorrow when daylight is sent by our Lord to us,
I wish to be on my way toward entering Britain,
And there I shall kill Modred and burn the queen to death,
And I shall destroy all of them who gave assent to the treason."

THE MYTH OF ARTHUR'S RETURN

Folklore and literature provide examples of a recurrent myth about a leader or hero who has not really died but is asleep somewhere or in some state of suspended life and will return to save his people. Evidently, the Bretons and Welsh developed this myth about Arthur in oral tradition long before it turns up in medieval chronicles. Geoffrey of Monmouth, Wace, and Layamon, and subsequent writers about Arthur, including Malory (see p. 438), allude to it with varying degrees of skepticism.

GEoffrey of Monmouth: From The History of the Kings of Britain

But also the famous King Arthur himself was mortally wounded. When he was carried off to the island of Avalon to have his wounds treated, he bestowed the crown on his cousin Constantine, the son of Duke Cador in the year 542 after the Incarnation of our lord. May his soul rest in peace.

WACE: From Roman de Brut

Arthur, if the story is not false, was mortally wounded; he had himself carried to Avalon to be healed of his wounds. He is still there and the Britons expect him as they say and hope. He'll come from there if he is still alive. Master Wace, who made this book, won't say more about Arthur's end than the prophet Merlin rightly said once upon a time that one would not know whether or not he were dead. The prophet spoke truly: ever since men have asked and shall always ask, I believe, whether he is dead or alive. Truly he had himself taken to Avalon 542 years after the Incarnation. It was a pity that he had no offspring. He left his realm to Constantine, the son of Cador of Cornwall, and asked him to reign until his return.

LAYAMON: From Brut

Arthur was mortally wounded, grievously badly;
To him there came a young lad who was from his clan,
He was Cador the Earl of Cornwall's son;
The boy was called Constantine; the king loved him very much.
Arthur gazed up at him, as he lay there on the ground,
And uttered these words with a sorrowing heart:
"Welcome, Constantine; you were Cador's son;
Here I bequeath to you all of my kingdom,
And guard well my Britons all the days of your life
And retain for them all the laws which have been extant in my days
And all the good laws which there were in Uther's days,
And I shall voyage to Avalon, to the fairest of all maidens,
To the Queen Argante, a very radiant elf,
And she will make quite sound every one of my wounds,
Will make me completely whole with her health-giving potions."
After these words there came gliding from the sea
What seemed a short boat, moving, propelled along by the tide
And in it were two women in remarkable attire,
Who took Arthur up at once and immediately carried him
And gently laid him down and began to move off.
And so it had happened, as Merlin said before:
That the grief would be incalculable at the passing of Arthur.
The Britons even now believe that he is alive
And living in Avalon with the fairest of the elf-folk,
And the Britons are still always looking for when Arthur comes returning.
Yet once there was a prophet and his name was Merlin:
He spoke his predictions, and his sayings were the truth,
Of how an Arthur once again would come to aid the English.

The changes European literature underwent during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries are greatly indebted to Celtic influences. The legends about King Arthur and his knights, although they were assimilated to the feudal culture of the Anglo-Normans and transmitted by texts written in Latin, French, and English (see p. 9), were originally products of Celtic myth and legend. The folkloric otherworld elements and the major role played by women in those stories profoundly shaped and colored the literature we now think of as "romance." The French Tristan romances, the romances of Marie de France and Chretien de Troyes, and even the legends of the Holy Grail could not have been imagined without their Celtic components.

The Celts overran central Europe, Spain, and the British Isles during the first millennium B.C.E. On the Continent and in Great Britain, south of the wall built by the emperor Hadrian (see the map inside the front cover), they were absorbed into the Roman Empire. However, the Celtic vernacular continued to be spoken as the native language, and Ireland never became a Roman province. The Anglo-Saxon invasions in the fifth and early sixth centuries, and the Danish invasions after the eighth, displaced Celtic in England, but Celtic language and culture continued to flourish in Wales (Welsh), in Cornwall (Cornish), across the English Channel in Brittany (Breton), and, of course, in Ireland (Gaelic). While still part of the Roman Empire, Britain and, in consequence, Ireland had been converted to Christianity. As portrayed in the Arthurian legend, the Christian Britons fought against barbaric Germanic invaders. Irish and Welsh missionaries, along with Roman ones, brought about the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons.

The earliest Celtic literature, like that of the Anglo-Saxons, was transmitted orally and little was copied down before the twelfth century. Nevertheless, the surviving monuments indicate its richness and its significance for the development of French and English medieval literature.

EXILE OF THE SONS OF UISLIU

The Old Irish tale of the Exile of the Sons of Uisliu [tsh-lu] is believed on linguistic grounds to date back to at least the eighth century, although the earliest text is found in a mid-twelfth-century manuscript known as the Book of the Dun Cow. As is typical in Old Irish narrative, many of the characters’ speeches are in verse that is probably even older. The Exile is one of several tales leading up to the epic Tain Bo Cuailnge (The Cattle Raid of Cooley), which tells of the war between the kingdoms of Connacht and Ulster. Its heroine Derdriu [der-dru] is one of the passionate and strong-willed women, whose prototypes may have been ancient divinities, for which Old Irish literature is noted. In some respects the triangle of Derdriu, Conchobor [kon-chor: ch is guttural as in Scots loch], and Noisiu [noi-shu] resembles that of Isolt, King Mark, and Tristran, told in twelfth-century poetic versions by Thomas (pp. 136—41), who probably wrote for the court of Henry II, and by the Norman Beroul. The Tristran story has antecedents in Irish, Welsh, and Breton. The story of Derdriu is the source of modern plays by William Butler Yeats and John Millington Synge and a novel by James Stephens.

Exile of the Sons of Uisliu

What caused the exile of the sons of Uisliu? It is soon told. The men of Ulster were drinking in the house of Conchobor’s storyteller, Fedlimid mac Daill. Fedlimid’s wife was overseeing everything and looking after them all. She was full with child. Meat and drink were passed round, and a drunken uproar shook the place. When they were ready to sleep the woman went to her bed. As she crossed the floor of the house the child screamed in her womb and was heard all over the enclosure. At that scream everyone in the house started up, staring at each other. Sencha mac Ailella said:

'No one move! Bring the woman here. We'll see what caused this noise.'

So the woman was brought before them. Her husband Fedlimid said:

Woman,
what was that fierce shuddering sound furious in your troubled womb?
The weird uproar at your waist hurts the ears of all who hear it.

My heart trembles at some great terror or some cruel injury.

She turned distracted to the seer Cathbad:

Fair-faced Cathbad, hear me
—prince, pure, precious crown, grown huge in druid spells.
I can’t find the fair words that would shed the light of knowledge for my husband Fedlimid, even though it was the hollow of my own womb that howled.
No woman knows what her womb bears.

Then Cathbad said:

A woman with twisted yellow tresses,
green-irised eyes of great beauty and cheeks flushed like the foxglove
howled in the hollow of your womb.
I say that whiter than the snow is the white treasure of her teeth;
Parthian-red, her lip’s luster.
Ulster’s chariot-warriors will deal many a blow for her.
There howled in your troubled womb
a tall, lovely, long-haired woman.
Heroes will contend for her,
high kings beseech on her account;
then, west of Conchobor’s kingdom
a heavy harvest of fighting men.
High queens will ache with envy to see those lips of Parthian-red opening on her pearly teeth, and see her pure perfect body.

Cathbad placed his hand on the woman’s belly and the baby wriggled under it.

“Yes,” he said, “there is a girl there. Derdriu shall be her name. She will bring evil.”

Then the daughter was born and Cathbad said:

*Much damage, Derdriu, will follow your high fame and fair visage:
Ulster in your time tormented, demure daughter of Fedlimid.

And later, too, jealousy will dog you, woman like a flame, and later still—listen well—
the three sons of Uisliu exiled.

2. A word of doubtful meaning. It has been suggested that it derives from “Parthica”—Parthian leather dyed scarlet.
Then again, in your lifetime,
a bitter blow struck in Emain.
Remorse later for that ruin wrought by the great son of Roech:

Fergus exiled out of Ulster through your fault, fatal woman, and the much-wept deadly wound of Fíachná, Conchobor's son.

Your fault also, fatal woman,
Gerrce felled, Illadan's son,
and a crime that no less cries out,
the son of Durthacht, Eogan, struck.

Harsh, hideous deeds done in anger at Ulster's high king, and little graves everywhere
—a famous tale, Derdriu.

"Kill the child!" the warriors said.
"No," Conchobor said. "The girl will be taken away tomorrow. I'll have her reared for me. This woman I'll keep to myself."

The men of Ulster didn't dare speak against him.

And so it was done. She was reared by Conchobor and grew into the loveliest woman in all Ireland. She was kept in a place set apart, so that no Ulsterman might see her until she was ready for Conchobor's bed. No one was allowed in the enclosure but her foster-father and her foster-mother, and Leborcham, tall and crooked, a satirist, who couldn't be kept out.

One day in winter, the girl's foster-father was skinning a milk-fed calf on the snow outside, to cook it for her. She saw a raven drinking the blood on the snow. She said to Leborcham:

"I could desire a man who had those three colors there: hair like the raven, cheeks like blood and his body like snow."

"Good luck and success to you!" Leborcham said. "He isn't too far away, but close at hand—Noisiu, Uisliu's son."

"I'll be ill in that case," she said, "until I see him." This man Noisiu was chanting by himself one time near Emain, on the rampart of the stronghold.
The chanting of the sons of Uisliu was very sweet. Every cow or beast that heard it gave two-thirds more milk. Any person hearing it was filled with peace and music. Their deeds in war were great also: if the whole province of Ulster came at them at once, they could put their three backs together and not be beaten, their parrying and defense were so fine. Besides this they were swift as hounds in the chase, killing the wild beasts in flight.

While Noisiu was out there alone, therefore, she slipped out quickly to him and made as though to pass him and not recognize him.

"That is a fine heifer going by," he said.
"As well it might," she said. "The heifers grow big where there are no bulls."

3. Fergus, a great hero of Ulster. One consequence of this episode is that he will side with Con-nacht in the war against Ulster.
4. Through fear that her verses might bring harm.
Leborcham, as a satirist, would have more than usual freedom.
5. Emain Macha [ev-in-ma-cha], Conchobor's royal stronghold.
"You have the bull of this province all to yourself," he said, "the king of Ulster."
"Of the two," she said, "I'd pick a game young bull like you."
"You couldn't," he said. "There is Cathbad's prophecy."
"Are you rejecting me?"
"I am," he said.
Then she rushed at him and caught the two ears of his head.
"Two ears of shame and mockery," she said, "if you don't take me with you."
"Woman, leave me alone!" he said.
"You will do it," she said, binding him.6
A shrill cry escaped him at that. The men of Ulster nearby, when they heard it, started up staring at each other. Uisliu's other sons went out to quieten their brother.
"What is wrong?" they said. "Whatever it is, Ulstermen shouldn't kill each other for it."
He told them what had happened.
"Evil will come of this," the warriors said. "But even so, you won't be shamed as long as we live. We can bring her with us to some other place. There's no king in Ireland who would deny us a welcome."
They decided on that. They left that night, with three times fifty warriors and three times fifty women and the same of hounds and menials. Derdriu was among them, mingling with the rest.
They traveled about Ireland for a long time, under protection. Conchobor tried to destroy them often with ambushes and treachery. They went round southwestward from the red cataract at Es Ruaid, and to the promontory at Benn Etair, northeastward. But still the men of Ulster pursued them until they crossed the sea to the land of Alba.7
They settled there in the waste places. When the mountain game failed them they turned to take the people's cattle. A day came when the people of Alba went out to destroy them. Then they offered themselves to the king of Alba, who accepted them among his people as hired soldiers. They set their houses on the green. They built their houses so that no one could see in at the girl in case there might be killing on her account.
It happened that a steward came looking around their house early one morning. He saw the couple sleeping. Then he went and woke the king:
"I never found a woman fit for you until today," he said. "There is a woman with Noisiu mac Uislenn who is fit for a king over the Western World. If you have Noisiu killed, you can have the woman to sleep with," the steward said.
"No," the king said, "but go and ask her every day in secret."
He did this, but every day he came she told Noisiu about it that night. Since nothing could be done with her, the sons of Uisliu were ordered into all kinds of traps and dangerous battles to have them killed. But they were so hard in the carnage that nothing came of it.
They tried her one last time. Then the men of Alba were called together to kill them. She told Noisiu this.
"Go away from here," she said. "If you don't leave here this night, you will be dead tomorrow."

6. The words 'binding him' are not in the text. Her words put Noisiu under bond, or geasa, to do what she asked.
7. This means Britain generally.
So they left that night and reached an island in the sea.

This news reached Ulster.

"Conchobor," everyone said, "it would be shameful if the sons of Uisliu fell in enemy lands by the fault of a bad woman. Better to forgive and protect them—to save their lives and let them come home—than for enemies to lay them low."

"Let them come," Conchobor said. "Send for them, with guarantees of safety."

This news was brought to them.

"It is welcome," they said. "We'll go if Fergus comes as a pledge of safety, and Dubthach and Conchobor's son Cormac."

Then they went down with the messengers to the sea.

So they were brought back to Ireland. But Fergus was stopped through Conchobor's cunning. He was invited to a number of ale feasts and, by an old oath, couldn't refuse. The sons of Uisliu had sworn they would eat no food in Ireland until they ate Conchobor's food first, so they were bound to go on. Fiacha, Fergus's son, went on with them, while Fergus and Dubthach stayed behind. The sons of Uisliu came to the green at Emain. Eogan mac Durthacht, king of Fernmag, was there: he had come to make peace with Conchobor, with whom he had long been at enmity. He had been chosen to kill them. Conchobor's hired soldiers gathered around him so that the sons of Uisliu couldn't reach him. They stood in the middle of the green. The women settled on the ramparts of Emain.

Eogan crossed the green with his men. Fergus's son came and stood at Noisiu's side. Eogan welcomed Noisiu with the hard thrust of a great spear that broke his back. Fergus's son grasped Noisiu in his two arms and pulled him down and threw himself across him, and Noisiu was finished off through Fergus's son's body. Then the slaughter broke out all over the green. No one left except by spike of spear or slash of sword. Derdriu was brought over to Conchobor and stood beside him with her hands bound at her back.

Fergus was told of this, and Dubthach and Cormac. They came at once and did mighty deeds. Dubthach killed Maine, Conchobor's son. Fiacna, son of Conchobor's daughter Fedelm, was killed with a single thrust. Fergus killed Traigthren, Traiglethan's son, and his brother. Conchobor was outraged, and on a day soon afterward battle was joined between them, and three hundred among the men of Ulster fell. Before morning Dubthach had massacred the girls of Ulster and Fergus had burned Emain.

Then they went to Connacht, to Ailill and Medb—not that this was a home for Ulstermen, but that they knew these two would protect them. A full three thousand the exiles numbered. For sixteen years they made sure that weeping and trembling never died away in Ulster; there was weeping and trembling at their hands every single night. She was kept a year by Conchobor. In that time she never gave one smile, nor took enough food or sleep, nor lifted up her head from her knees. If they sent musicians to her, she would say this following poem:

Sweet in your sight the fiery stride of raiding men returned to Emain.
More nobly strode the three proud,
sons of Uisliu toward their home:
Noisiu bearing the best mead
—I would wash him by the fire—
Ardan, with a stag or a boar,
Anle, shouldering his load.

The son of Nes, battle-proud,
drinks, you say, the choicest mead.
Choicer still—a brimming sea—
I have taken frequently.

Modest Noisiu would prepare a cooking-pit in the forest floor.
Sweeter then than any meat
the son of Uisliu's, honey-sweet.

Though for you the times are sweet with pipers and with trumpeters,
I swear today I can't forget that I have known far sweeter airs.

Conchobor your king may take delight in pipers and in trumpeters
—I have known a sweeter thing,
the three sons' triumphant song.

Noisiu's voice a wave roar,
a sweet sound to hear forever;
Ardan's bright baritone;
Anle, the hunter's, high tenor.

Noisiu: his grave-mound is made and mournfully accompanied.
The highest hero—and I poured the deadly potion when he died.

His cropped gold fleece I loved,
and fine form—a tall tree.
Alas, I needn't watch today,
or wait for the son of Uisliu.

I loved the modest, mighty warrior, loved his fitting, firm desire, loved him at daybreak as he dressed by the margin of the forest.

Those blue eyes that melted women,
and menaced enemies, I loved;
them, with our forest journey done,
his chanting through the dark woods.

I don't sleep now,
nor redden my fingernails.
What have I to do with welcomes?
The son of Indel will not come.

I can't sleep,
lying there half the night.
These crowds—I am driven out of my mind.
I can neither eat nor smile.

What use for welcome have I now with all these nobles crowding Emain?
Comfortless, no peace nor joy,
nor mansion nor pleasant ornament.

If Conchobor tried to soothe her, she would chant this following poem:

Conchobor, what are you thinking, you that piled up sorrow over woe?
Truly, however long I live,
I cannot spare you much love.

The thing most dear to me in the world,
the very thing I most loved,
your harsh crime took from me.
I will not see him till I die.

I feel his lack, wearily, the son of Uisliu. All I see—black boulders on fair flesh
so bright once among the others.

Red-cheeked, sweet as the river-brink;
red-lipped; brows beetle-black;
pearly teeth gleaming bright with a noble snowy light.

His figure easiest to find,
bright among Alba's fighting-men
—a border made of red gold matched his handsome crimson cloak.

A soft multitude of jewels in the satin tunic—itself a jewel:
for decoration, all told,
fifty ounces of light gold.

He carried a gold-hilted sword and two javelins sharply tipped, a shield rimmed with yellow gold with a knob of silver at the middle.

8. The mother of the three sons.
Fergus did an injury bringing us over the great sea.
How his deeds of valor shrank
when he sold honor for a drink!

If all Ulster's warriors were gathered on this plain, Conchobor,
I would gladly give them all for Noisiu, son of Uisliu.

Break my heart no more today.
In a short while I'll be no more.
Grief is heavier than the sea,
if you were but wise, Conchobor.

"What do you see that you hate most?" Conchobor said.
"You, surely," she said, "and Eogan mac Durlacht!"
"Go and live for a year with Eogan, then," Conchobor said.
Then he sent her over to Eogan.

They set out the next day for the fair of Macha. She was behind Eogan in the chariot. She had sworn that two men alive in the world together would never have her.

"This is good, Derdriu," Conchobor said. "Between me and Eogan you are a sheep eyeing two rams."
A big block of stone was in front of her. She let her head be driven against the stone, and made a mass of fragments of it, and she was dead.

THOMAS OF ENGLAND

The tragic love story of Tristran and Ysolt, the wife of Tristran's maternal uncle King Mark, derives mainly from Breton, Welsh, and Irish sources although it also incorporates motifs of eastern tales that were probably transmitted to Europe from India via Arabic Spain. The romance of Tristran and Ysolt entered the mainstream of Western European literature through the Old French version in octosyllabic couplets by a twelfth-century author who identifies himself only as "Thomas" and of whom practically nothing else is known for certain. Only 3,143 lines (roughly a sixth) of the poem survive in nine separate fragments. But we can reconstruct the story from the Tristrams saga (1226), a relatively faithful translation into Old Norse, and the Middle High German adaptation Tristan und Isolde (also early thirteenth century) by Gottfried von Strassburg, who names the author of his major source "Thomas of Britain."

Thomas's Tristran is written in a dialect of western France containing Anglo-Norman forms; he is likely to have composed the romance for the court of Henry II.
Borrowings from Wace's Brut (see pp. 120—24) prove that he wrote after 1155, probsibly some time before 1170. As Thomas himself tells his audience, "My lords, this tale is told in many ways." Comparisons with other early versions in French and German suggest that he was following a lost text from which he eliminated episodes he considered improbable or coarse and to which he added new courtly and psychological dimensions. Thomas's work proved enormously influential not only by way of Gottfried's important poem (the source of Richard Wagner's opera Tristan und Isolde), but it may well have provided the inspiration and model for the love affair of Lancelot and Guinevere. That relationship first appears (already in progress) in Chretien de Troye’s romance The Knight of the Cart (see “King Arthur,” at Norton Literature Online).

The romance of Tristran was drawn into the orbit of Arthurian romance where Sir Tristran is the only knight who can match Sir Lancelot. After fighting a five-hour duel to a draw, they become fast friends. Tristran is thus a champion in war and tournaments, but in Thomas and in other Tristran romances he has other attributes as well: he is a master of the hunt, chess, and several languages; he is a gifted harp player; and he and Ysolt make an expert team in the art of deceiving a jealous husband.

Tristran starts life as an orphan. His own story is preceded by the romance of his parents: Rivalen and Blancheflor, the sister of King Mark. Rivalen is killed in battle before Tristran’s birth; Blancheflor dies in childbirth. Tristran is fostered by his father’s steward until he is kidnapped by merchants who lure the handsome youth aboard their ship to play chess and then set sail. A storm they blame on the kidnapping causes them to strand the youth on a deserted coast of his uncle’s kingdom. Tristran’s gifts and charm lead Mark to adopt him as a trusted servant, who is identified as his nephew when Tristran’s foster-father arrives at the court in search of him. Mark contracts to marry the king of Ireland’s daughter Ysolt and sends Tristran to escort the bride to England. On the return voyage, Tristran and Ysolt become lovers after they unwittingly drink a love potion her mother had prepared for Ysolt and Mark. On Ysolt’s wedding night, her maid Brengvein takes her place in the marriage bed. Tristran and Ysolt scheme repeatedly to meet secretly and devise ways to allay Mark’s suspicions and frustrate his attempts to surprise them. Finally, however, Tristran is exiled from Britain for good and pursues wars on the Continent. Eventually, fearing that Ysolt no longer loves him and hoping that he will get over his love for her, he marries a second Ysolt, “Ysolt of the White Hands,” the sister of Tristran’s young friend and admirer Caerdin. Tristran, however, cannot bring himself to consummate the marriage, and the second Ysolt remains an unwilling virgin. When Tristran is wounded by a poisoned spear, Caerdin sets sail for England to fetch the first Ysolt who alone has it in her power to save Tristran’s life.

Medieval people believed that given names sometimes foreshadowed one’s destiny, and the French authors of Tristran’s story interpreted trist, the Celtic root of the name, as French triste (sad). The sense of a tragic illicit love whose passion finds an ultimate fulfillment in death haunts the story of Tristran and Ysolt in Thomas and in the different versions that derive from it.

The geography of the Tristran romances varies from version to version. Tristran’s homeland Lyonesse may originally have been Lothian in Scotland. In Marie de France’s Chevrefoil (see pp. 155—57), it is in Wales. In Thomas it is Brittany, and the sea voyages across the English Channel and Irish Sea are episodes in which the sea itself plays a pivotal and symbolic role. The names Tristran and Ysolt vary according to the language of different versions. They are adopted here from the translation by A. T. Hatto (1960).

From Le Roman de Tristran

[THE DEATHS OF TRISTRAN AND YSOLT]

When Ysolt hears this message there is anguish in her heart, and pain, and sorrow, and grief—never yet has she known greater. Now she ponders deeply, and sighs and longs for Tristran, her lover. But she does not know how to come to him. She goes to speak with Brengvein. She tells her the whole story of the poisoned wound, the pain he is in and the misery, and how he lies there languishing, how and through whom he has sent for her—else his wound will never be healed. She has described all his torment and then asks advice what to do. And as they talk there begins a sighing, complaining, and weeping, and pain, sorrow, sadness, and grief, for the pity which they have on his account. Nevertheless they have discussed the matter and finally decide to set out on their journey and go away with Caerdin to treat Tristran’s illness and succour him in his need.

They make ready towards evening and take what they will require. As soon as the others are all asleep, they leave very stealthily under cover of night by a lucky postern in the wall overlooking the Thames. The water has come up to it with the rising tide. The boat is all ready and the Queen has gone aboard it. They row, they sail with the ebb—quickly they fly before the wind. They make a mighty effort and keep on rowing till they are alongside the big ship. They hoist the yard and then they sail. They run before the waves as long as they have wind behind them. They coast along the foreign land past the port of Wissant, and then Boulogne, and Treport. The wind is strong and favourable and the ship that bears them is fleet. They sail past Normandy. They sail happily and joyfully, since they have the wind they want.

Tristran lies on his bed languishing of his wound. He can find no succour in anything. Medicine cannot avail him; nothing that he does affords him any aid. He longs for the coming of Ysolt, desiring nothing else. Without her he can have no ease—it is because of her that he lives so long. There, in his bed, he pines and he waits for her. He has high hopes that she will come and heal his malady, and believes that he will not live without her. Each day he sends to the shore to see if the ship is returning, with no other wish in his heart. And many is the time that he commands his bed to be made beside the sea and has himself carried out to it, to await and see the ship—what way she is making, and with what sail? He has no desire for anything, except for the coming of Ysolt: his whole mind, wall, and desire are set on it. Whatever the world holds he rates of no account unless the Queen is coming to him. Then he has himself carried back again from the fear which he anticipates, for he dreads that she may not come, may not keep her faith with him, and he would much rather hear it from another than see the ship come without her. He longs to look out for the ship, but does not wish to know it, should she fail to come. There is anguish in his heart, and he is full of desire to see her. He often laments to his wife but does not tell her what he longs for, apart from Caerdin, who does not come. Seeing him delay so long Tristran greatly fears that Caerdin has failed in his mission.

Now listen to a pitiful disaster and a most sad mishap which must touch the hearts of all lovers! You never heard tell of greater sorrow arising from such love and such desire. Just there where Tristran is waiting and the lady is eager to arrive and has drawn close enough to see the land—gay they are on board and they sail lightheartedly—a wind springs up from the south and strikes them full in the middle of the yard, checking the whole ship in its course. The crew run to luff and turn the sail, they turn about whether they wish to or not. The wind gains in force and raises the swell, the deep begins to stir; the weather grows foul and the air thick, the waves rise, the sea grows black, it rains and sleet as the storm increases. Bowlines and shrouds snap. They lower the yard and drift along with the wind and waves. They had put out their boat on the sea, since they were close to their own country, but by ill luck they forgot it and a wave has smashed it to pieces. This at least they have now lost, and the tempest has grown so in violence that the best of sailors could never have kept his feet. All on board weep and lament and give vent to great grief, so afraid are they.

"Alas, poor me," cried Ysolt. "God does not wish me to live until I see my lover Tristran.—He wants me to be drowned in the sea! Tristran, if only I had spoken with you, I would not mind if I had then died. Dear love, when you hear that I am dead I know you will never again be consoled. You will be so afflicted by my death, following your long-drawn sufferings, that you will never be well again. My coming does not rest with me. God willing, I would come and take charge of your wound. For I have no other sorrow than that you are without aid; this is my sorrow and my grief. And I am very sad at heart, my friend, that you will have no support against death, when I die. My own death matters nothing to me—if God wills it, so be it. But when at last you learn of it, my love, I know that you will die of it. Such is our love, I can feel no grief unless you are in it. You cannot die without me, nor can I perish without you.
If I am to be shipwrecked at sea, then you, too, must drown. But you cannot drown on dry land, so you have come to sea to seek me! I see your death before my eyes and know that I am soon to die. Dear friend, I fail in my desire, since I hoped to die in your arms and to be buried in one coffin with you. But now we have failed to achieve it. Yet it may still happen so: for if I am to drown here, and you, as I think, must also drown, a fish could swallow us, and so, my love, by good fortune we should share one sepulture, since it might be captured by someone who would recognize our bodies and do them the high honour befitting our love. But what I am saying cannot be.—Yet if God wills it, it must be!—But what would you be seeking on the sea? I do not know what you could be doing here. Nevertheless I am here, and here shall I die. I shall drown here, Tristran, without you. Yet it is a sweet comfort to me, my darling, that you will not know of my death. From henceforward it will never be known and I do not know who should tell it. You will live long after me and await my coming. If it please God you may be healed—that is what I most desire. I long for your recovery more than that I should come ashore. So truly do I love you, dear friend, that I must fear after my death, if you recover, lest you forget me during your lifetime or console yourself with another woman, Tristran, when I am dead. My love, I am indeed much afraid of Ysolt of the White Hands, at least. I do not know whether I ought to fear her; but, if you were to die before me, I would not long survive you. I do not know at all what to do, but you I do desire above all things. God grant we come together so that I may heal you, love, or that we two may die of one anguish!"

As long as the storm endures Ysolt gives vent to her sorrow and grief. The storm and foul weather last on the sea for five days and more; then the wind drops and it is fair. They have hoisted the white sail and are making good speed, when Caerdin espies the coast of Brittany. At this they are gay and light-hearted, they raise the sail right up so that it can be seen what sail it is, the white or the black. Caerdin wished to show its colour from afar, since it was the last day of the term that lord Tristran had assigned when they had set out for England.

While they are happily sailing, there is a spell of warm weather and the wind drops so that they can make no headway. The sea is very smooth and still, the ship moves neither one way nor the other save so far as the swell draws it.
They are also without their boat. And now they are in great distress. They see the land close ahead of them, but have no wind with which to reach it. And so up and down they go drifting, now back, now forward. They cannot make any progress and are very badly impeded. Ysolt is much afflicted by it. She sees the land she has longed for and yet she cannot reach it: she all but dies of her longing. Those in the ship long for land, but the wind is too light for them. Time and again, Ysolt laments her fate. Those on the shore long for the ship, but they have not seen it yet. Thus Tristran is wretched and sorrowful, he often laments and sighs for Ysolt, whom he so much desires. The tears flow from his eyes, he writhes about, he all but dies of longing.

While Tristran endures such affliction, his wife Ysolt comes and stands before him. Meditating great guile she says: "Caerdin is coming, my love! I have seen his ship on the sea. I saw it making hardly any headway but nevertheless I could see it well enough to know that it is his. God grant it brings news that will comfort you at heart!"

Tristran starts up at this news. "Do you know for sure that it is his ship, my darling?" he asks. "Tell me now, what sort of sail is it?"

"I know it for a fact!" answered Ysolt. "Let me tell you, the sail is all black! They have hoisted it and raised it up high because they have no wind!"

At this Tristran feels such pain that he has never had greater nor ever will, and he turns his face to the wall and says: "God save Ysolt and me! Since you will not come to me I must die for your love. I can hold on to life no longer. I die for you, Ysolt, dear love! You have no pity for my sufferings, but you will have sorrow of my death. It is a great solace to me that you will have pity for my death."

Three times did he say "Dearest Ysolt." At the fourth he rendered up his spirit.

Thereupon throughout the house the knights and companions weep. Their cries are loud, their lament is great. Knights and sergeants rise to their feet and bear him from his bed, then lay him upon a cloth of samite and cover him with a striped pall.

And now the wind has risen on the sea. It strikes the middle of the sailyard and brings the ship to land. Ysolt has quickly disembarked, she hears the great laments in the street and the bells from the minsters and chapels. She asks people what news? and why they toll the bells so? and the reason for their weeping? Then an old man answers: "My lady, as God help me, we have greater sorrow than people ever had before. Gallant, noble Tristran, who was a source of strength to the whole realm, is dead! He was generous to the needy, a great succour to the wretched. He has died just now in his bed of a wound that his body received. Never did so great a misfortune befall this realm!"

As soon as Ysolt heard this news she was struck dumb with grief. So afflicted is she that she goes up the street to the palace in advance of the others, without her cloak. The Bretons have never seen a woman of her beauty; in the city they wonder whence she comes and who she may be. Ysolt goes to where she sees his body lying, and, turning towards the east, she prays for him piteously.

"Tristran, my love, now that I see you dead, it is against reason for me to live longer. You died for my love, and I, love, die of grief, for I could not come in time to heal you and your wound. My love, my love, nothing shall ever console me for your death, neither joy nor pleasure nor any delight. May this storm be accursed that so delayed me on the sea, my sweetheart, so that I could not come! Had I arrived in time, I would have given you back your life and spoken gently to you of the love there was between us. I should have bewailed our fate, our joy, our rapture, and the great sorrow and pain that have been in our loving. I should have reminded you of this and kissed you and embraced you. If I had failed to cure you, then we could have died together. But since I could not come in time and did not hear what had happened and have come and found you dead, I shall console myself by drinking of the same cup. You have forfeited your life on my account, and I shall do as a true lover: I will die for you in return!"

She takes him in her arms and then, lying at full length, she kisses his face and lips and clasps him tightly to her. Then straining body to body, mouth to mouth, she at once renders up her spirit and of sorrow for her lover dies thus at his side.

Tristran died of his longing, Ysolt because she could not come in time. Tristran died for his love; fair Ysolt because of tender pity.

Here Thomas ends his book. Now he takes leave of all lovers, the sad and the amorous, the jealous and the desirous, the gay and the distraught, and all who will hear these lines. If I have not pleased all with my tale, I have told it to the best of my power and have narrated the whole truth, as I promised at the beginning. Here I have recounted the story in rhyme, and have done this to hold up an example, and to make this story more beautiful, so that it may please lovers, and that, here and there, they may find some things to take to heart. May they derive great comfort from it, in the face of fickleness and injury, in the face of hardship and grief, in the face of all the wiles of Love.

Much of twelfth-century French literature was composed in England in the Anglo-Norman dialect (see p. 8). Prominent among the earliest poets writing in the French vernacular, who shaped the genres, themes, and styles of later medieval European poetry, is the author who, in an epilogue to her Fables, calls herself Marie de France. That signature tells us only that her given name was Marie and that she was born in France, but circumstantial evidence from her writings shows that she spent much of her life in England. A reference to her in a French poem written in England around 1180 speaks of "dame Marie" who wrote "lais" much loved and praised, read, and heard by counts, barons, and knights and indicates that her poems also appealed to ladies who listened to them gladly and joyfully.

Three works can be safely attributed to Marie, probably written in the following order: the Lais [English "lay" refers to a short narrative poem in verse], the Fables, and St. Patrick's Purgatory. Marie's twelve lays are short romances (they range from 118 to 1,184 lines), each of which deals with a single event or crisis in the affairs of noble lovers. In her prologue, Marie tells us that she had heard these performed, and in several of the lays she refers to the Breton language and Breton storytellers—that is, professional minstrels from the French province of Brittany or the Celtic parts of Great Britain. Because no sources of Marie's stories have survived, it is not possible to determine the exact nature of the materials she worked from, but they were probably oral and were presented with the accompaniment of a stringed instrument. Marie's lays provide the basis of the genre that came to be known as the "Breton lay." In the prologue Marie dedicates the work to a "noble king," who is most likely to have been Henry II of England, who reigned from 1154 to 1189.

The portrait of the author that emerges from the combination of these works is of a highly educated noblewoman, proficient in Latin and English as well as her native French, with ideas of her own and a strong commitment to writing. Scholars have proposed several Maries of the period who fit this description to identify the author. A likely candidate is Marie, abbess of Shaftesbury, an illegitimate daughter of Geoffrey of Anjou and thus half-sister of Henry II. Correct or not, such an identification points to the milieu in which Marie moved and to the kind of audience she was addressing.

Many of Marie’s lays contain elements of magic and mystery. Medieval readers would recognize that Lanval is about a mortal lover and a fairy bride, although the word “fairy” is not used in the tale. In the Middle Ages fairies were not thought of as the small creatures they became in Elizabethan and later literature. Fairies are supernatural, sometimes dangerous, beings who possess magical powers and inhabit another world. Their realm in some respects resembles the human (fairies have kings and queens), and fairies generally keep to themselves and disappear when humans notice them. But the tales are often about crossovers between the human and fairy worlds. Chaucer’s Wife of Bath’s Tale is such a story. In Lanval the female fairy world eclipses King Arthur’s chivalric court (which Marie had read about in Wace’s Roman de Brut) in splendor, riches, and generosity.

Chevrefoil, the shortest of Marie’s lays, tells of a brief encounter between Tristran and Ysolt. The lay exemplifies the pain of their separation as well as the stratagems by which the lovers are forced to communicate and meet. The title refers to an image from the natural world that serves as a symbol of the inextricable and fatal character of the love that binds them to one another. With Chretien de Troyes, Marie is among the twelfth-century writers who made love the means of analyzing the individual’s relation to his or her society. The only woman writer known to be among the creators of this literature, Marie explores both female and male desire. Her lays portray different kinds of love relationships, both favorably and unfavorably, with both happy and tragic resolutions. They resist reduction to a pattern.

Two Middle English versions of Marie’s Lanval exist, but we prefer to offer a modern verse translation of the original. Marie wrote in eight-syllable couplets, which was the standard form of French narrative verse, employed also by Wace and Chretien de Troyes. Here is what the beginning of Marie’s prologue to the Lais says about her view of a writer’s duty and, implicitly, of her own talent:

  Ki Deu ad dune esci’ence  He to whom God has given knowledge
  E de parler bon’ eloquence  And the gift of speaking eloquently,
  Ne s’en deit taisir ne celer,  Must not keep silent nor conceal the gift, Ainz se deit volunters mustrer.  But he must willingly display it.
```

On all his noble baronage—
That is the knights of the Round Table (In all the world none are so able).
Wives and land he gave in fee
To knights who served in his meiny,
Except for one: that was Lanval,
Nor did his men like him at all.
They envied him his handsomeness,
His courage, prowess, and largesse.
There were a few who made a show
Of friendship, but in case some blow
Of fortune were to cause him pain
They'd have no reason to complain.
Although a king's son of great worth,
He was far from his place of birth.
As one of the king's company
He spent all of his property,
For he got nothing from the king
And would not ask for anything.
Now Lanval is much preoccupied,
Gloomy, seeing the darker side.
My lords, you should not think it rare,
A newcomer is full of care
When he comes to a foreign land
And finds no help from any hand.
The knight whose tale I want to tell,
Who served King Arthur very well,
Mounting upon his steed one day,
For pleasure's sake set on his way.
Outside the town he went to ride
Alone into the countryside.
He got off by a running brook,
But there his horse trembled and shook.
He unlaced the saddle and moved away,
Left the horse in the meadow to roam and play.
He folded up his riding gown
To make a pillow and lay down.
He broods about his woeful plight;
Nothing can make his spirit light.
As he lies there ill at ease
He looks down to the bank and sees
Two maidens approaching on the green,
The fairest he had ever seen.
Their clothes were in expensive taste,
Close-fitting tunics, tightly laced,
Made of deep-dyed purple wool.
Their faces were most beautiful.
The older of the two conveyed
Gold washing basins, finely made.

2. Animals are believed to have a sixth sense that detects the presence of otherworldly beings.
The other, a towel—I won't fail
To tell the truth in each detail. 3

The two of them went straightaway
Right to the spot where the knight lay.
Lanval, the soul of courtesy,
Rose to his feet immediately.
They greeted him first by his name

And told the reason why they came.
"My lady, Sir Lanval, who is so free,
Beautiful, wise, and praiseworthy,
Ordered us to come for you,
For she herself has come here, too.

We shall bring you safely to her:
See, her pavilion is over there."
The knight went with them; he paid no mind
To the horse in the meadow he left behind.
The tent to which they bring the knight
Was fairly pitched, a beauteous sight.
Not Queen Semiramis of yore,
Had she commanded even more Wisdom, wealth, and power, nor Octavian, the emperor,
Would have been rich enough to pay
For the right-hand flap of the entryway.
On top was set an eagle of gold,
The cost of which cannot be told,
Nor of the cords and poles which brace
That structure and hold it in place.
No earthly king could own this tent
For any treasure that he spent.
Inside the tent the maiden was:
Not rose nor lily could surpass
Her beauty when they bloom in May.
The sumptuous bed on which she lay
Was beautiful. The drapes and tassel,
Sheets and pillows were worth a castle.
The single gown she wore was sheer
And made her shapely form appear.
She'd thrown, in order to keep warm,
An ermine stole over her arm,
White fur with the lining dyed
Alexandrian purple. But her side,
Her face, her neck, her bosom
Showed whiter than the hawthorn blossom.
The knight moved toward the bed's head.
She asked him to sit down and said,
"Lanval, fair friend, for you I've come,
For you I've traveled far from home.
If you are brave and courteous,
You'll be more glad and prosperous
Than ever was emperor or king,
For I love you over everything.*

Her loveliness transfixed his gaze.
Love pierced his eyes with its bright rays,
Set fire to and scorched his heart.
He gave fair answer on his part.
"Lady," he said, "if this should be
Your wish (and such joy meant for me),
To have me for your paramour,
There's no command, you may be sure,
Wise or foolish, what you will,
Which I don't promise to fulfill.
I'll follow only your behest.
For you I'll give up all the rest."
When the lady heard him say
That he would love her in this way,
She presented him her heart
And her body, every part.
Now Lanval has taken the right road!
This gift she afterwards bestowed:
Whatsoever thing he wanted
She promised him that she would grant it—
Money, as fast as he can spend it,
No matter how much, she will send it.
The more largesse he gives, the more
Gold and silver in his store.
Now Sir Lanval is harbored well.
To him then spoke the damoiselle:
"Ami" she said, "please understand,
I warn and pray you and command:
You must never tell anyone
About the love that you have won.
The consequence I shall declare:
Should people learn of this affair,
You shall never again see me,
Nor have my body in your fee."
He promised her that he would do Whatever thing she told him to.
He lay beside her on the bed:
Now is Lanval well bestead.
He stayed with her all afternoon
Until it would be evening soon
And gladly would have stayed all night
Had she consented that he might.
But she told him, "Rise up, Ami.
You may no longer stay with me.
Get on your way; I shall remain."
But one thing I will tell you plain:
When you would like to talk to me
At any rendezvous that's free

4. Literally "friend," but used as a term of endearment for a lover. The feminine form is amie.
Of blame or of unseemliness,
Where one his true love may possess,
I shall attend you at your will
All your wishes to fulfill.
These words gave him great happiness.
He kissed her, then got up to dress.
The damsels who had brought him there
Gave him expensive clothes to wear.
This world has no such comely squire
As Lanval in his new attire.
He was no simpleton or knave.
Water to wash his hands they gave,
Also the towel with which he dried,
His love ate supper with Lanval,
A thing he did not mind at all.
They served him with great courtesy,
Which he accepted with much glee.
There were many special dishes
That the knight found most delicious.
There was also an interval
Which gave great pleasure to Lanval.
And many times the gallant knight
Kissed his love and held her tight.
At last after the meal was cleared,
Lanval's horse again appeared.
It had been saddled with utmost care:
He found the service beyond compare.
He took his leave, mounted the horse,
Back toward town he held his course.
Often Lanval looks to his rear,
And he is very much in fear.
As he rides he thinks about
What happened and is assailed by doubt.
He can't be certain if or when
He'll ever see his love again.
Arrived back home, Sir Lanval sees
His men dressed in new liveries.
That night the lavish host he plays,
But no one knows from whence he pays.
There is no knight of any sort
In need of lodging or support
Whom Lanval doesn't make his guest
And serves him richly of the best.
Lanval gives expensive presents;
Lanval remits the captive's sentence;
Lanval puts minstrels in new dress;
Lanval does honors in excess.
There is no stranger or private friend
On whom Lanval does not spend.

5. French entremets: a side dish served between main courses; an interlude between acts. Marie may well intend a double-entendre involving both meanings.
He lives in joy and in delight,
Whether it be by day or night.

He sees his lady often and
Has all the world at his command.

That same summer, I would say,
After the feast of St. John's Day,

Thirty knights made an excursion,
For the sake of their diversion,

To a garden beneath the tower
In which the queen had her bower.

Among that party was Gawain
And his cousin, the good Yvain.

Sir Gawain spoke, brave and sincere,
Whom everybody held so dear,

"By God, my lords, we've not done right
By our companion, that good knight—

Lanval, liberal in everything,
And his father is a wealthy king—

To leave that nobleman behind."
And straightway they turn back and find

Sir Lanval at his residence
And beg that they might take him thence.

From a window with fine molding
The queen herself leaned out beholding

(Waited on by damsels three)
King Arthur's festive company.

She gazed at Lanval and knew him well.
She called out to one damoiselle

And sent her for her maids-in-waiting,
The fairest and most captivating.

With her into the garden then
They went to relax with the men.

Thirty she took along and more,
Down the stairs and out the door.

Rejoiced to have the ladies meet them,
The gentlemen advance to greet them.

Each girl by a knight's hand is led:
Such pleasant talk is not ill-bred.

Lanval goes off alone and turns
Aside from all the rest. He yearns

To hold his love within his arms,
To kiss, embrace, and feel her charms.

The joy of others is less pleasant
To him, his own not being present.

When she perceives him stand alone,
The queen straightway to him has gone

To sit beside him and reveals
All the passion that she feels:

"Lanval, I've honored you sincerely,
Have cherished you and loved you dearly.
All my love is at your disposal.
What do you say to my proposal?

Your mistress I consent to be;
You should receive much joy from me."
"Lady," he said, "hold me excused Because your love must be refused.
I've served the king for many a day;
My faith to him I won't betray.
Never for love, and not for you,
Would I be to my lord untrue."
Made angry by these words, the queen
Insultingly expressed her spleen.
"Lanval," she said, "it's evident
That to such pleasures you have no bent.
Often I have heard men aver
That women are not what you prefer.
But you have many pretty boys
With whom you like to take your joys.
Faithless coward of low degree,
My lord was badly served when he Suffered your person to come near.
For that he could lose God, I fear."
Hearing this, Lanval was dismayed;
His answer was not long delayed.
With spite, as he was much upset,
He spoke what soon he would regret.
"My lady queen," was his retort,
"I know nothing about that sport.
But I love one, and she loves me;
From every woman I know of, she Deserves to bear the prize away.
And one more thing I wish to say,
So that you may know it plain:
Each serving-maid in her domain,
The poorest of her household crew,
My lady, is worth more than you
In beauty of both figure and face,
In good breeding and bounteous grace."
In tears the queen at once repairs
Back to her chamber up the stairs.
Dolorous she is and mortified
To be by him thus villified.
She goes to bed where sick she lies,
Vowing never again to rise,
Unless the king grants her redress
For that which caused her such distress.
The king had come back from the wood
Cheerful because the day was good.
He entered the bedroom of the queen,
Who, seeing him, broke out in spleen.
Fallen at his feet, she cried, "Merci!
Lanval has done me infamy."
To be her lover he had affected.
When his advances were rejected,
An exclamation appealing for compassion and favor.
He had reviled her shamefully
And boasted he had an amie
So chic, noble, and proud, he said,
That even her lowliest chambermaid,
The poorest one that might be seen,
Was worthier than she—the queen.
The king grew marvelously wroth,
And solemnly he swore an oath:

Unless the knight proved what he'd boasted,
The king would have him hanged or roasted.
Leaving the chamber, the king then Summoned three of his noblemen.

Who, feeling enough of grief and woe,
Had gone back home, being well aware,
That he had spoiled the whole affair.
Since he had told of their amour,
He had lost his love for sure.

In his room alone he languished,
Melancholy and sorely anguished.
He calls his love time and again,
But all his pleadings are in vain.
Sighs he utters and complaints,

And from time to time he faints.
A hundred times he cries merci
And begs her speak to her ami.
He cursed his tongue like one demented;
It is a wonder what prevented

Him from committing suicide;
But though he beat himself and cried,
She would not show him any grace,
Even so much as show her face
That he might see her once again.

Alas, how can he bear the pain?
The king's men have arrived to say
He must to court without delay.
The king had summoned him for this reason:
The queen had charged the knight with treason.

Lanval went with them very sadly.
Should he be killed, he'd bear it gladly.
The knight was brought before the king,
Grief-stricken, not saying anything,
Like someone in great misery.

The king spoke out indignantly:
"Vassal, you've played a churlish game
To do me injury and shame.
It was treason to demean
And speak slander to the queen

It was a foolish boast to call
Your love the noblest one of all,
And her servant—to declare her Worthier than the queen and fairer."
"Lanval protested, word for word,
Any dishonor done to his lord
Respecting the queen’s accusation
Of a guilty solicitation.
But of his speech—to give her due—
He confessed that it was true.

The mistress he had boasted of
He mourned, for he had lost her love.
Regarding that, he said he’d do
Whatever the court told him to.
This put the king in a great fury.

He summoned his knights to act as jury
To tell how to proceed by law
So none might catch him in a flaw.7
Ail obey the royal will,
Whether it suits them well or ill.

They met together to consult
And deemed and judged with this result:
A court day set, Lanval goes free
But must find pledges to guarantee
His lord that judgment he’ll abide,

Return to court and there be tried
By Arthur’s entire baronage.
Not just the palace entourage.8
Back to the king the barons bring
The judgment of their parleying.

The king demands his sureties.
Thus putting Lanval ill at ease.
A foreigner, he felt chagrin
Since he had neither friend nor kin.
Gawain stepped forth and pledged that he Would stand as Lanval’s surety.

And his companions in succession
Each one made the same profession.
The king replied, “He is in your hands
At risk to forfeit all your lands

And fiefs, whatever they may be,
Which each of you obtained from me."
The pledges made, the court adjourned,
And Lanval to his place returned.
The knights escort him on his way.

They admonish him and say
To shun excessive melancholy;
And they lay curses on love’s folly.
Worried about his mental state,
Each day they go investigate

Whether he takes nourishment
Or to himself is violent.
On the day that had been set,
All King Arthur’s barons met.

7. The trial of Lanval shows precise knowledge of twelfth-century legal procedure concerning the respective rights of the king and his barons.
8. The case is important enough to require judgment by all of Arthur’s vassals, not just the immediate household. Hence the delay of the trial.
Attending were the king and queen;

Pledges brought Lanval on the scene.

They were all sad on his account—

A hundred of them I could count

Who would have done their best to see

Him without trial go scot-free,

Since he was wrongfully arraigned.

On the charge, the king maintained,

And his response, he must be tried:

And now the barons must decide.

To the judgment they go next

Greatly worried and perplexed,

Since the noble foreign guest

In their midst is so hard-pressed.

Some were willing to condemn

To oblige their sovereign.

The Duke of Cornwall counseled thus:

"No fault shall be ascribed to us:

Though some show joy and some remorse,

Justice must take its lawful course.

A vassal by the king denounced,

Whose name—'Lanval—I heard pronounced,

Has been accused of felony

And charged that mischievously he

To a mistress had pretended

And Madame the Queen offended.

By the faith I owe you duly,

In this case, should one speak truly,

The king being the sole adversary,

No defense were necessary—

Save with respect to his lord's name,

A man must never speak him shame.

Sir Lanval by his oath must stand,

And the king quitclaim our land,

If the knight can guarantee

The coming here of his amie.

Should it prove true what he has claimed,

By which the queen felt so defamed,

Of that he'll be judged innocent,

Since he spoke without base intent.

But if he cannot prove it so,

In that case we must let him know,

All the king's service he must lose

And banished say his last adieus."

The knight was sent the court's decree

And informed by them that he Must summon his amie and send her

To be his witness and defender.

The knight responded that he could not:

9. Lanval's denial of the queen's accusation of improper advances (lines 369-72) is accepted, but he is nevertheless guilty of dishonoring his lord unless he can prove the claims about his mistress to which he has admitted.
To his rescue come she would not.
To the judges they made report
That he looked for no support.
The king pressed them to make an ending
And not to keep the queen attending.

When they came to enforce the law,
Two maidens from afar they saw
On two fine steeds, riding apace,
Who were extremely fair of face.
Of purple taffeta a sheath
They wore with nothing underneath.
The men took pleasure in these sights.
Sir Gawain and three of his knights
Went to Sir Lanval to report
And show the girls coming to court.
Happy, he asked him earnestly
If one of them were his amie.

He told them that he knew not who
They were, where from, or going to.
The damoiselles rode on withal
Upon their mounts into the hall,
And they got off before the dais
There where the king sat at his place.
Their features were of beauty rare;
Their form of speech was debonair:
"King, clear your chambers, if you please,
And hang them with silk draperies,
Where my lady may pause to rest,
For she wishes to be your guest.
The king gladly gave his consent.
Two of his courtiers he sent
To show them to their rooms upstairs.

No more was said of these affairs.
The king ordered his men at once
To give their sentence and response.
The long procrastination had,
He said, made him extremely mad.
"My lord," they answered, "we have acted.
But our attention was distracted
By those ladies we have seen.
But now the court shall reconvene."
They reassembled much perturbed,
By too much noise and strife disturbed.

While they engaged in this debate,
Two damoiselles of high estate—
In silks produced in Phrygia,
On mules from Andalusia—
Came riding up the street just then.
This gave great joy to Arthur’s men,
Who told each other this must be
The worthy Lanval’s remedy.
To him there hastened Sir Gawain
With his companions in his train.
"Sir knight," he said, "be of good cheer. For God's sake speak to us! See here, Two maidens are approaching us, Most beautiful and decorous;
Surely one must be your amie" Lanval made answer hastily. He said that he recognized neither. He didn't know or love them either. Meanwhile the damoiselles had gone
And dismounted before the throne Where the king was sitting on the dais. From many there they won great praise For figure, visage, and complexion. They came much nearer to perfection Than did the queen, so people said. The elder was courteous and well bred. She spoke her message with much flair: "King, tell your household to prepare A suite to lodge my lady, who Is coming here to speak with you." The king had them conducted where His men had lodged the previous pair. As soon as they were from him gone, He told his barons to have done And give their verdict right away. There had been far too much delay; The queen had found it most frustrating That they so long had kept her waiting. When they were just about to bring Judgment, a girl was entering The town, whose beauty, it was clear, In all the world could have no peer. She rode upon a milkwhite horse, Which bore her gently down the course. Its neck and head were shapeliest; Of all creatures, it was the best. Splendidly furnished was this mount; Beneath the heavens, no king or count Could have afforded gear so grand Unless he sold or pawned his land. And this is how she was arrayed: A white linen shift displayed— There where it was with laces tied— Her slender flanks on either side. Her figure shapely; hips tapered low; Her neck, whiter than branch in snow; Her eyes were gray; her face was bright; Her mouth, lovely; nose, set just right; Eyebrows black, forehead fair:
Blonde and curly was her hair. Golden wire sheds no such ray As did her locks against the day. A mantle was around her drawn,
A cloak of deep-dyed purple lawn.

A falcon on her wrist sat still;
A greyhound followed her at will.
In town was neither high nor low,
Old man or child, who did not go
And line the streets along the way
To watch as she made her entree.
As she passed by, and they gazed after;
Her beauty quieted jest and laughter.
She rode up to the castle slowly.
The judges, seeing her, were wholly Astonished at that spectacle
And held it for a miracle.
The heart of every single knight
Among them warmed with sheer delight.
Those who loved Sir Lanval well
Quickly went to him to tell
About the maiden who perchance,
Please God, brought him deliverance:
"Comrade, another one draws nigh,
By no means dark of hair or eye;"
Among all women there can be None fairer in this world than she."
Lanval heard and raised his eye;
He knew her well and gave a sigh.
The blood shot up into his cheeks,
And somewhat hastily he speaks:
"In faith," he said that's my amie
Now I don't care if they kill me
If but her mercy is assured,
For when I see her, I am cured."

The maid rode through the palace door,
So fair came never there before.
In front of Arthur she got down
With the whole company looking on.
Softly she let her mantle fall,
The better to be seen by all.
King Arthur, who was most discreet,
To greet her got up on his feet.
In turn, to honor her the rest
Offered their service to the guest.
When they had satisfied their gaze
And greatly sung her beauty's praise.
She made her speech in such a way
As she did not intend to stay:
"King, I have loved one of your band—
It's Lanval, there you see him stand.
I would not have the man ill-used—
In your court he has been accused Of lies he spoke. Listen to me,
The queen committed perjury;

I. Blonde hair and blue (or gray) eyes are considered the standard for beauty in romance.
He never asked her for her love.
As for the things he boasted of,
If I may be his warranty,
Your barons ought to speak him free.'
The king agreed he would abide
By what they lawfully decide.
Among them there was no dissent;
Lanval was pronounced innocent.
The damoiselle set off again,
Though the king asked her to remain.
Outside there stood a marble rock
With steps to make a mounting block,
From which armed men would get astride
When they from court set out to ride.
Lanval climbed up on it before
The damoiselle rode out the door.
Swiftly he sprang the horse to straddle
And sat behind her on the saddle.
With him to Avalon she returned,
As from the Bretons we have learned,
An isle most beautiful, they say,
To which the youth was borne away.
No man has heard more of his fate.
I've nothing further to relate.

Chevrefoil

I want to tell you, if I may,
The whole truth about a lai—
Why it was made and whence it came—Chevrefoil is its name.

Several times the tale has been Told of Tristran and the Queen.
I've heard and found it written, too,
Of their love, so noble and true,
Which brought great suffering until they Died together on the same day.
King Mark was full of angry spite
At his nephew Tristran because the knight
Loved the Queen. The King gave orders Dismissing Tristran from his borders.

And so Tristran went back forlorn
To South Wales, where he was born.
A full year he lived in despair
Of ever again returning there.
But then, at risk of getting caught,

Death and destruction he set at naught.
This should not cause you any wonder:
When a true lover is asunder
From the one whom he loves best,
He grows doleful and distressed.
Tristran was sad and downhearted.
From his homeland he departed
To Cornwall where dwelled the Queen.
All day, to avoid being seen,
In the forest he hid alone,
But at dusk, when day was done,
He ventured forth and shelter took
With poor peasants and country folk,
From them he sought news of the King.
They said that he was summoning
His barons to Tintagel to consort
At Pentecost where he’d hold court.
There would be much joy and cheer,
And the Queen would be there.

Hearing this, Tristran was overjoyed.

There’d be no way she could avoid
That he should see her along the route.
The same day as the King set out,
Tristran entered into a brake
Beside the path they had to take.

From a hazel growing there
He broke a branch and split a square.
He planed the wood till it was flat,
Then cut his name into the slat.
If the Queen was on her guard,
She’d detect that signal board—
It was not altogether new
For her to notice such a clue—
Straightaway she would discover
It was a message from her lover.

This is, in sum, what he conveyed
By the message he sent, which said
A long time he had lain there waiting
In hiding and deliberating
With himself to ascertain
How he might see her once again.
He could not live away from her.
This was the way with them: they were Like honeysuckle which you see
Wrapped around a hazel tree;

When it takes hold there and has bound
The trunk with tendrils all around,
They will live, both vine and stem,
But should someone uncouple them,
Then the hazel quickly dies,
And the honeysuckle likewise.
"So we, fair friend, can never be—
I without you; you without me."

As the Queen went riding by,
Up a hillside she cast her eye.

She saw the sign and understood
The letters cut into the wood.
She asked the knights, riding beside her
As an escort, to abide her:
She wanted to get down and rest,
And they agreed to her request.
From her knights she walked some distance
And called Brangvein for assistance,
Who was her good and faithful maid.
A few steps from the road she strayed
Into the woods and came upon Him she loved more than anyone.
Great joy there was between those two—
They spoke all that they wanted to.
She told him that a peace accord
Would reconcile him with his lord,
Who now was sorry he had sent
His nephew into banishment.
Rumor had provoked that move.
Then they parted; she left her love.

But when they had to say goodbye,
The two of them began to cry.
Tristan to Wales went as before,
Till Mark should send for him once more.
For the happiness he had
To see the Queen, and, as she bade,
To preserve remembrance of
The words he wrote about their love,
Tristan, who well knew how to play
The harp, invented a new lai.

I'll give the name to you in brief:
Its English title is Goatleaf;
And the very same romance
Is called Chevrefoil in France.
This is the truth about the lai
I have told you here today.

ANCRENE Riwle (Rule for Anchoressess)

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, there was a movement toward a more solitary religious life and a more personal encounter with God. In the early days of Christianity, monasticism had originated with the desert fathers, men who withdrew to the wilderness in order to lead a life of prayer and meditation. The fifth and sixth centuries saw the growth and spread of religious orders, men and women living in religious communities, especially the Benedictine order of monks, founded in Italy by St. Benedict. New orders founded in the eleventh and twelfth centuries—the Cistercians, for example—emphasized a more actively engaged and individual spirituality. The Dominican and Franciscan orders of friars were not confined to their houses but were preaching and teaching orders who staffed the newly founded universities.

Along with the new orders, a number of both men and women chose to become anchorites or hermits, living alone or in small groups. In his Rule, St. Benedict had described such solitaries with a military metaphor: "They have built up their strength and go from the battle line in the ranks of their brothers to the single combat of the desert. Self-reliant now, without the support of another, they are ready with God’s help to grapple single-handed with the vices of body and mind.” Benedict’s battle imagery anticipates the affinities between this solitary kind of spirituality and the literary form of romance, both of which were developing in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The individual soul confined in its enclosure fights temptation as Sir Gawain rides out alone in the wilderness to seek the Green Chapel and encounters temptation along the way. The wilderness in romance often contains hermits, who may be genuinely holy men, or they may be enchanters like Archimago, disguised as a holy hermit, in the Faerie Queene. The influence of romance on religion and of religion on romance is also strikingly seen in portrayals of Christ as a knight who jousts for the love and salvation of “human souls, which is a motif common to Ancrene Riwle, William Herebert’s poem “What is he, this lordling, that cometh from the fight” (p. 368), and Piers Plowman (see p. 357).

Anchoress (the feminine form of anchorite, from the Greek anachoretes, “one who lives apart”) refers to a religious recluse who, unlike a hermit, lives in an enclosure, attached to a church, from which she never emerges. Anchoresses and anchorites might live singly, like Julian of Norwich (see p. 370) or in small groups. Ancrene Riwle (ca. 1215) was originally written for three young sisters, who, the author says in an aside in one manuscript, come from a noble family with ample means to support them. The author of Ancrene Riwle addresses the sisters in a colloquial, urbane, and personal prose style that distinguishes the guide both as a book of religious instruction and as a literary achievement of Early Middle English.

The excerpt comes from Part 7, to which the author gave the title “Love.”

From Ancrene Riwle

[THE PARABLE OF THE CHRIST-KNIGHT]

A lady was completely surrounded by her enemies, her land laid waste, and she herself quite destitute, in a castle of clay. But a powerful king had fallen in love with her so inordinately that to win her love he sent her his messengers, one after another, often many together; he sent her many splendid presents of jewelry, provisions to support her, help from his noble army to hold her castle. She accepted everything as if it meant nothing to her, and was so hard-hearted that he could never come closer to gaining her love. What more do you want? At last he came himself; showed her his handsome face, as the most supremely handsome of men; spoke so very tenderly, and with words so beguiling that they could raise the dead to life; worked many wonders and did great feats before her eyes; showed her his power; told her about his kingdom; offered to make her queen of all that he owned. All this had no effect. Was not this scorn surprising?—for she was never fit to be his maidservant. But because of his gentle nature love had so overcome him that at last he said: “You are under attack, lady, and your enemies are so strong that without my help there is no way that you can escape falling into their hands, and being put to a shameful death after all your troubles. For your love I am willing to take on that fight, and rescue you from those who are seeking your death. But I know for certain that in fighting them I shall receive a mortal wound; and I will accept it gladly in order to win your heart. Now, therefore, I beg you, for the love I am showing towards you, to love me at least when this is done, after my death, although you refused to during my life." This king did just as he had promised; he rescued her from all her enemies, and was himself shamefully ill-treated and at last put to death. But by a miracle he rose from death to life. Would not this lady have a base nature if she did not love him after this above all things?

This king is Jesus, Son of God, who in just this way wooed our soul, which devils had besieged. And he, like a noble suitor, after numerous messengers and many acts of kindness came to prove his love, and showed by feats of arms that he was worthy of love, as was the custom of knights once upon a time. He entered the tournament and, like a bold knight, had his shield pierced through and through in battle for love of his lady. His shield, which hid his divinity, was his dear body, which was stretched out on the cross: broad as a shield above in his extended arms, narrow below, where the one foot (as many people think) was fixed above the other. That this shield has no sides is to signify that his disciples, who should have stood by him and been his sides, all fled from him and abandoned him like strangers, as the Gospel says: They all abandoned him and fled [Matthew 26.56]. This shield is given to us against all temptations, as Jeremiah testifies: You will give your labor as a shield for the heart [Lamentations 3.65]. This shield not only protects us against all evils, but does still more: it crowns us in heaven. With the shield of good will [Psalms 5.12]—"Lord," says David, "you have crowned us with the shield of your good will." He says 'shield of good will' because he suffered willingly all that he suffered. Isaiah says: He was offered because he wished to be [Isaiah 53.7].

"But, master," you say, "what was the point? Could he not have saved us without so much suffering?" Yes, indeed, very easily; but he did not wish to. Why? To deprive us of any excuse for denying him our love, since he had paid so dearly for it. You buy cheaply what you do not value highly. He bought us with his heart's blood—a higher price was never paid—to attract our love, which cost him so much suffering. In a shield there are three things: the wood, and the leather, and the painted design. So it was in this shield: the wood of the cross, the leather of God's body, the painting of the red blood which colored it so brightly. The third reason, then: after a brave knight's death, his shield is hung high in the church in his memory. Just so this shield—that is, the crucifix—is placed in church where it can be seen most easily, to be a reminder of the knightly prowess of Jesus Christ on the cross. His beloved should see in this how he bought her love: he let his shield be pierced, his side opened up, to show her his heart, to show her openly how deeply he loved her, and to attract her heart.
Middle Erehish Literature in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries

SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT
ca. 1375-1400

Between the Ancrene Riwle and the later fourteenth century, writers deployed English for many genres especially for saints' lives and romances. The finest Arthurian romance in English survives in only one manuscript, which also contains three religious poems—Pearl, Patience, and Purity—generally believed to be by the same poet. Nothing is known about the author except what can be inferred from the works. The dialect of the poems locates them in a remote corner of the northwest midlands between Cheshire and Staffordshire, and details of Sir Gawain's journey north show that the author was familiar with the geography of that region. But if author and audience were provincials, Sir Gawain and the other poems in the manuscript reveal them to have been highly sophisticated and well acquainted both with the international culture of the high Middle Ages and with ancient insular traditions.

Sir Gawain belongs to the so-called Alliterative Revival. After the Norman Conquest, alliterative verse doubtless continued to be recited by oral poets. At the beginning, the Gawain poet pretends that this romance is an oral poem and asks the audience to 'listen' to a story, which he has 'heard.' Alliterative verse also continued to appear in Early Middle English texts. Layamon's Brut (see pp. 125-27) is the outstanding example. During the late fourteenth century there was a renewed flowering of alliterative poetry, especially in the north and west of Britain, which includes Piers Plowman and a splendid poem known as The Alliterative Morte Darthur.

The Gawain poet's audience evidently valued the kind of alliterative verse that Chaucer's Parson caricatures as 'Rum-Ram-Ruf by lettre' (see p. 314, line 43). They would also have understood archaic poetic diction surviving from Old English poetry such as athel (noble) and words of Scandinavian origin such as skete (quickly) and shifted, (alternated). They were well acquainted with French Arthurian romances and the latest fashions in clothing, armor, and castle building. In making Sir Gawain, Arthur's sister's son, the preeminent knight of the Round Table, the poet was faithful to an older tradition. The thirteenth-century French romances, which in the next century became the main sources of Sir Thomas Malory, had made Sir Lancelot the best of Arthur's knights and Lancelot's adultery with Queen Guinevere the central event on which the fate of Arthur's kingdom turns. In Sir Gawain Lancelot is only one name in a list of Arthur's knights. Arthur is still a youth, and the court is in its springtime. Sir Gawain epitomizes this first blooming of Arthurian chivalry, and the reputation of the court rests upon his shoulders.

Ostensibly, Gawain's head is what is at stake. The main plot belongs to a type folklorists classify as the 'Beheading Game,' in which a supernatural challenger offers to let his head be cut off in exchange for a return blow. The earliest written occurrence of this motif is in the Middle Irish tale of Bricriu's Feast. The Gawain poet could have encountered it in several French romances as well as in oral tradition. But the outcome of the game here does not turn only on the champion's courage as it does in Bricriu’s Feast. The Gawain poet has devised another series of tests for the hero that link the beheading with his truth, the emblem of which is the pentangle—a five-pointed star—displayed on Gawain’s coat of arms and shield. The word truth in Middle English, as in Chaucer’s ballade of that name (see p. 317), and in Passus 1 of Piers Plowman (see p. 336), means not only what it still means now—a fact, belief, or idea held to be true—but what is conveyed by the old-fashioned variant from the same root: troth—that is, faith pledged by one’s word and owed to a lord, a spouse, or anyone who puts someone else under an obligation. In this respect, Sir Gawain is being measured against a moral and Christian ideal of chivalry. Whether or not he succeeds in that contest is a question carefully left unresolved—perhaps as a challenge for the reader.

The poet has framed Gawain’s adventure with references in the first and last stanzas to what are called the "Brutus books," the foundation stories that trace the origins of Rome and Britain back to the destruction of Troy. See, for example, the selection from Geoffrey of Monmouth’s History of the Kings of Britain (pp. 118—20). A cyclical sense of history as well as of the cycles of the seasons of the year, the generations of human-kind, and of individual lives runs through Sir Gawain and the Green Knight.

The poem is written in stanzas that contain a group of alliterative lines (the number of lines in a stanza varies). The line is longer and does not contain a fixed number or pattern of stresses like the classical alliterative measure of Old English poetry. Each stanza closes with five short lines rhyming ah ah a. The first of these rhyming lines contains just one stress and is called the "bob"; the four three-stress lines that follow are called the "wheel." For details on alliterative verse, see "Old and Middle English Prosody" (pp. 19—21). The opening stanza is printed below in Middle English with an interlinear translation. The stressed alliterating sounds have been italicized.

Sithen the sege and the assaut was sesed at Troye,
After the siege and the assault was ceased at Troy,

The foorgh scrrittened and brent to fcrondes and askes,
The city crumbled and burned to brands and ashes,

The iulk that the frammes of iresoun ther wroght
The man who the plots of treason there wrought

Was tried for his tricherie, the trewest on erthe.
Was tried for his treachery, the truest on earth.

Hit was Ennias the athel and his highe kynde,
It was Aeneas the noble and his high race,

That sithen deprecde provinces, and patrounes bicome
Who after subjegated provinces, and lords became

Welneghe of al the tvele in the west iles.
Wellnigh of all the wealth in the west isles.

Fro riche Romulus to Rome ricchis hym swythe.
Then noble Romulus to Rome proceeds quickly,

With gret foobbaunce that fcurghe he iriges upon fyrst
With great pride that city he builds at first

And wevenes hit his sune wom, as hit stow hat;
And names it his own name, as it now is called;
Ticius to Tuscan and teldes bigynnes,
Ticius (goes) to Tuscany and houses begins,

Langaberde in Lumbardie lyftes up homes,
Longbeard in Lombardy raises up homes,

And/er over the French
Felix Brutus
And far over the English Channel, Felix Brutus

On mony l?onkkes ful brode Bretayn he settes
On many banks very broad Brittain he sets

Wyth wynne,
With joy,

Where tverre and ivrake and wonder
Where war and revenge and wondrous happenings

Bi sythes has wont therinne,
On occasions have dwelled therein

And oft bothe Mysse and blunder
And often both joy and strife

Ful skete has skyfted synne.
Very swiftly have alternated since.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight¹

Part 1

Since the siege and the assault was ceased at Troy,
The walls breached and burnt down to brands and ashes,
The knight that had knotted the nets of deceit
Was impeached for his perfidy, proven most true,²

It was high-born Aeneas and his haughty race
That since prevailed over provinces, and proudly reigned
      Over well-nigh all the wealth of the West Isles.³
Great Romulus⁴ to Rome repairs in haste;
With boast and with bravery builds he that city
And names it with his own name, that it now bears.

Ticius to Tuscany, and towers raises,
Langobard⁵ in Lombardy lays out homes,
And far over the French Sea, Felix Brutus⁶
On many broad hills and high Britain he sets, is most fair.

¹. The Modern English translation is by Marie Borroff (1967), who has reproduced the alliterative meter of the original as well as the “bob” and “wheel,” the five-line rhyming group that concludes each of the long irregular stanzas.
². The treacherous knight is Aeneas, who was a traitor to his city, Troy, according to medieval tradition, but Aeneas was actually tried (“impeached”) by the Greeks for his refusal to hand over to them his sister Polyxena.
³. Perhaps Western Europe.
⁴. The legendary founder of Rome is here given Trojan ancestry, like Aeneas.
⁵. The reputed founder of Lombardy. "Ticius": not otherwise known.
⁶. Great-grandson of Aeneas and legendary founder of Britain: not elsewhere given the name Felix (Latin “happy”).
Where war and wrack and wonder
By shifts have sojourned there,
And bliss by turns with blunder
In that land's lot had share.

And since this Britain was built by this baron great,
Bold boys bred there, in broils delighting,
That did in their day many a deed most dire.
More marvels have happened in this merry land
Than in any other I know, since that olden time,
But of those that here built, of British kings,
King Arthur was counted most courteous of all,
Wherefore an adventure I aim to unfold,
That a marvel of might some men think it,
And one unmatched among Arthur's wonders.

If you will listen to my lay but a little while,
As I heard it in hall, I shall hasten to tell anew.
As it was fashioned featly
In tale of derring-do,
And linked in measures meetly
By letters tried and true.

This king lay at Camelot7 at Christmastide;
Many good knights and gay his guests were there,
Arrayed of the Round Table8 rightful brothers,
With feasting and fellowship and carefree mirth.
These true men contended in tournaments many,
Joined there in jousting these gentle knights,
Then came to the court for carol-dancing,
For the feast was in force full fifteen days,
With all the meat and the mirth that men could devise,
Such gaiety and glee, glorious to hear,
Brave din by day, dancing by night.
High were their hearts in halls and chambers,
These lords and these ladies, for life was sweet.

In peerless pleasures passed they their days,
The most noble knights known under Christ,
And the loveliest ladies that lived on earth ever,
And he the comeliest king, that that court holds,
For all this fair folk in their first age were still.

Happiest of mortal kind,
King noblest famed of will;
You would now go far to find
So hardy a host on hill.

While the New Year was new, but yesternight come,
This fair folk at feast two-fold was served,
When the king and his company were come in together,
The chanting in chapel achieved and ended.
Clerics and all the court acclaimed the glad season.

Cried Noel anew, good news to men;
Then gallants gather gaily, hand-gifts to make,
Called them out clearly, claimed them by hand,
Bickered long and busily about those gifts.
Ladies laughed aloud, though losers they were,

And he that won was not angered, as well you will know.
All this mirth they made until meat was served;
When they had washed them worthily, they went to their seats,
The best seated above, as best it beseemed,
Guenevere the goodly queen gay in the midst

On a dais well-decked and duly arrayed
With costly silk curtains, a canopy over,
Of Toulouse and Turkestan tapestries rich,
All broidered and bordered with the best gems
Ever brought into Britain, with bright pennies to pay.

Fair queen, without a flaw,
She glanced with eyes of grey.
A seemlier that once he saw,
In truth, no man could say.

But Arthur would not eat till all were served;
So light was his lordly heart, and a little boyish;
His life he liked lively—the less he cared
To be lying for long, or long to sit,
So busy his young blood, his brain so wild.

And also a point of pride pricked him in heart,
For he nobly had willed, he would never eat
On so high a holiday, till he had heard first
Of some fair feat or fray some far-borne tale,
Of some marvel of might, that he might trust,

By champions of chivalry achieved in arms,
Or some suppliant came seeking some single knight
To join with him in jousting, in jeopardy each
To lay life for life, and leave it to fortune
To afford him on field fair hap or other.

Such is the king's custom, when his court he holds
At each far-famed feast amid his fair host so dear.
The stout king stands in state
Till a wonder shall appear;

He leads, with heart elate,
High mirth in the New Year.

So he stands there in state, the stout young king,
Talking before the high table of trifles fair.
There Gawain the good knight by Guenevere sits,

With Agravain a la dure main on his other side,
Both knights of renown, and nephews of the king.

The dispensing of New Year's gifts seems to have involved kissing.
Bishop Baldwin above begins the table,
And Yvain, son of Urien, ate with him there.
These few with the fair queen were fittingly served;

At the side-tables sat many stalwart knights.
Then the first course comes, with clamor of trumpets
That were bravely bedecked with bannerets bright,
With noise of new drums and the noble pipes.
Wild were the warbles that wakened that day

In strains that stirred many strong men's hearts.
There dainties were dealt out, dishes rare,
Choice fare to choose, on chargers so many
That scarce was there space to set before the people
The sendee of silver, with sundry meats,

Each fair guest freely there
Partakes, and nothing loth;
Twelve dishes before each pair;
Good beer and bright wine both.

Of the service itself I need say no more,
For well you will know no tittle was wanting.
Another noise and a new was well-nigh at hand,
That the lord might have leave his life to nourish;
For scarce were the sweet strains still in the hall,

And the first course come to that company fair,
There hurtles in at the hall-door an unknown rider,
One the greatest on ground in growth of his frame:
From broad neck to buttocks so bulky and thick,
And his loins and his legs so long and so great,
Half a giant on earth I hold him to be,
But believe him no less than the largest of men,
And that the seemliest in his stature to see, as he rides,
For in back and in breast though his body was grim,
His waist in its width was worthily small,
And formed with every feature in fair accord was he.
Great wonder grew in hall
At his hue most strange to see,
For man and gear and all
Were green as green could be.

And in guise all of green, the gear and the man:
A coat cut close, that clung to his sides,
And a mantle to match, made with a lining
Of furs cut and fitted—the fabric was noble,
Embellished all with ermine, and his hood beside,
That was loosed from his locks, and laid on his shoulders.
With trim hose and tight, the same tint of green,
His great calves were girt, and gold spurs under
He bore on silk bands that embellished his heels,

1. The side tables are on the main floor and run along the walls at a right angle with the high table, which is on a dais.
And footgear well-fashioned, for riding most fit.
And all his vesture verily was verdant green;
Both the bosses on his belt and other bright gems
That were richly ranged on his raiment noble
About himself and his saddle, set upon silk,
That to tell half the trifles would tax my wits,
The butterflies and birds embroidered thereon
In green of the gayest, with many a gold thread.
The pendants of the breast-band, the princely crupper,
And the bars of the bit were brightly enameled;
The stout stirrups were green, that steadied his feet,
And the bows of the saddle and the side-panels both,
That gleamed all and glinted with green gems about.
The steed he bestrides of that same green so bright.
A green horse great and thick;
A headstrong steed of might;
In brodered bridle quick,
Mount matched man aright.

Gay was this goodly man in guise all of green,
And the hair of his head to his horse suited;
Fair flowing tresses enfold his shoulders;
A beard big as a bush on his breast hangs,
Was evened all about above both his elbows,
That half his arms thereunder were hid in the fashion
Of a king's cap-a-dos, that covers his throat.
The mane of that mighty horse much to it like,
Well curled and becomed, and cunningly knotted
With filaments of fine gold amid the fair green,
Here a strand of the hair, here one of gold;
His tail and his foretop twin in their hue,
And bound both with a band of a bright green
That was decked adown the dock with dazzling stones
And tied tight at the top with a triple knot
Where many bells well burnished rang bright and clear.
Such a mount in his might, nor man on him riding,
None had seen, I dare swear, with sight in that hall
so grand.
As lightning quick and light
He looked to all at hand;
It seemed that no man might
His deadly dints withstand.

Yet had he no helm, nor hauberk neither,
Nor plate, nor appurtenance appending to arms,
Nor shaft pointed sharp, nor shield for defense,
But in his one hand he had a holly bob

2. The word capada occurs in this form in Middle English only in Gawain, here and in line 572. The translator has interpreted it, as the poet apparently did also, as cap-a-dos, i.e., a garment covering its wearer "from head to back," on the model of cap-a-pie, "from head to foot," referring to armor.
That is goodliest in green when groves are bare,
And an ax in his other, a huge and immense,
A wicked piece of work in words to expound:
The head on its haft was an ell long;
The spike of green steel, resplendent with gold;
The blade burnished bright, with a broad edge,
As well shaped to shear as a sharp razor;
Stout was the stave in the strong man's gripe,
That was wound all with iron to the weapon's end,
With engravings in green of goodliest work.
A lace lightly about, that led to a knot,
Was looped in by lengths along the fair haft,
And tassels thereto attached in a row,
With buttons of bright green, brave to behold.
This horseman hurtles in, and the hall enters;
Riding to the high dais, recked he no danger;
Not a greeting he gave as the guests he overlooked,
Nor wasted his words, but "Where is," he said,
"The captain of this crowd? Keenly I wish To see that sire with sight, and to himself say my say."
He swaggered all about
To scan the host so gay;
He halted, as if in doubt
Who in that hall held sway.

There were stares on all sides as the stranger spoke,
For much did they marvel what it might mean
That a horseman and a horse should have such a hue, Grow green as the grass, and greener, it seemed,
Than green fused on gold more glorious by far.
All the onlookers eyed him, and edged nearer,
And awaited in wonder what he would do,
For many sights had they seen, but such a one never,
So that phantom and faerie the folk there deemed it,
Therefore chary of answer was many a champion bold,
And stunned at his strong words stone-still they sat
In a swooning silence in the stately hall.
As all were slipped into sleep, so slackened their speech pace.
Not all, I think, for dread,
But some of courteous grace
Let him who was their head
Be spokesman in that place.

Then Arthur before the high dais that entrance beholds,
And hailed him, as behooved, for he had no fear,
And said 'Fellow, in faith you have found fair welcome;
The head of this hostelry Arthur am I;
Leap lightly down, and linger, I pray,
And the tale of your intent you shall tell us after.'
"Nay, so help me," said the other, "He that on high sits,
To tarry here any time, 'twas not mine errand;
But as the praise of you, prince, is puffed up so high,
And your court and your company are counted the best,
Stoutest under steel-gear on steeds to ride,
Worthiest of their works the wide world over,
And peerless to prove in passages of arms,
And courtesy here is carried to its height,
And so at this season I have sought you out.
You may be certain by the branch that I bear in hand
That I pass here in peace, and would part friends,
For had I come to this court on combat bent,
I have a hauberk at home, and a helm beside,
A shield and a sharp spear, shining bright,
And other weapons to wield, I ween well, to boot,
But as I willed no war, I wore no metal.
But if you be so bold as all men believe,
You will graciously grant the game that I ask

"Nay, to fight, in good faith, is far from my thought;
There are about on these benches but beardless children,
Wore I here in full arms on a haughty steed,
For measured against mine, their might is puny.
And so I call in this court for a Christmas game,
For 'tis Yule and New Year, and many young bloods about;
If any in this house such hardihood claims,
Be so bold in his blood, his brain so wild,
As stoutly to strike one stroke for another,
I shall give him as my gift this gisarme noble,
This ax, that is heavy enough, to handle as he likes,
And I shall bide the first blow, as bare as I sit.
If there be one so wilful my words to assay,
Let him leap hither lightly, lay hold of this weapon;
I quitclaim it forever, keep it as his own,
And I shall stand him a stroke, steady on this floor,
So you grant me the guerdon to give him another,
sans blame.

In a twelvemonth and a day
He shall have of me the same;
Now be it seen straightway
Who dares take up the game."

If he astonished them at first, stiller were then
All that household in hall, the high and the low;
The stranger on his green steed stirred in the saddle,
And roisterously his red eyes he rolled all about,
Bent his bristling brows, that were bright green,
Wagged his beard as he watched who would arise.
When the court kept its counsel he coughed aloud,
And cleared his throat coolly, the clearer to speak:
"What, is this Arthur's house," said that horseman then,
"Whose fame is so fair in far realms and wide? Where is now your arrogance and your awesome deeds,
Your valor and your victories and your vaunting words? Now are the revel and renown of the Round Table
Overwhelmed with a word of one man's speech,
For all cower and quake, and no cut felt!"
With this he laughs so loud that the lord grieved;
The blood for sheer shame shot to his face, and pride.
With rage his face flushed red,
And so did all beside.
Then the king as bold man bred
Toward the stranger took a stride.

And said "Sir, now we see you will say but folly,
Which whoso has sought, it suits that he find.
No guest here is aghast of your great words.
Give to me your gisarme, in God's own name,
And the boon you have begged shall straight be granted.'
He leaps to him lightly, lays hold of his weapon;
The green fellow on foot fiercely alights.
Now has Arthur his ax, and the haft grips,
And sternly stirs it about, on striking bent.
The stranger before him stood there erect,
Higher than any in the house by a head and more;
With stern look as he stood, he stroked his beard,
And with undaunted countenance drew down his coat,
No more moved nor dismayed for his mighty dints
Than any bold man on bench had brought him a drink of wine.

Gawain by Guenevere
Toward the king doth now incline:
"I beseech, before all here,
That this melee may be mine."

"Would you grant me the grace," said Gawain to the king,
"To be gone from this bench and stand by you there,
If I without discourtesy might quit this board,
And if my liege lady misliked it not,
I would come to your counsel before your court noble.
For I find it not fit, as in faith it is known,
When such a boon is begged before all these knights,
Though you be tempted thereto, to take it on yourself
While so bold men about upon benches sit,
That no host under heaven is hardier of will,
Nor better brothers-in-arms where battle is joined;
I am the weakest, well I know, and of wit feeblest;
And the loss of my life would be least of any;
That I have you for uncle is my only praise;
My body, but for your blood, is barren of worth;
And for that this folly befits not a king,
And 'tis I that have asked it, it ought to be mine,
And if my claim be not comely let all this court judge,
in sight."
The court assays the claim,
And in counsel all unite
To give Gawain the game
And release the king outright.

Then the king called the knight to come to his side,
And he rose up readily, and reached him with speed,
Bows low to his lord, lays hold of the weapon,
And he releases it lightly, and lifts up his hand,

And gives him God’s blessing, and graciously prays
That his heart and his hand may be hardy both.
‘Keep, cousin,’ said the king, ‘what you cut with this day,
And if you rule it aright, then readily, I know,
You shall stand the stroke it will strike after.’

Gawain goes to the guest with gisarme in hand,
And boldly he bides there, abashed not a whit.
Then hails he Sir Gawain, the horseman in green:
‘Recount we our contract, ere you come further.
First I ask and adjure you, how you are called
That you tell me true, so that trust it I may.’

‘In good faith,’ said the good knight, ‘Gawain am I Whose buffet befalls you, what’er betide after,
And at this time twelvemonth take from you another
With what weapon you will, and with no man else alive.’

The other nods assent:

‘Sir Gawain, as I may thrive,
I am wondrous well content
That you this dint shall drive.’

‘Sir Gawain,’ said the Green Knight, ‘By God, I rejoice
That your fist shall fetch this favor I seek,
And you have readily rehearsed, and in right terms,
Each clause of my covenant with the king your lord,
Save that you shall assure me, sir, upon oath,

That you shall seek me yourself, wheresoever you deem
My lodgings may lie, and look for such wages
As you have offered me here before all this host.’

‘What is the way there?’ said Gawain. ‘Where do you dwell?
I heard never of your house, by him that made me,

Nor I know you not, knight, your name nor your court.
But tell me truly thereof, and teach me your name,
And I shall fare forth to find you, so far as I may,
And this I say in good certain, and swear upon oath.’

‘That is enough in New Year, you need say no more,’

Said the knight in the green to Gawain the noble,
‘If I tell you true, when I have taken your knock,
And if you handily have hit, you shall hear straightway
Of my house and my home and my own name;
Then follow in my footsteps by faithful accord.

And if I spend no speech, you shall speed the better:
You can feast with your friends, nor further trace my tracks.
Now hold your grim tool steady
And show us how it hacks."
"Gladly, sir; all ready,"
Says Gawain; he strokes the ax.

The Green Knight upon ground girds him with care:
Bows a bit with his head, and bares his flesh:
His long lovely locks he laid over his crown,
Let the naked nape for the need be shown.
Gawain grips to his ax and gathers it aloft—
The left foot on the floor before him he set—
Brought it down deftly upon the bare neck,
That the shock of the sharp blow shivered the bones
And cut the flesh cleanly and clove it in twain,
That the blade of bright steel bit into the ground.
The head was hewn off and fell to the floor;
Many found it at their feet, as forth it rolled;
The blood gushed from the body, bright on the green,
Yet fell not the fellow, nor faltered a whit,
But stoutly he starts forth upon stiff shanks,
And as all stood staring he stretched forth his hand,
Laid hold of his head and heaved it aloft,
Then goes to the green steed, grasps the bridle,
Steps into the stirrup, bestrides his mount,
And his head by the hair in his hand holds,
And as steady he sits in the stately saddle
As he had met with no mishap, nor missing were his head.
His bulk about he haled,
That fearsome body that bled;
There were many in the court that quailed
Before all his say was said.

For the head in his hand he holds right up;
Toward the first on the dais directs he the face,
And it lifted up its lids, and looked with wide eyes,
And said as much with its mouth as now you may hear:
'Sir Gawain, forget not to go as agreed,
And cease not to seek till me, sir, you find,
As you promised in the presence of these proud knights.
To the Green Chapel come, I charge you, to take Such a dint as you have dealt—you have well deserved
That your neck should have a knock on New Year's morn.
The Knight of the Green Chapel I am well-known to many,
Wherefore you cannot fail to find me at last;
Therefore come, or be counted a recreant knight.'
With a roisterous rush he flings round the reins,
Hurtles out at the hall-door, his head in his hand,
That the flint-fire flew from the flashing hooves.
Which way he went, not one of them knew
Nor whence he was come in the wide world
The king and Gawain gay
Make game of the Green Knight there,
Yet all who saw it say
'Twas a wonder past compare.

Though high-born Arthur at heart had wonder,
He let no sign be seen, but said aloud
To the comely queen, with courteous speech,
'Dear dame, on this day dismay you no whit;
Such crafts are becoming at Christmastide,
Laughing at interludes, light songs and mirth,
Amid dancing of damsels with doughty knights.
Nevertheless of my meat now let me partake,
For I have met with a marvel, I may not deny.'
He glanced at Sir Gawain, and gaily he said,
'Now, sir, hang up your ax, that has hewn enough,'
And over the high dais it was hung on the wall
That men in amazement might on it look,
And tell in true terms the tale of the wonder.
Then they turned toward the table, these two together,
The good king and Gawain, and made great feast,
With all dainties double, dishes rare,
With all manner of meat and minstrelsy both,
Such happiness wholly had they that day in hold.
Now take care, Sir Gawain,
That your courage wax not cold
When you must turn again
To your enterprise foretold.

Part 2
This adventure had Arthur of handsels first
When young was the year, for he yearned to hear tales;
Though they wanted for words when they went to sup,
Now are fierce deeds to follow, their fists stuffed full.
Gawain was glad to begin those games in hall,
But if the end be harsher, hold it no wonder,
For though men are merry in mind after much drink,
A year passes apace, and proves ever new:
First things and final conform but seldom.
And so this Yule to the young year yielded place,
After Christmas there came the cold cheer of Lent,
When with fish and plainer fare our flesh we reprove;
But then the world's weather with winter contends:
The keen cold lessens, the low clouds lift;
Fresh falls the rain in fostering showers
On the face of the fields; flowers appear.

3. A colloquial expression equivalent to "bury sense also.
the hatchet," but here with an appropriate literal 4. New Year's presents.
The ground and the groves wear gowns of green;
Birds build their nests, and blithely sing
That solace of all sorrow with summer comes er long.
And blossoms day by day
Bloom rich and rife in throng;
Then every grove so gay
Of the greenwood rings with song.

And then the season of summer with the soft winds,
When Zephyr sighs low over seeds and shoots;
Glad is the green plant growing abroad,
When the dew at dawn drops from the leaves,
To get a gracious glance from the golden sun.
But harvest with harsher winds follows hard after,
Warns him to ripen well ere winter comes;
Drives forth the dust in the droughty season,
From the face of the fields to fly high in air.
Wroth winds in the welkin wrestle with the sun,
The leaves launch from the linden and light on the ground,
And the grass turns to gray, that once grew green.
Then all ripens and rots that rose up at first,
And so the year moves on in yesterdays many,
And winter once more, by the world’s law,
draws nigh.

At Michaelmas the moon
Hangs wintry pale in sky;
Sir Gawain girds him soon
For travails yet to try.

Till All-Hallows’ Day with Arthur he dwells,
And he held a high feast to honor that knight
With great revels and rich, of the Round Table.
Then ladies lovely and lords debonair
With sorrow for Sir Gawain were sore at heart;
Yet they covered their care with countenance glad:
Many a mournful man made mirth for his sake.
So after supper soberly he speaks to his uncle
Of the hard hour at hand, and openly says,
"Now, liege lord of my life, my leave I take;
The terms of this task too well you know—
To count the cost over concerns me nothing.
But I am bound forth betimes to bear a stroke
From the grim man in green, as God may direct."
Then the first and foremost came forth in throng:
Yvain and Eric and others of note,
Sir Dodinal le Sauvage, the Duke of Clarence,
Lionel and Lancelot and Lucan the good,
Sir Bors and Sir Bedivere, big men both,
And many manly knights more, with Mador de la Porte.
All this courtly company comes to the king

5. All Saints’ Day, November 1.
To counsel their comrade, with care in their hearts;
There was much secret sorrow suffered that day
That one so good as Gawain must go in such wise
To bear a bitter blow, and his bright sword lay by.

He said, "Why should I tarry?"
And smiled with tranquil eye;
"In destinies sad or merry,
True men can but try."

He dwelt there all that day, and dressed in the morning;
 Asked early for his arms, and all were brought.
First a carpet of rare cost was cast on the floor
Where much goodly gear gleamed golden bright;

He takes his place promptly and picks up the steel,
Attired in a tight coat of Turkestan silk
And a kingly cap-a-dos, closed at the throat,
That was lavishly lined with a lustrous fur.

Then they set the steel shoes on his sturdy feet
And clad his calves about with comely greaves,
And plate well-polished protected his knees,
Affixed with fastenings of the finest gold.

Fair cuisses enclosed, that were cunningly wrought,
His thick-thewed thighs, with thongs bound fast,
And massy chain-mail of many a steel ring
He bore on his body, above the best cloth,
With brace burnished bright upon both his arms,
Good couters and gay, and gloves of plate,
And all the goodly gear to grace him well that tide.

His surcoat blazoned bold;
Sharp spurs to prick with pride;
And a brave silk band to hold
The broadsword at his side.

When he had on his arms, his harness was rich,
The least latchet or loop laden with gold;
So armored as he was, he heard a mass,
Honored God humbly at the high altar.

Then he comes to the king and his comrades-in-arms,
Takes his leave at last of lords and ladies,
And they clasped and kissed him, commending him to Christ.
By then Gringolet was girt with a great saddle
That was gaily agleam with fine gilt fringe.
New-furbished for the need with nail-heads bright;
The bridle and the bars bedecked all with gold;
The breast-plate, the saddlebow, the side-panels both,
The caparison and the crupper accorded in hue,
And all ranged on the red the resplendent studs
That glittered and glowed like the glorious sun.

His helm now he holds up and hastily kisses,
Well-closed with iron clinches, and cushioned within;
It was high on his head, with a hasp behind,
And a covering of cloth to encase the visor,
All bound and embroidered with the best gems
On broad bands of silk, and bordered with birds,
Parrots and popinjays preening their wings,
Lovebirds and love-knots as lavishly wrought
As many women had worked seven winters thereon, entire.

The diadem costlier yet
That crowned that comely sire,
With diamonds richly set,
That flashed as if on fire.

Then they showed forth the shield, that shone all red,
With the pentangle portrayed in purest gold.
About his broad neck by the baldric he casts it,
That was meet for the man, and matched him well.
And why the pentangle is proper to that peerless prince
I intend now to tell, though detain me it must.

It is a sign by Solomon sagely devised
To be a token of truth, by its title of old,
For it is a figure formed of five points,
And each line is linked and locked with the next
For ever and ever, and hence it is called
In all England, as I hear, the endless knot.
And well may he wear it on his worthy arms,
For ever faithful five-fold in five-fold fashion
Was Gawain in good works, as gold unalloyed, Devoid of all villainy, with virtues adorned
in sight.

On shield and coat in view
He bore that emblem bright,
As to his word most true
And in speech most courteous knight.

And first, he was faultless in his five senses,
Nor found ever to fail in his five fingers,
And all his fealty was fixed upon the five wounds
That Christ got on the cross, as the creed tells;
And wherever this man in meele took part,
His one thought was of this, past all things else.

6. A five-pointed star, formed by five lines that are drawn without lifting the pencil from the paper, supposed to have mystical significance; as Solomon's sign (line 625) it was enclosed in a circle.
That all his force was founded on the five joys;
That the high Queen of heaven had in her child.
And therefore, as I find, he fittingly had
On the inner part of his shield her image portrayed,
That when his look on it lighted, he never lost heart.
The fifth of the five fives followed by this knight
Were beneficence boundless and brotherly love
And pure mind and manners, that none might impeach,
And compassion most precious—these peerless five
Were forged and made fast in him, foremost of men.
Now all these five fives were confirmed in this knight,
And each linked in other, that end there was none,
And fixed to five points, whose force never failed,
Nor assembled all on a side, nor asunder either,
Nor anywhere at an end, but whole and entire
However the pattern proceeded or played out its course.
And so on his shining shield shaped was the knot
Royally in red gold against red gules,
That is the peerless pentangle, prized of old in lore.
Now armed is Gawain gay,
And bears his lance before,
And soberly said good day,
He thought forevermore.

He struck his steed with the spurs and sped on his way
So fast that the flint-fire flashed from the stones.
When they saw him set forth they were sore aggrieved,
And all sighed softly, and said to each other,
Fearing for their fellow, "111 fortune it is
That you, man, must be marred, that most are worthy!
His equal on this earth can hardly be found;
To have dealt more discreetly had done less harm,
And have dubbed him a duke, with all due honor.
A great leader of lords he was like to become,
And better so to have been than battered to bits,
Beheaded by an elf-man,° for empty pride!
Who would credit that a king could be counseled so,
And caught in a cavil in a Christmas game?°
Many were the warm tears they wept from their eyes

When goodly Sir Gawain was gone from the court that day.
No longer he abode,
But speedily went his way
Over many a wandering road,
As I heard my author say.

Now he rides in his array through the realm of Logres,
Sir Gawain, God knows, though it gave him small joy!
All alone must he lodge through many a long night

7. Most commonly in Middle English literature, the Annunciation, Nativity, Resurrection, Ascension, and Assumption, although the list varies. These overlap but are not identical with the Five Joyful Mysteries of the Rosary, which were not formally established until the 16th century.
8. One of the names for Arthur's kingdom.
Where the food that he fancied was far from his plate;
He had no mate but his mount, over mountain and plain,
Nor man to say his mind to but almighty God,
Till he had wandered well-nigh into North Wales.
All the islands of Anglesey he holds on his left,
And follows, as he fares, the fords by the coast,

Comes over at Holy Head, and enters next
The Wilderness of Wirral—few were within
That had great good will toward God or man.
And earnestly he asked of each mortal he met
If he had ever heard aught of a knight all green,
Or of a Green Chapel, on ground thereabouts,
And all said the same, and solemnly swore
They saw no such knight all solely green in hue.

Over country wild and strange
The knight sets off anew;
Often his course must change
Ere the Chapel comes in view.

Many a cliff must he climb in country wild;
Far off from all his friends, forlorn must he ride;
At each strand or stream where the stalwart passed
'Twere a marvel if he met not some monstrous foe,
And that so fierce and forbidding that fight he must.
So many were the wonders he wandered among
That to tell but the tenth part would tax my wits.

Now with serpents he wars, now with savage wolves,
Now with wild men of the woods, that watched from the rocks,
Both with bulls and with bears, and with boars besides,
And giants that came gibbering from the jagged steeps.
Had he not borne himself bravely, and been on God’s side,
He had met with many mishaps and mortal harms.
And if the wars were unwelcome, the winter was worse,
When the cold clear rains rushed from the clouds
And froze before they could fall to the frosty earth.
Near slain by the sleet he sleeps in his irons

More nights than enough, among naked rocks,
Where clattering from the crest the cold stream ran
And hung in hard icicles high overhead.
Thus in peril and pain and predicaments dire
He rides across country till Christmas Eve, our knight.

And at that holy tide
He prays with all his might
That Mary may be his guide
Till a dwelling comes in sight.

By a mountain next morning he makes his way
Into a forest fastness, fearsome and wild;
High hills on either hand, with hoar woods below,

9. Gawain went from Camelot north to the northern coast of Wales, opposite the islands of Anglesey; there he turned east across the Dee to the forest of Wirral in Cheshire.
Os ks o(ld and huge by the hundred together.
The beaxel and the haw thorn were all intertwined

With rough raveled moss, that raggedly hung,
With many birds unblithe upon bare twigs
That peeped most piteously for pain of the cold.
The good knight on Gringolet glides thereunder
Through many a marsh and mire, a man all alone;

He feared for his default, should he fail to see
The service of that Sire that on that same night
Was born of a bright maid, to bring us his peace.
And therefore sighing he said, "I beseech of Thee, Lord,
And Mary, thou mildest mother so dear,

Some harborage where haply I might hear mass
And Thy matins tomorrow—meekly I ask it,
And thereto proffer and pray my pater and ave and creed."

He said his prayer with sighs,
Lamenting his misdeed;
He crosses himself, and cries
On Christ in his great need.

No sooner had Sir Gawain signed himself thrice
Than he was ware, in the wood, of a wondrous dwelling.

Within a moat, on a mound, bright amid boughs
Of many a tree great of girth that grew by the water—
A castle as comely as a knight could own,
On grounds fair and green, in a goodly park
With a palisade of palings planted about

For two miles and more, round many a fair tree.
The stout knight stared at that stronghold great
As it shimmered and shone amid shining leaves,
Then with helmet in hand he offers his thanks
To Jesus and Saint Julian,1 that are gentle both,

That in courteous accord had inclined to his prayer;
"Now fair harbor," said he, "I humbly beseech!"
Then he pricks his proud steed with the plated spurs,
And by chance he has chosen the chief path
That brought the bold knight to the bridge's end in haste.

The bridge hung high in air;
The gates were bolted fast;
The walls well-framed to bear
The fury of the blast.

The man on his mount remained on the bank
Of the deep double moat that defended the place.
The wall went in the water wondrous deep,
And a long way aloft it loomed overhead.
It was built of stone blocks to the battlements' height.

With corbels under cornices in comeliest style;
Watch-towers trusty protected the gate.

1. Patron saint of hospitality.
With many a lean loophole, to look from within:
A better-made barbican the knight beheld never.
And behind it there hoved a great hall and fair:

795 Turrets rising in tiers, with tines at their tops,
Spires set beside them, splendidly long,
With finials well-fashioned, as filigree fine.
Chalk-white chimneys over chambers high
Gleamed in gay array upon gables and roofs;

The pinnacles in panoply, pointing in air,
So vied there for his view that verily it seemed A castle cut of paper for a king's feast. The good knight on Gringolet thought it great luck
If he could but contrive to come there within.

805 To keep the Christmas feast in that castle fair and bright.

There answered to his call
A porter most polite;
From his station on the wall
He greets the errant knight.

"Good sir," said Gawain. "Wouldst go to inquire
If your lord would allow me to lodge here a space?"
"Peter!" said the porter, "For my part, I think So noble a knight will not want for a welcome!"

815 Then he bustles off briskly, and comes back straight,
And many servants beside, to receive him the better.
They let down the drawbridge and duly went forth
And kneeled down on their knees on the naked earth
To welcome this warrior as best they were able.

820 They proffered him passage—the portals stood wide—
And he beckoned them to rise, and rode over the bridge.
Men steadied his saddle as he stepped to the ground,
And there stabled his steed many stalwart folk.
Now come the knights and the noble squires
To bring him with bliss into the bright hall.

When his high helm was off, there hied forth a throng
Of attendants to take it, and see to its care;
They bore away his brand and his blazoned shield;
Then graciously he greeted those gallants each one,

825 And many a noble drew near, to do the knight honor.
All in his armor into hall he was led,
Where fire on a fair hearth fiercely blazed.
And soon the lord himself descends from his chamber
To meet with good manners the man on his floor.

830 He said, "To this house you are heartily welcome:
What is here is wholly yours, to have in your power and sway."

*Many thanks," said Sir Gawain;
"May Christ your pains repay!"

835 The two embrace amain
As men well met that day.

2. A common table decoration at feasts.
Gawain gazed on the host that greeted him there,
And a lusty fellow he looked, the lord of that place:
A man of massive mold, and of middle age;
845 Broad, bright was his beard, of a beaver’s hue,
Strong, steady his stance, upon stalwart shanks,
His face fierce as fire, fair-spoken withal,
And well-suited he seemed in Sir Gawain’s sight
To be a master of men in a mighty keep.
850 They pass into a parlor, where promptly the host
Has a servant assigned him to see to his needs,
And there came upon his call many courteous folk
That brought him to a bower where bedding was noble,
With heavy silk hangings hemmed all in gold,
855 Coverlets and counterpanes curiously wrought,
A canopy over the couch, clad all with fur,
Curtains running on cords, caught to gold rings,
Woven rugs on the walls of eastern work,
And the floor, under foot, well-furnished with the same.
860 Amid light talk and laughter they loosed from him then
His war-dress of weight and his worthy clothes.
Robes richly wrought they brought him right soon,
To change there in chamber and choose what he would.
When he had found one he fancied, and flung it about,
865 Well-fashioned for his frame, with flowing skirts,
His face fair and fresh as the flowers of spring,
All the good folk agreed, that gazed on him then,
His limbs arrayed royally in radiant hues,
That so comely a mortal never Christ made 870 as he.
Whatever his place of birth,
It seemed he well might be Without a peer on earth
In martial rivalry.
875 A couch before the fire, where fresh coals burned,
They spread for Sir Gawain splendidly now
With quilts quaintly stitched, and cushions beside,
And then a costly cloak they cast on his shoulders
Of bright silk, embroidered on borders and hems, 880 With furs of the finest well-furnished within,
And bound about with ermine, both mantle and hood;
And he sat at that fireside in sumptuous estate
And warmed himself well, and soon he waxed merry.
Then attendants set a table upon trestles broad,
885 And lustrous white linen they laid thereupon,
A saltcellar of silver, spoons of the same.
He washed himself well and went to his place,
Men set his fare before him in fashion most fit.
There were soups of all sorts, seasoned with skill,
890 Double-sized servings, and sundry fish,
Some baked, some breaded, some broiled on the coals,
Some simmered, some in stews, steaming with spice,
And with sauces to sup that suited his taste.
He confesses it a feast with free words and fair;
They requite him as kindly with courteous jests,
    well-sped.
    "Tonight you fast\(^3\) and pray;
    Tomorrow we'll see you fed."
The knight grows wondrous gay
As the wine goes to his head.

Then at times and by turns, as at table he sat,
They questioned him quietly, with queries discreet,
And owns him of the brotherhood of high-famed Arthur,
The right royal ruler of the Round Table,
And the guest by their fireside is Gawain himself,
Who has happened on their house at that holy feast.
When the name of the knight was made known to the lord,
Then loudly he laughed, so elated he was,
And the men in that household made haste with joy
To appear in his presence promptly that day,
That of courage ever-constant, and customs pure,
Is pattern and paragon, and praised without end:
Of all knights on earth most honored is he.

Each said solemnly aside to his brother,
    "Now displays of deportment shall dazzle our eyes
    And the polished pearls of impeccable speech;
    The high art of eloquence is ours to pursue
    Since the father of fine manners is found in our midst.
    Great is God's grace, and goodly indeed,
    That a guest such as Gawain he guides to us here
    When men sit and sing of their Savior's birth in view.
    With command of manners pure
    He shall each heart imbue;
    Who shares his converse, sure,
    Shall learn love's language true."

When the knight had done dining and duly arose,
The dark was drawing on; the day nigh ended.
Chaplains in chapels and churches about Rang the bells aright, reminding all men
Of the holy evensong of the high feast.
The lord attends alone: his fair lady sits
In a comely closet, secluded from sight.
Gawain in gay attire goes thither soon;
The lord catches his coat, and calls him by name,
And has him sit beside him, and says in good faith
No guest on God's earth would he gladlier greet.
For that Gawain thanked him; the two then embraced
And sat together soberly the service through.

---

\(^3\) Gawain is said to be ‘fasting’ because the meal, although elaborate, consisted only of fish dishes, appropriate to a fasting day.
Then the lady, that longed to look on the knight,
Came forth from her closet with her comely maids.
The fair hues of her flesh, her face and her hair
And her body and her bearing were beyond praise,
And excelled the queen herself, as Sir Gawain thought.
He goes forth to greet her with gracious intent;
Another lady led her by the left hand
That was older than she—an ancient, it seemed,
And held in high honor by all men about.
But unlike to look upon, those ladies were,
For if the one was fresh, the other was faded:
Bedecked in bright red was the body of one;
Flesh hung in folds on the face of the other;
On one a high headdress, hung all with pearls;
Her bright throat and bosom fair to behold,
Fresh as the first snow fallen upon hills;
A wimple the other one wore round her throat;
Her swart chin well swaddled, swathed all in white;
Her forehead enfolded in flounces of silk
That framed a fair fillet, of fashion ornate,
And nothing bare beneath save the black brows,
The two eyes and the nose, the naked lips,
And they unsightly to see, and sorely bleared.
A beldame, by God, she may well be deemed,

She was short and thick of waist,
Her buttocks round and wide;
More toothsome, to his taste,
Was the beauty by her side.

When Gawain had gazed on that gay lady,
With leave of her lord, he politely approached;
To the elder in homage he humbly bows;
The lovelier he salutes with a light embrace.
He claims a comely kiss, and courteously he speaks;
They welcome him warmly, and straightway he asks
To be received as their servant, if they so desire.
They take him between them; with talking they bring him
Beside a bright fire; bade then that spices
Be freely fetched forth, to refresh them the better,
And the good wine therewith, to warm their hearts.
The lord leaps about in light-hearted mood;
Contrives entertainments and timely sports;
Takes his hood from his head and hangs it on a spear,
And offers him openly the honor thereof
Who should promote the most mirth at that Christmas feast;
'And I shall try for it, trust me—contend with the best,
Ere I go without my headgear by grace of my friends!'
Thus with light talk and laughter the lord makes merry
To gladden the guest he had greeted in hall
that day.
At the last he called for light
The company to convey;
Gawain says goodnight
And retires to bed straightway.

On the morn when each man is mindful in heart
That God’s son was sent down to suffer our death,
No household but is blithe for his blessed sake;
So was it there on that day, with many delights.
Both at larger meals and less they were lavishly served
By doughty lads on dais, with delicate fare;
The old ancient lady, highest she sits;
The lord at her left hand leaned, as I hear;
Sir Gawain in the center, beside the gay lady,
Where the food was brought first to that festive board,
And thence throughout the hall, as they held most fit,
To each man was offered in order of rank.
There was meat, there was mirth, there was much joy,
That to tell all the tale would tax my wits,
Though I pained me, perchance, to paint it with care;
But yet I know that our knight and the noble lady
Were accorded so closely in company there,
With the seemly solace of their secret words,
With speeches well-sped, spotless and pure,
That each prince’s pastime their pleasures far outshone.

Sweet pipes beguile their cares,
And the trumpet of martial tone;
Each tends his affairs
And those two tend their own.

That day and all the next, their disport was noble,
And the third day, I think, pleased them no less;
The joys of St. John’s Day° were justly praised,
And were the last of their like for those lords and ladies;
Then guests were to go in the gray morning,
Wherefore they whiled the night away with wine and with mirth,
Moved to the measures of many a blithe carol;
At last, when it was late, took leave of each other,
Each one of those worthies, to wend his way.
Gawain bids goodbye to his goodly host
Who brings him to his chamber, the chimney beside,
And detains him in talk, and tenders his thanks
And holds it an honor to him and his people
That he has harbored in his house at that holy time
And embellished his abode with his inborn grace.
"As long as I may live, my luck is the better
That Gawain was my guest at God’s own feast!"
"Noble sir," said the knight, "I cannot but think
All the honor is your own—may heaven requite it!
And your man to command I account myself here
As I am bound and beholden, and shall be, come what may."

The lord with all his might Entreats his guest to stay;
Brief answer makes the knight:
Next morning he must away.

Then the lord of that land politely inquired
What dire affair had forced him, at that festive time,
So far from the king's court to fare forth alone
Ere the holidays wholly had ended in hall.

"In good faith," said Gawain, "you have guessed the truth:
On a high errand and urgent I hastened away,
For I am summoned by myself to seek for a place—
I would I knew whither, or where it might be!
Far rather would I find it before the New Year
Than own the land of Logres, so help me our Lord!
Wherefore, sir, in friendship this favor I ask,
That you say in sober earnest, if something you know
Of the Green Chapel, on ground far or near,
Or the lone knight that lives there, of like hue of green.

A certain day was set by assent of us both
To meet at that landmark, if I might last,
And from now to the New Year is nothing too long,
And I would greet the Green Knight there, would God but allow,
More gladly, by God's Son, than gain the world's wealth!

And I must set forth to search, as soon as I may;
To be about the business I have but three days
And would as soon sink down dead as desist from my errand."
Then smiling said the lord, "Your search, sir, is done,
For we shall see you to that site by the set time.

Let Gawain grieve no more over the Green Chapel;
You shall be in your own bed, in blissful ease,
All the forenoon, and fare forth the first of the year,
And make the goal by midmorn, to mind your affairs,
no fear!

Tarry till the fourth day
And ride on the first of the year.
We shall set you on your way;
It is not two miles from here.'

Then Gawain was glad, and gleefully he laughed:
"Now I thank you for this, past all things else!
Now my goal is here at hand! With a glad heart I shall Both tarry, and undertake any task you devise."
Then the host seized his arm and seated him there;
Let the ladies be brought, to delight them the better,

And in fellowship fair by the fireside they sit;
So gay waxed the good host, so giddy his words,
All waited in wonder what next he would say.
Then he stares on the stout knight, and sternly he speaks:
"You have bound yourself boldly my bidding to do—
Will you stand by that boast, and obey me this once?"
"I shall do so indeed," said the doughty knight;
"While I lie in your lodging, your laws will I follow."
"As you have had," said the host, "many hardships abroad
And little sleep of late, you are lacking, I judge,
Both in nourishment needful and nightly rest;
You shall lie abed late in your lofty chamber
Tomorrow until mass, and meet then to dine
When you will, with my wife, who will sit by your side
And talk with you at table, the better to cheer our guest.
A-hunting I will go
While you lie late and rest.'
The knight, inclining low,
Assents to each behest.

"And Gawain," said the good host, "agree now to this;
Whatever I win in the woods I will give you at eve,
And all you have earned you must offer to me;
Swear now, sweet friend, to swap as I say,
Whether hands, in the end, be empty or better."
"By God," said Sir Gawain, "I grant it forthwith!
If you find the game good, I shall gladly take part."
"Let the bright wine be brought, and our bargain is done,"
Said the lord of that land—the two laughed together.
Then they drank and they dallied and doffed all constraint,
These lords and these ladies, as late as they chose,
And then with gaiety and gallantries and graceful adieux
They talked in low tones, and tarried at parting.
With compliments comely they kiss at the last;
There were brisk lads about with blazing torches
To see them safe to bed, for soft repose long due.

Their covenants, yet awhile,
They repeat, and pledge anew;
That lord could well beguile
Men's hearts, with mirth in view.

Part 3
Long before daylight they left their beds;
Guests that wished to go gave word to their grooms,
And they set about briskly to bind on saddles,
Tend to their tackle, tie up trunks.
The proud lords appear, appareled to ride,
Leap lightly astride, lay hold of their bridles,
Each one on his way to his worthy house.
The liege lord of the land was not the last Arrayed there to ride, with retainers many;
He had a bite to eat when he had heard mass;
With horn to the hills he hastens amain.
By the dawn of that day over the dim earth,
Master and men were mounted and ready.
Then they harnessed in couples the keen-scented hounds,
Cast wide the kennel-door and called them forth,
Blew upon their bugles bold blasts three;
The dogs began to bay with a deafening din,
And they quieted them quickly and called them to heel.
A hundred brave huntsmen, as I have heard tell,

Men at stations meet;
From the hounds they slip the tether;
The echoing horns repeat,
Clear in the merry weather.

At the clamor of the quest, the quarry trembled;
Deer dashed through the dale, dazed with dread;
Hastened to the high ground, only to be Turned back by the beaters, who boldly shouted.
They harmed not the harts, with their high heads,
Let the bucks go by, with their broad antlers,
For it was counted a crime, in the close season,
If a man of that demesne should molest the male deer.
The hinds were headed up, with "Hey!" and "Ware!"
The does with great din were driven to the valleys.

Then you were ware, as they went, of the whistling of arrows;
At each bend under boughs the bright shafts flew
That tore the tawny hide with their tapered heads.
Ah! they bray and they bleed, on banks they die,
And ever the pack pell-mell comes panting behind;

Hunters with shrill horns hot on their heels—
Like the cracking of cliffs their cries resounded.
What game got away from the gallant archers
Was promptly picked off at the posts below
When they were harried on the heights and herded to the streams:

The watchers were so wary at the waiting-stations,
And the greyhounds so huge, that eagerly snatched,
And finished them off as fast as folk could see with sight.

The lord, now here, now there,
Spurs forth in sheer delight.
And drives, with pleasures rare,
The day to the dark night.

So the lord in the linden-wood leads the hunt
And Gawain the good knight in gay bed lies,

Lingered late alone, till daylight gleamed,
Under coverlet costly, curtained about.
And as he slips into slumber, slyly there comes
A little din at his door, and the latch lifted,
And he holds up his heavy head out of the clothes;

A corner of the curtain he caught back a little
And waited there warily, to see what befell.
Lo! it was the lady, loveliest to behold,
That drew the door behind her deftly and still
And was bound for his bed—abashed was the knight,

And laid his head low again in likeness of sleep;
And she stepped stealthily, and stole to his bed,
Cast aside the curtain and came within,
And lingered at her leisure, to look on his waking.
The fair knight lay feigning for a long while,
Conning in his conscience what his case might Mean or amount to—a marvel he thought it.
But yet he said within himself, "More seemly it were To try her intent by talking a little."
So he started and stretched, as startled from sleep,
Lifts wide his lids in likeness of wonder,
And signs himself swiftly, as safer to be,
with art.
Sweetly does she speak
And kindling glances dart,
Blent white and red on cheek
And laughing lips apart.

"Good morning, Sir Gawain," said that gay lady,
"A slack sleeper you are, to let one slip in!
Now you are taken in a trice—a truce we must make,
Or I shall bind you in your bed, of that be assured."
Thus laughing lightly that lady jested.

"Good morning, good lady," said Gawain the blithe,
"Be it with me as you will; I am well content!
For I surrender myself, and sue for your grace,
And that is best, I believe, and behooves me now."
Thus jested in answer that gentle knight.

"But if, lovely lady, you misliked it not,
And were pleased to permit your prisoner to rise,
I should quit this couch and accoutre me better,
And be clad in more comfort for converse here."

"Nay, not so, sweet sir," said the smiling lady;
"You shall not rise from your bed; I direct you better:
I shall hem and hold you on either hand,
And keep company awhile with my captive knight.
For as certain as I sit here, Sir Gawain you are,
Whom all the world worships, whereso you ride;
Your honor, your courtesy are highest acclaimed
By lords and by ladies, by all living men;
And lo! we are alone here, and left to ourselves:
My lord and his liegemen are long departed,
The household asleep, my handmaids too,
The door drawn, and held by a well-driven bolt,
And since I have in this house him whom all love,
I shall while the time away with mirthful speech at will.

My body is here at hand,
Your each wish to fulfill;
Your servant to command
I am, and shall be still."

"In good faith," said Gawain, "my gain is the greater,
Though I am not he of whom you have heard;
To arrive at such reverence as you recount here
I am one all unworthy, and well do I know it.
By heaven, I would hold me the happiest of men
If by word or by work I once might aspire
To the prize of your praise—'twere a pure joy!
"In good faith, Sir Gawain," said that gay lady,
"The well-proven prowess that pleases all others,
Did I scant or scout it, 'twere scarce becoming.
But there are ladies, believe me, that had liefer far
Have thee here in their hold, as I have today,
To pass an hour in pastime with pleasant words,
Assuage all their sorrows and solace their hearts,
Than much of the goodly gems and gold they possess.
But laud be to the Lord of the lofty skies,
For here in my hands all hearts' desire doth lie."
Great welcome got he there
From the lady who sat him by;
With fitting speech and fair
The good knight makes reply.

"Madame," said the merry man, "Mary reward you!
For in good faith, I find your beneficence noble.
And the fame of fair deeds runs far and wide,
But the praise you report pertains not to me,
"By the high Queen of heaven" (said she) "I count it not so,
For were I worth all the women in this world alive,
And all wealth and all worship were in my hands,
And I should hunt high and low, a husband to take,
For the nurture I have noted in thee, knight, here,
The comeliness and courtesies and courtly mirth—
And so I had ever heard, and now hold it true—
No other on this earth should have me for wife."
"You are bound to a better man," the bold knight said,
"Yet I prize the praise you have proffered me here,
And soberly your servant, my sovereign I hold you,
And acknowledge me your knight, in the name of Christ."
So they talked of this and that until 'twas nigh noon,
And ever the lady languishing in likeness of love.
With feat words and fair he framed his defense,
For were she never so winsome, the warrior had
The less will to woo, for the wound that his bane must be.
He must bear the blinding blow,
For such is fate's decree:
The lady asks leave to go;
He grants it full and free.

Then she gaily said goodbye, and glanced at him, laughing,
And as she stood, she astonished him with a stern speech:
"Now may the Giver of all good words these glad hours repay!
But our guest is not Gawain—forgot is that thought."
"How so?" said the other, and asks in some haste,
For he feared he had been at fault in the forms of his speech.
But she held up her hand, and made answer thus:
"So good a knight as Gawain is given out to be,
And the model of fair demeanor and manners pure,
Had he lain so long at a lady's side,
Would have claimed a kiss, by his courtesy,
Through some touch or trick of phrase at some tale's end."

Said Gawain, "Good lady, I grant it at once!
I shall kiss at your command, as becomes a knight,
And more, lest you mislike, so let be, I pray."

With that she turns toward him, takes him in her arms,
Leans down her lovely head, and lo! he is kissed.
They commend each other to Christ with comely words,
He sees her forth safely, in silence they part,
And then he lies no later in his lofty bed.

But calls to his chamberlain, chooses his clothes,
Goes in those garments gladly to mass,
Then takes his way to table, where attendants wait,
And made merry all day, till the moon rose in view.

Was never knight beset
'Twixt worthier ladies two:
The crone and the coquette;
Fair pastimes they pursue.

And the lord of the land rides late and long,
Hunting the barren hind over the broad heath.
He had slain such a sum, when the sun sank low,
Of does and other deer, as would dizzy one's wits.
Then they trooped in together in triumph at last,
And the count of the quarry quickly they take.

The lords lent a hand with their liegemen many,
Picked out the plumpest and put them together
And duly dressed the deer, as the deed requires.
Some were assigned the assay of the fat:
Two fingers' width fully they found on the leanest.

Then they slit the slot open and searched out the paunch,
Trimmed it with trencher-knives and tied it up tight.
They flayed the fair hide from the legs and trunk,
Then broke open the belly and laid bare the bowels,
Deftly detaching and drawing them forth.

And next at the neck they neatly parted
The weasand⁵ from the windpipe, and cast away the guts.  esophagus
At the shoulders with sharp blades they showed their skill,
Boning them from beneath, lest the sides be marred;
They breached the broad breast and broke it in twain,

And again at the gullet they begin with their knives,
Cleave down the carcass clear to the breach;
Two tender morsels they take from the throat,
Then round the inner ribs they rid off a layer
And carve out the kidney-fat, close to the spine,

Hewing down to the haunch, that all hung together,
And held it up whole, and hacked it free,
And this they named the numbles,\(^4\) that knew such terms of art.

They divide the crotch in two,
And straightway then they start
To cut the backbone through
And cleave the trunk apart.

With hard strokes they hewed off the head and the neck,
Then swiftly from the sides they severed the chine,
And the corbie's bone\(^5\) they cast on a branch.

Then they pierced the plump sides, impaled either one
With the hock of the hind foot, and hung it aloft,
To each person his portion most proper and fit.

On a hide of a hind the hounds they fed
With the liver and the lights, the leathery paunches,
And bread soaked in blood well blended therewith.

High horns and shrill set hounds a-baying,
Then merrily with their meat they make their way home,
Blowing on their bugles many a brave blast.

Ere dark had descended, that doughty band
Was come within the walls where Gawain waits at leisure.
Bliss and hearth-fire bright
Await the master's pleasure;
When the two men met that night,
Joy surpassed all measure.

Then the host in the hall his household assembles,
With the dames of high degree and their damsels fair.
In the presence of the people, a party he sends
To convey him his venison in view of the knight.
And in high good-humor he hails him then,
Counts over the kill, the cuts on the tallies,
Holds high the hewn ribs, heavy with fat.

"What think you, sir, of this? Have I thriven well?
Have I won with my woodcraft a worthy prize?"
"In good earnest," said Gawain, "this game is the finest
I have seen in seven years in the season of winter."
"And I give it to you, Gawain," said the goodly host,
"For according to our convenant, you claim it as your own."
"That is so," said Sir Gawain, "the same say I:
What I worthily have won within these fair walls,
Herewith I as willingly award it to you."
He embraces his broad neck with both his arms,
And confers on him a kiss in the comeliest style.

"Have here my profit, it proved no better; Ungrudging do I grant it, were it greater far."
"Such a gift," said the good host, "I gladly accept—
Yet it might be all the better, would you but say
Where you won this same award, by your wits alone."

\(^4\) The other internal organs.
\(^5\) A bit of gristle assigned to the ravens ("corbies").
"That was no part of the pact; press me no further,
For you have had what behoves; all other claims forbear."
With jest and compliment
They conversed, and cast off care;
To the table soon they went;
Fresh dainties wait them there.

And then by the chimney-side they chat at their ease;
The best wine was brought them, and bounteously served;
And after in their jesting they jointly accord
To do on the second day the deeds of the first:
That the two men should trade, betide as it may,
What each had taken in, at eve when they met.
They seal the pact solemnly in sight of the court;
Their cups were filled afresh to confirm the jest;
Then at last they took their leave, for late was the hour,
Each to his own bed hastening away.
Before the barnyard cock had crowed but thrice
The lord had leapt from his rest, his liegemen as well.
Both of mass and their meal they made short work:
By the dim light of dawn they were deep in the woods away.

With huntsmen and with horns
Over plains they pass that day;
They release, amid the thorns,
Swift hounds that run and bay.

Soon some were on a scent by the side of a marsh;
When the hounds opened cry, the head of the hunt
Rallied them with rough words, raised a great noise.
The hounds that had heard it came hurrying straight
And followed along with their fellows, forty together.
Then such a clamor and cry of coursing hounds
Arose, that the rocks resounded again.

Hunters exhorted them with horn and with voice;
Then all in a body bore off together
Between a mere in the marsh and a menacing crag,
To a rise where the rock stood rugged and steep,
And boulders lay about, that blocked their approach.

Then the company in consort closed on their prey:
They surrounded the rise and the rocks both,
For well they were aware that it waited within,
The beast that the bloodhounds boldly proclaimed.
Then they beat on the bushes and bade him appear,
And he made a murderous rush in the midst of them all;
The best of all boars broke from his cover,
That had ranged long unrivaled, a renegade old,
For of tough-brawned boars he was biggest far,
Most grim when he grunted—then grieved were many,
For three at the first thrust he threw to the earth,
And dashed away at once without more damage.
With "Hil!" "Hil!" and "Heyl!" "Heyl!" the others followed,
Had horns at their lips, blew high and clear.
Merry was the music of men and of hounds
That were bound after this boar, his bloodthirsty heart to quell.

Often he stands at bay,
Then scatters the pack pell-mell;
He hurts the hounds, and they
Most dolefully yowl and yell.

Men then with mighty bows moved in to shoot,
Aimed at him with their arrows and often hit,
But the points had no power to pierce through his hide,
And the barbs were brushed aside by his bristly brow;
Though the shank of the shaft shivered in pieces,
The head hopped away, wheresoever it struck.

But when their stubborn strokes had stung him at last,
Then, foaming in his frenzy, fiercely he charges,
Hies at them headlong that hindered his flight,
And many feared for their lives, and fell back a little.

But the lord on a lively horse leads the chase;
As a high-mettled huntsman his horn he blows;
He sounds the assembly and sweeps through the brush,
Pursuing this wild swine till the sunlight slanted.

All day with this deed they drive forth the time
While our lone knight so lovesome lies in his bed, Sir Gawain safe at home, in silken bower
so gay.

She comes to the curtain and cooly peeps in;
Gawain thought it good to greet her at once,
And she richly repays him with her ready words,
Settles softly at his side, and suddenly she laughs,

That lesson learned lately is lightly forgot,
Though I painted it as plain as my poor wit allowed.'
'What lesson, dear lady?' he asked all alarmed;
'I have been much to blame, if your story be true.'
'Yet my counsel was of kissing,' came her answer then,

'Where favor has been found, freely to claim
As accords with the conduct of courteous knights.'
"My dear," said the doughty man, "dismiss that thought;
Such freedom, I fear, might offend you much;
It were rude to request if the right were denied."

"But none can deny you," said the noble dame,
"You are stout enough to constrain with strength, if you choose,
Were any so ungracious as to grudge you aught."
"By heaven," said he, "you have answered well,
But threats never throve among those of my land,
Nor any gift not freely given, good though it be.
I am yours to command, to kiss when you please;
You may lay on as you like, and leave off at will."

With this,
The lady lightly bends
And graciously gives him a kiss;
The two converse as friends
Of true love's trials and bliss.

"I should like, by your leave," said the lovely lady,
"If it did not annoy you, to know for what cause
So brisk and so bold a young blood as you,
And acclaimed for all courtesies becoming a knight—
And name what knight you will, they are noblest esteemed
For loyal faith in love, in life as in story;
For to tell the tribulations of these true hearts,
Why, 'tis the very title and text of their deeds,
Suffered heavy sorrows out of secret love,
And then valorously avenged them on villainous churls
And made happy ever after the hearts of their ladies.
And you are the noblest knight known in your time;
No household under heaven but has heard of your fame,
And here by your side I have sat for two days
Yet never has a fair phrase fallen from your lips
Of the language of love, not one little word!
And you, that with sweet vows sway women's hearts,
Should show your winsome ways, and woo a young thing,
And teach by some tokens the craft of true love.
How! are you artless, whom all men praise?
Or do you deem me so dull, or deaf to such words?

Fie! Fie!
In hope of pastimes new
I have come where none can spy;
Instruct me a little, do,
While my husband is not nearby."

"God love you, gracious lady!" said Gawain then;
"It is a pleasure surpassing, and a peerless joy,
That one so worthy as you would willingly come
And take the time and trouble to talk with your knight
And content you with his company—it comforts my heart.
But to take to myself the task of telling of love,
And touch upon its texts, and treat of its themes
To one that, I know well, wields more power
In that art, by a half, than a hundred such
As I am where I live, or am like to become,
It were folly, fair dame, in the first degree!

In all that I am able, my aim is to please,
As in honor behooves me, and am evermore
Your servant heart and soul, so save me our Lord!’
Thus she tested his temper and tried many a time,
Whatever her true intent, to entice him to sin,
But so fair was his defense that no fault appeared,
Nor evil on either hand, but only bliss
they knew.
They linger and laugh awhile;
She kisses the knight so true,
Takes leave in comeliest style
And departs without more ado.

Then he rose from his rest and made ready for mass,
And then a meal was set and served, in sumptuous style;
He dallied at home all day with the dear ladies,
But the lord lingered late at his lusty sport;
Pursued his sorry swine, that swerved as he fled,
And bit asunder the backs of the best of his hounds
When they brought him to bay, till the bowmen appeared
And soon forced him forth, though he fought for dear life,
So sharp were the shafts they shot at him there.
But yet the boldest drew back from his battering head,
Till at last he was so tired he could travel no more,
But in as much haste as he might, he makes his retreat
To a rise on rocky ground, by a rushing stream.
With the bank at his back he scrapes the bare earth,
The froth foams at his jaws, frightful to see.
He whets his white tusks—then weary were all
Those hunters so hardy that hoved round about
Of aiming from afar, but ever they mistrust his mood.
He had hurt so many by then
That none had hardihood
To be torn by his tusks again,
That was brainsick, and out for blood.
Till the lord came at last on his lofty steed,
Beheld him there at bay before all his folk;
Lightly he leaps down, leaves his courser,
Bares his bright sword, and boldly advances;
Straight into the stream he strides towards his foe.
The wild thing was wary of weapon and man;
His hackles rose high; so hotly he snorts
That many watched with alarm, lest the worst befall.
The boar makes for the man with a mighty bound
So that he and his hunter came headlong together
Where the water ran wildest—the worse for the beast,
For the man, when they first met, marked him with care,
Sights well the slot, slips in the blade,
Shoves it home to the hilt, and the heart shattered,
And he falls in his fury and floats down the water,
Hounds hasten by the score
To maul him, hide and head;
Men drag him in to shore
And dogs pronounce him dead.

With many a brave blast they boast of their prize,
All hallooed in high glee, that had their wind;
The hounds bayed their best, as the bold men bade
That were charged with chief rank in that chase of renown.
Then one wise in woodcraft, and worthily skilled,
Began to dress the boar in becoming style:
He severs the savage head and sets it aloft,
Then rends the body roughly right down the spine;
Takes the bowels from the belly, broils them on coals,
Blends them well with bread to bestow on the hounds.
Then he breaks out the brawn in fair broad flitches,
And the innards to be eaten in order he takes.
The two sides, attached to each other all whole,
He suspended from a spar that was springy and tough;
And so with this swine they set out for home;
The boar's head was borne before the same man
That had stabbed him in the stream with his strong arm, right through.

He thought it long indeed
Till he had the knight in view;
At his call, he comes with speed
To claim his payment due.

The lord laughed aloud, with many a light word,
When he greeted Sir Gawain—with good cheer he speaks.
They fetch the fair dames and the folk of the house;
He brings forth the brawn, and begins the tale
Of the great length and girth, the grim rage as well,
Of the battle of the boar they beset in the wood.
The other man metly commended his deeds
And praised well the prize of his princely sport,
For the brawn of that boar, the bold knight said,
And the sides of that swine surpassed all other's.
Then they handled the huge head; he owns it a wonder,
And eyes it with abhorrence, to heighten his praise.
"Now, Gawain," said the good man, "this game becomes yours
By those fair terms we fixed, as you know full well."
"That is true," returned the knight, "and trust me, fair friend, Ail my gains, as agreed, I shall give you forthwith."
He clasps him and kisses him in courteous style,
Then serves him with the same fare a second time.
"Now we are even," said he, "at this evening feast,
And clear is every claim incurred here to date,
and debt."
"By Saint Giles!" the host replies,
"You're the best I ever met!
If your profits are all this size,
We'll see you wealthy yet!"
Then attendants set tables on trestles about,
And laid them with linen; light shone forth,
Wakened along the walls in waxen torches.
The service was set and the supper brought;
Royal were the revels that rose then in hall
At that feast by the fire, with many fair sports:
Amid the meal and after, melody sweet.
Carol-dances comely and Christmas songs,
With all the mannerly mirth my tongue may describe.
And ever our gallant knight beside the gay lady;
So uncommonly kind and complaisant was she,
With sweet stolen glances, that stirred his stout heart,
That he was at his wits' end, and wondrous vexed;
But he could not rebuff her, for courtesy forbade,
Yet took pains to please her, though the plan might 1665 go wrong.
When they to heart's delight
Had reveled there in throng,
To his chamber he calls the knight,
And thither they go along.

And there they dallied and drank, and deemed it good sport
To enact their play anew on New Year's Eve,
But Gawain asked again to go on the morrow,
For the time until his tryst was not two days.
The host hindered that, and urged him to stay,
And said, 'On my honor, my oath here I take
That you shall get to the Green Chapel to begin your chores
By dawn on New Year's Day, if you so desire.
Wherefore lie at your leisure in your lofty bed,
And I shall hunt hereabouts, and hold to our terms,
And we shall trade winnings when once more we meet,
For I have tested you twice, and true have I found you;
Now think this tomorrow: the third pays for all;
Be we merry while we may, and mindful of joy,
For heaviness of heart can be had for the asking.'
This is gravely agreed on and Gawain will stay.
They drink a last draught and with torches depart to rest.
To bed Sir Gawain went:
His sleep was of the best;
The lord, on his craft intent,
Was early up and dressed.

After mass, with his men, a morsel he takes;
Clear and crisp the morning; he calls for his mount;
The folk that were to follow him afield that day
Were high astride their horses before the hall gates.
Wondrous fair were the fields, for the frost was light;
The sun rises red amid radiant clouds,
Sails into the sky, and sends forth his beams.
They let loose the hounds by a leafy wood;
The rocks all around re-echo to their horns.
Soon some have set off in pursuit of the fox,
Cast about with craft for a clearer scent;
A young dog yaps, and is yelled at in turn;
His fellows fall to sniffing, and follow his lead,
Running in a rabble on the right track,
And he scampers all before; they discover him soon,
And when they see him with sight they pursue him the faster,
Railing at him rudely with a wrathful din.
Often he reverses over rough terrain,
Or loops back to listen in the lee of a hedge;
At last, by a little ditch, he leaps over the brush,
Comes into a clearing at a cautious pace,
Then he thought through his wiles to have thrown off the hounds
Till he was ware, as he went, of a waiting-station
Where three athwart his path threatened him at once, all gray.
Quick as a flash he wheels
And darts off in dismay;
With hard luck at his heels
He is off to the wood away.

Then it was heaven on earth to hark to the hounds
When they had come on their quarry, coursing together!
Such harsh cries and howls they hurled at his head
As all the cliffs with a crash had come down at once.
Here he was hailed, when huntsmen met him;
Yonder they yelled at him, yapping and snarling;
There they cried "Thief!" and threatened his life,
And ever the harriers at his heels, that he had no rest.
Often he was menaced when he made for the open,
And often rushed in again, for Reynard was wily;
And so he leads them a merry chase, the lord and his men,
In this manner on the mountains, till midday or near,
While our hero lies at home in wholesome sleep
Within the comely curtains on the cold morning.
But the lady, as love would allow her no rest,
And pursuing ever the purpose that pricked her heart,
Was awake with the dawn, and went to his chamber
In a fair flowing mantle that fell to the earth,
All edged and embellished with ermines fine;
No hood on her head, but heavy with gems
Were her fillet and the fret* that confined her tresses;
Her face and her fair throat freely displayed;
Her bosom all but bare, and her back as well.
She comes in at the chamber-door, and closes it with care,
 Throws wide a window—then waits no longer,
But hails him thus airily with her artful words,
with cheer:
"Ah, man, how can you sleep?
The morning is so clear!"
Though dreams have drowned him deep,
He cannot choose but hear.

*ornamental net
Deep in his dreams he darkly mutters
As a man may that mourns, with many grim thoughts
Of that day when destiny shall deal him his doom
When he greets his grim host at the Green Chapel
And must bow to his buffet, bating all strife.

But when he sees her at his side he summons his wits,
Breaks from the black dreams, and blithely answers.
That lovely lady comes laughing sweet,
Sinks down at his side, and salutes him with a kiss.
He accords her fair welcome in courtliest style;
He sees her so glorious, so gaily attired,
So faultless her features, so fair and so bright,
His heart swelled swiftly with surging joys.
They melt into mirth with many a fond smile,
Nor was fair language lacking, to further that hour's delight.

Good were their words of greeting;
Each joyed in other's sight;
Great peril attends that meeting
Should Mary forget her knight.

For that high-born beauty so hemmed him about,
Made so plain her meaning, the man must needs
Either take her tendered love or distastefully refuse.
His courtesy concerned him, lest crass he appear,
But more his soul's mischief, should he commit sin
And belie his loyal oath to the lord of that house.
"God forbid!" said the bold knight. "That shall not befall!"
With a little fond laughter he lightly let pass
All the words of special weight that were sped his way;
"I find you much at fault," the fair one said,
"Who can be cold toward a creature so close by your side,
Of all women in this world most wounded in heart,
Unless you have a sweetheart, one you hold dearer,
And allegiance to that lady so loyally knit
That you will never love another, as now I believe.
And, sir, if it be so, then say it, I beg you;
By all your heart holds dear, hide it no longer with guile."
"Lady, by Saint John."
He answers with a smile,
"Lover have I none,
Nor will have, yet awhile."

"Those words," said the woman, "are the worst of all,
But I have had my answer, and hard do I find it!
Kiss me now kindly: I can but go hence
To lament my life long like a maid lovelorn."
She inclines her head quickly and kisses the knight,
Then straightens with a sigh, and says as she stands,
"Now, dear, ere I depart, do me this pleasure:
Give me some little gift, your glove or the like,
That I may think on you, man, and mourn the less."
"Now by heavens," said he, "I wish I had here
My most precious possession, to put it in your hands,
For your deeds, beyond doubt, have often deserved
A repayment far passing my power to bestow.
But a love-token, lady, were of little avail;
It is not to your honor to have at this time
A glove as a guerdon from Gawain's hand,
And I am here on an errand in unknown realms
And have no bearers with baggage with becoming gifts,
Which distresses me, madame, for your dear sake.
A man must keep within his compass: account it neither grief nor slight."

"Nay, noblest knight alive,"
Said that beauty of body white,
"Though you be loath to give,
Yet you shall take, by right."

She reached out a rich ring, wrought all of gold,
With a splendid stone displayed on the band
That flashed before his eyes like a fiery sun;
It was worth a king's wealth, you may well believe.
"Before God, good lady, I forgo all gifts;
None have 1 to offer, nor any will 1 take."
And she urged it on him eagerly, and ever he refused,
And vowed in very earnest, prevail she would not.
And she sad to find it so, and said to him then,
"If my ring is refused for its rich cost—
You would not be my debtor for so dear a thing—
I shall give you my girdle; you gain less thereby."
She released a knot lightly, and loosened a belt
That was caught about her kirtle, the bright cloak beneath,
Of a gay green silk, with gold overwrought,
And the borders all bound with embroidery fine,
And this she presses upon him, and pleads with a smile,
Unworthy though it were, that it would not be scorned.
But the man still maintains that he means to accept Neither gold nor any gift, till by God's grace
The fate that lay before him was fully achieved.
"And be not offended, fair lady, I beg,
And give over your offer, for ever I must decline.
I am grateful for favor shown
Past all deserts of mine,
And ever shall be your own
True servant, rain or shine."

"Now does my present displease you," she promptly inquired,
"Because it seems in your sight so simple a thing?
And belike, as it is little, it is less to praise,
But if the virtue that invests it were verily known,
It would be held, I hope, in higher esteem.
For the man that possesses this piece of silk,
If he bore it on his body, belted about,
There is no hand under heaven that could hew him down,
For he could not be killed by any craft on earth."

Then the man began to muse, and mainly he thought
It was a pearl for his plight, the peril to come
When he gains the Green Chapel to get his reward;
Could he escape unscathed, the scheme were noble!
Then he bore with her words and withstood them no more,
And she repeated her petition and pleaded anew,
And he granted it, and gladly she gave him the belt,
And besought him for her sake to conceal it well,
Lest the noble lord should know—and, the knight agrees
That not a soul save themselves shall see it thenceforth

He thanked her with fervent heart,
As often as ever he might;
Three times, before they part,
She has kissed the stalwart knight.

Then the lady took her leave, and left him there,
For more mirth with that man she might not have.
When she was gone, Sir Gawain got from his bed,
Arose and arrayed him in his rich attire;
Tucked away the token the temptress had left,
Laid it reliably where he looked for it after.

And then with good cheer to the chapel he goes,
Approached a priest in private, and prayed to be taught
To lead a better life and lift up his mind,
Lest he be among the lost when he must leave this world.
And shamefaced at shrift he showed his misdeeds
From the largest to the least, and asked the Lord's mercy,
And called on his confessor to cleanse his soul,
And he absolved him of his sins as safe and as clean
As if the dread Day of Doom were to dawn on the morrow.
And then he made merry amid the fine ladies
With deft-footed dances and dalliance light,
As never until now, while the afternoon wore away.

He delighted all around him,
And all agreed, that day,
They never before had found him
So gracious and so gay.

Now peaceful be his pasture, and love play him fair!
The host is on horseback, hunting afield;
He has finished off this fox that he followed so long:
As he leapt a low hedge to look for the villain
Where he heard all the hounds in hot pursuit,
Reynard comes racing out of a rough thicket,
And all the rabble in a rush, right at his heels.
The man beholds the beast, and bides his time,
And bares his bright sword, and brings it down hard,
And he blenches from the blade, and backward he starts;
A hound hurries up and hinders that move,
And before the horse's feet they fell on him at once

And ripped the rascal's throat with a wrathful din.
The lord soon alighted and lifted him free,
Swiftly snatch'd him up from the snapping jaws,
Holds him over his head, halloos with a will,
And the dogs bayed the dirge, that had done him to death.

Hunters hastened chither with horns at their lips,
Sounding the assembly till they saw him at last.
When that comely company was come in together,
All that bore bugles blew them at once,
And the others all hallooed, that had no horns.

It was the merriest medley that ever a man heard,
The racket that they raised for Sir Reynard's soul that died.
Their hounds they praised and fed,
Fondling their heads with pride,
And they took Reynard the Red
And stripped away his hide.

And then they headed homeward, for evening had come,
Blowing many a blast on their bugles bright.
The lord at long last alights at his house,

Finds fire on the hearth where the fair knight waits,
Sir Gawain the good, that was glad in heart.
With the ladies, that loved him, he lingered at ease;
He wore a rich robe of blue, that reached to the earth
And a surcoat lined softly with sumptuous furs;
A hood of the same hue hung on his shoulders;
With bands of bright ermine embellished were both.
He comes to meet the man amid all the folk,
And greets him good-humoredly, and gaily he says,
'I shall follow forthwith the form of our pledge'
That we framed to good effect amid fresh-filled cups.'
He clasps him accordingly and kisses him thrice,
As amiably and as earnestly as ever he could.
"By heaven," said the host, "you have had some luck Since you took up this trade, if the terms were good."

'Never trouble about the terms,' he returned at once,
'Since all that I owe here is openly paid.'
'Marry!' said the other man, "mine is much less,
For I have hunted all day, and nought have I got
But this foul fox pelt, the fiend take the goods!
Which but poorly repays such precious things
That you have cordially conferred, such kisses three so good."

'Enough!' said Sir Gawain;
'I thank you, by the rood!'

And how the fox was slain
He told him, as they stood.

With minstrelsy and mirth, with all manner of meats,
They made as much merriment as any men might (Amid laughing of ladies and light hearted girls; So gay grew Sir Gawain and the goodly host)
Unless they had been besotted, or brainless fools.
The knight joined in jesting with that joyous folk,
Until at last it was late; ere long they must part,
And be off to their beds, as behooved them each one.

Then politely his leave of the lord of the house
Our noble knight takes, and renew his thanks:
"The courtesies countless accorded me here,
Your kindness at this Christmas, may heaven's King repay!
Henceforth, if you will have me, I hold you my liege,
And so, as I have said, I must set forth tomorrow,
If I may take some trusty man to teach, as you promised,
The way to the Green Chapel, that as God allows
I shall see my fate fulfilled on the first of the year."
"In good faith," said the good man, "with a good will Every promise on my part shall be fully performed."
He assigns him a servant to set him on the path,
To see him safe and sound over the snowy hills,
To follow the fastest way through forest green and grove.

Gawain thanks him again,
So kind his favors prove,
And of the ladies then
He takes his leave, with love.

Courteously he kissed them, with care in his heart,
And often wished them well, with warmest thanks,
Which they for their part were prompt to repay.
They commend him to Christ with disconsolate sighs;
And then in that hall with the household he parts—
Each man that he met, he remembered to thank
For his deeds of devotion and diligent pains,
And the trouble he had taken to tend to his needs;
And each one as woeful, that watched him depart,
As he had lived with him loyally all his life long.
By lads bearing lights he was led to his chamber
And blithely brought to his bed, to be at his rest.
How soundly he slept, I presume not to say,
For there were matters of moment his thoughts might well pursue.
Let him lie and wait;
He has little more to do,
Then listen, while I relate
How they kept their rendezvous.

Part 4

Now the New Year draws near, and the night passes,
The day dispels the dark, by the Lord's decree;
But wild weather awoke in the world without:
The clouds in the cold sky cast down their snow
With great gusts from the north, grievous to bear.
Sleet showered aslant upon shivering beasts;
The wind warbled wild as it whipped from aloft,
And drove the drifts deep in the dales below.
Long and well he listens, that lies in his bed;
Though he lifts not his eyelids, little he sleeps;
Each crow of the cock he counts without fail.
Readily from his rest he rose before dawn,
For a lamp had been left him, that lighted his chamber.
He called to his chamberlain, who quickly appeared,
And bade him get him his gear, and gird his good steed,
And he sets about briskly to bring in his arms,
And makes ready his master in manner most fit.
First he clad him in his clothes, to keep out the cold,
And then his other harness, made handsome anew,
His plate-armor of proof, polished with pains,
The rings of his rich mail rid of their rust,
And all was fresh as at first, and for this he gave thanks indeed.

In his richest raiment he robed himself then:
His crested coat-armor, close-stitched with craft,
With stones of strange virtue on silk velvet set;
All bound with embroidery on borders and seams
And lined warmly and well with furs of the best.
Yet he left not his love-gift, the lady's girdle;
Gawain, for his own good, forgot not that:
When the bright sword was belted and bound on his haunches,
Then twice with that token he twined him about.
Sweetly did he swathe him in that swatch of silk,
That girdle of green so goodly to see,
That against the gay red showed gorgeous bright.
Yet he wore not for its wealth that wondrous girdle,
Nor pride in its pendants, though polished they were,
Though glittering gold gleamed at the end,
But to keep himself safe when consent he must
To endure a deadly dint, and all defense denied.

And now the bold knight came Into the courtyard wide;
That folk of worthy fame
He thanks on every side.

Then was Gringolet girt, that was great and huge,
And had sojourned safe and sound, and savored his fare;
He pawed the earth in his pride, that princely steed.
The good knight draws near him and notes well his look,
And says sagely to himself, and soberly swears,
'Here is a household in hall that upholds the right!'
The man that maintains it, may happiness be his!
Likewise the dear lady, may love betide her!

If thus they in charity cherish a guest
That are honored here on earth, may they have his reward
That reigns high in heaven—and also you all;
And might I live in this land but a little while,
I should willingly reward you, and well, if I might.

Then he steps into the stirrup and bestrides his mount:
His shield is shown forth; on his shoulder he casts it;
Strikes the side of his steed with his steel spurs,
And he starts across the stones, nor stands any longer to prance.

On horseback was the swain
That bore his spear and lance;
"May Christ this house maintain
And guard it from mischance!"

The bridge was brought down, and the road gates
Unbarred and carried back upon both sides;
He commended him to Christ, and crossed over the planks;
Praised the noble porter, who prayed on his knees
That God save Sir Gawain, and bade him good day,
And went on his way alone with the man

That was to lead him ere long to that luckless place
Where the dolorous dint must be dealt him at last.
Under bare boughs they ride, where steep banks rise,
Over high cliffs they climb, where cold snow clings;
The heavens held aloof, but heavy thereunder

Mist mantled the moors, moved on the slopes.
Each hill had a hat, a huge cape of cloud;
Brooks bubbled and broke over broken rocks,
Flashing in freshets that waterfalls fed.

Roundabout was the road that ran through the wood
Till the sun at that season was soon to rise, that day.
They were on a hilltop high;
The white snow round them lay;
The man that rode nearby
Now bade his master stay.

"For I have seen you here safe at the set time,
And now you are not far from that notable place
That you have sought for so long with such special pains,
But this I say for certain, since I know you, sir knight,

And have your good at heart, and hold you dear—
Would you heed well my words, it were worth your while—
You are rushing into risks that you reck not of;
There is a villain in yon valley, the veriest on earth,
For he is rugged and rude, and ready with his fists,
And most immense in his mold of mortals alive,
And his body bigger than the best four
That are in Arthur's house, Hector" or any.

6. Either the Trojan hero or one of Arthur's knights.
He gets his grim way at the Green Chapel;
None passes by that place so proud in his arms
That he does not dash him down with his deadly blows,
For he is heartless wholly, and heedless of right,
For be it chaplain or churl that by the Chapel rides,
Monk or mass-priest or any man else,
He would as soon strike him dead as stand on two feet.
Wherefore I say, just as certain as you sit there astride,
You cannot but be killed, if his counsel holds,
For he would trounce you in a trice, had you twenty lives
He has lived long in this land
And dealt out deadly bale;
Against his heavy hand
Your power cannot prevail.

"And so, good Sir Gawain, let the grim man be;
Go off by some other road, in God’s own name!
Leave by some other land, for the love of Christ,
And I shall get me home again, and give you my word
That I shall swear by God’s self and the saints above,
By heaven and by my halidom and other oaths more,
To conceal this day’s deed, nor say to a soul
That ever you fled for fear from any that I knew."
"Many thanks!" said the other man—and demurring he speaks—
"Fair fortune befall you for your friendly words!
And conceal this day’s deed I doubt not you would,
But though you never told the tale, if I turned back now,
Forsook this place for fear, and fled, as you say,
I were a caitiff coward; I could not be excused.
But I must to the Chapel to chance my luck
And say to that same man such words as I please, Befall what may befall through Fortune’s will Though he be a quarrelsome knave
With a cudgel great and grim,
The Lord is strong to save:
His servants trust in him."
"Marry," said the man, "since you tell me so much,
And I see you are set to seek your own harm,
If you crave a quick death, let me keep you no longer!
Put your helm on your head, your hand on your lance,
And ride the narrow road down yon rocky slope
Till it brings you to the bottom of the broad valley.
Then look a little ahead, on your left hand,
And you will soon see before you that self-same Chapel,
And the man of great might that is master there.
Now goodbye in God’s name, Gawain the noble!
For all the world’s wealth I would not stay here,
Or go with you in this wood one footstep further!
He tarried no more to talk, but turned his bridle,
Hit his horse with his heels as hard as he might,
Leaves the knight alone, and off like the wind 2155 goes leaping.

"By God," said Gawain then,
"I shall not give way to weeping;
God's will be done, amen!
I commend me to his keeping."

He puts his heels to his horse, and picks up the path;
Goes in beside a grove where the ground is steep,
Rides down the rough slope right to the valley;
And then he looked a little about him—the landscape was wild,
And not a soul to be seen, nor sign of a dwelling,
2165 But high banks on either hand hemmed it about,
With many a ragged rock and rough-hewn crag;
The skies seemed scored by the scowling peaks.
Then he halted his horse, and hoved there a space,
And sought on every side for a sight of the Chapel,
2170 But no such place appeared, which puzzled him sore,
Yet he saw some way off what seemed like a mound,
A hillock high and broad, hard by the water,
Where the stream fell in foam down the face of the steep
And bubbled as if it boiled on its bed below.
2175 The knight urges his horse, and heads for the knoll;
Leaps lightly to earth; loops well the rein
Of his steed to a stout branch, and stations him there.
He strides straight to the mound, and strolls all about,
Much wondering what it was, but no whit the wiser;
2180 It had a hole at one end, and on either side,
And was covered with coarse grass in clumps all without,
And hollow all within, like some old cave,
Or a crevice of an old crag—he could not discern 2185 "Can this be the Chapel Green?
Alack!" said the man, "here might
The devil himself be seen Saying matins at black midnight!"

"Now by heaven," said he, "it is bleak hereabouts;
2190 This prayer-house is hideous, half-covered with grass!
Well may the grim man mantled in green
Hold here his orisons, in hell's own style!
Now I feel it is the Fiend, in my five wits,
That has tempted me to this tryst, to take my life;
2195 This is a Chapel of mischance, may the mischief take it!
As accursed a country church as I came upon ever!"
With his helm on his head, his lance in his hand,
He stalks toward the steep wall of that strange house.
Then he heard, on the hill, behind a hard rock,
2200 Beyond the brook, from the bank, a most barbarous din:
Lord! it clattered in the cliff! it cleave it in two,
As one upon a grindstone ground a great scythe!
Lord! it whirred like a mill-wheel whirling about!
Lord! it echoed loud and long, lamentable to hear!
Then "By heaven," said the bold knight, "that business up there
Is arranged for my arrival, or else I am much misled.
   Let God work! Ah me!
   All hope of help has fled!
   Forfeit my life may be
   But noise I do not dread."

Then he listened no longer, but loudly he called,
"Who has power in this place, high parley to hold?
For none greets Sir Gawain, or gives him good day;
If any would a word with him, let him walk forth
And speak now or never, to speed his affairs."
"Abide," said one on the bank above over his head,
"And what I promised you once shall straightway be given."
Yet he stayed not his grindstone, nor stinted its noise,
But worked awhile at his whetting before he would rest,
And then he comes around a crag, from a cave in the rocks,
Hurling out of hiding with a hateful weapon,
A Danish ax devised for that day's deed,
i.e., long-bladed
With a broad blade and bright, bent in a curve,
Filed to a fine edge—four feet it measured
By the length of the lace that was looped round the haft.
And in form as at first, the fellow all green,
His lordly face and his legs, his locks and his beard,
Save that firm upon two feet forward he strides,
Sets a hand on the ax-head, the haft to the earth;
When he came to the cold stream, and cared not to wade,
He vaults over on his ax, and advances amain
On a broad bank of snow, overbearing and brisk of mood.
   Little did the knight incline
   When face to face they stood;
   Said the other man, "Friend mine,
   It seems your word holds good!"

"God love you, Sir Gawain!" said the Green Knight then,
"And well met this morning, man, at my place!
And you have followed me faithfully and found me betimes,
And on the business between us we both are agreed:
Twelve months ago today you took what was yours,
And you at this New Year must yield me the same.
And we have met in these mountains, remote from all eyes:
There is none here to halt us or hinder our sport;
Unhasp your high helm, and have here your wages;
Make no more demur than I did myself
When you hacked off my head with one hard blow."
"No, by God," said Sir Gawain, "that granted me life,
I shall grudge not the guerdon, grim though it prove;
Bestow but one stroke, and I shall stand still,
And you may lay on as you like till the last of my part be paid."

He proffered, with good grace,
His bare neck to the blade,
And feigned a cheerful face:
He scorned to seem afraid.

Then the grim man in green gathers his strength,
Heaves high the heavy ax to hit him the blow.
With all the force in his frame he fetches it aloft,
With a grimace as grim as he would grind him to bits;
Had the blow he bestowed been as big as he threatened,
A good knight and gallant had gone to his grave.

But Gawain at the great ax glanced up aside.
As down it descended with death-dealing force,
And his shoulders shrank a little from the sharp iron.
Abruptly the brawny man breaks off the stroke,
And then reproved with proud words that prince among knights.

"You are not Gawain the glorious," the green man said,
"That never fell back on field in the face of the foe,
And now you flee for fear, and have felt no harm:
Such news of that knight I never heard yet!
I moved not a muscle when you made to strike,
Nor caviled at the cut in King Arthur's house;
My head fell to my feet, yet steadfast I stood,
And you, all unharmed, are wholly dismayed—
Wherefore the better man I, by all odds,
must be."

Said Gawain, "Strike once more;
I shall neither flinch nor flee;
But if my head falls to the floor
There is no mending me!"

"But go on, man, in God's name, and get to the point!
Deliver me my destiny, and do it out of hand,
For I shall stand to the stroke and stir not an inch Till your ax has hit home—on my honor I swear it!"

"Have at thee then!" said the other, and heaves it aloft,
And glares down as grimly as he had gone mad.

He made a mighty feint, but marred not his hide;
Withdraw the ax adroitly before it did damage.
Gawain gave no ground, nor glanced up aside,
But stood still as a stone, or else a stout stump
That is held in hard earth by a hundred roots.

Then merrily does he mock him, the man all in green:
"So now you have your nerve again, I needs must strike;
Uphold the high knighthood that Arthur bestowed,
And keep your neck-bone clear, if this cut allows!"
Then was Gawain gripped with rage, and grimly he said,
"Why, thrash away, tyrant, I tire of your threats;
You make such a scene, you must frighten yourself."
Said the green fellow, "In faith, so fiercely you speak
That I shall finish this affair, nor further grace allow.
He stands prepared to strike
And scowls with both lip and brow;
No marvel if the man dislike
Who can hope no rescue now.

He gathered up the grim ax and guided it well:
Let the barb at the blade's end brush the bare throat;
He hammered down hard, yet harmed him no whit
Save a scratch on one side, that severed the skin;
The end of the hooked edge entered the flesh,
And a little blood lightly leapt to the earth.
And when the man beheld his own blood bright on the snow,
He sprang a spear's length with feet spread wide,
Seized his high helm, and set it on his head,
Shoved before his shoulders the shield at his back,
Bares his trusty blade, and boldly he speaks—
Not since he was a babe born of his mother
Was he once in this world one-half so blithe—
"Have done with your hacking—harry me no more!
I have borne, as behooved, one blow in this place;
If you make another move I shall meet it midway
And promptly, I promise you, pay back each blow with brand.
One stroke acquits me here;
So did our covenant stand
In Arthur's court last year—
Wherefore, sir, hold your hand!"

He lowers the long ax and leans on it there,
Sets his arms on the head, the haft on the earth,
How he faces him fearless, fierce in full arms,
And plies him with proud words—it pleases him well.
Then once again gaily to Gawain he calls,
And in a loud voice and lusty, delivers these words:
"Bold fellow, on this field your anger forbear!
No man has made demands here in manner uncouth,
Nor done, save as duly determined at court.
I owed you a hit and you have it; be happy therewith!
The rest of my rights here I freely resign.
Had I been a bit busier, a buffet, perhaps,
I could have dealt more directly, and done you some harm.
First I flourished with a feint, in frolicsome mood,
And left your hide unhurt—and here I did well
By the fair terms we fixed on the first night;
And fully and faithfully you followed accord:
Gave over all your gains as a good man should.
A second feint, sir, I assigned for the morning
You kissed my comely wife—each kiss you restored.
For both of these there behooved two feigned blows
by right.
True men pay what they owe;
No danger then in sight.
You failed at the third throw,
So take my tap, sir knight.

"For that is my belt about you, that same braided girdle,
My wife it was that wore it; I know well the tale,
And the count of your kisses and your conduct too,
And the wooing of my wife—it was all my scheme!"

So is Gawain, in good faith, to other gay knights.
Yet you lacked, sir, a little in loyalty there,
But the cause was not cunning, nor courtship either,
But that you loved your own life; the less, then, to blame."
The other stout knight in a study stood a long while,
So gripped with grim rage that his great heart shook.
All the blood of his body burned in his face
As he shrank back in shame from the man’s sharp speech.
The first words that fell from the fair knight’s lips:
"Accursed be a cowardly and covetous heart!
In you is villainy and vice, and virtue laid low!"

Then he grasps the green girdle and lets go the knot, Hands it over in haste, and hotly he says:
"Behold there my falsehood, ill hap betide it!
Your cut taught me cowardice, care for my life,
And coveting came after, contrary both
To largesse and loyalty belonging to knights.
Now am I faulty and false, that fearful was ever
Of disloyalty and lies, bad luck to them both!
and greed."

I confess, knight, in this place,
Most dire is my misdeed;
Let me gain back your good grace,
And thereafter I shall take heed."

Then the other laughed aloud, and lightly he said,
"Such harm as I have had, I hold it quite healed.
You are so fully confessed, your failings made known,
And bear the plain penance of the point of my blade,
I hold you polished as a pearl, as pure and as bright
As you had lived free of fault since first you were born.

And I give you, sir, this girdle that is gold-hemmed
And green as my garments, that, Gawain, you may Be mindful of this meeting when you mingle in throng
With nobles of renown—and known by this token
How it chanced at the Green Chapel, to chivalrous knights.
And you shall in this New Year come yet again
And we shall finish out our feast in my fair hall,
with cheer."

He urged the knight to stay,
And said, "With my wife so dear
"Indeed," said the doughty knight, and doffed his high helm,
And held it in his hands as he offered his thanks,
'I have lingered long enough—may good luck be yours,
And he reward you well that all worship bestows!'

And commend me to that comely one, your courteous wife,
Both herself and that other, my honoured ladies,
That have trapped their true knight in their trammels so quaint.
But if a dullard should dote, deem it no wonder,

And through the wiles of a woman be wooed into sorrow,
For so was Adam by one, when the world began,
And Solomon by many more, and Samson the mighty—
Deilah was his doom, and David thereafter

Was beguiled by Bathsheba, and bore much distress;

Now these were vexed by their devices—twere a very joy

Could one but learn to love, and believe them not.

For these were proud princes, most prosperous of old,
Past all lovers lucky, that languished under heaven,

bemused.

And one and all fell prey
To women that they had used;
If I be led astray,
Methinks I may be excused.

"But your girdle, God love you! I gladly shall take
And be pleased to possess, not for the pure gold,
Nor the bright belt itself, nor the beauteous pendants,

Nor for wealth, nor worldly state, nor workmanship fine,

But a sign of excess it shall seem oftentimes

When I ride in renown, and remember with shame

The faults and the frailty of the flesh perverse,

How its tenderness entices the foul taint of sin;

And so when praise and high prowess have pleased my heart,
A look at this love-lace will lower my pride.

But one thing would I learn, if you were not loath,

Since you are lord of yonder land where I have long sojourned

With honor in your house—may you have His reward
That upholds all the heavens, highest on throne!

How runs your right name?—and let the rest go.'

'That shall I give you gladly,' said the Green Knight then;

"Bertilak de Hautdesert, this barony I hold.

Through the might of Morgan le Faye, that lodges at my house,
By subtleties of science and sorcerers' arts,

The mistress of Merlin, she has caught many a man,

For sweet love in secret she shared sometime

With that wizard, that knows well each one of your knights and you.

8. Arthur’s half-sister, an enchantress who sometimes abetted him, sometimes made trouble for him.
9. The wise magician who had helped Arthur become king.
Morgan the Goddess, she,
So styled by title true;
None holds so high degree
That her arts cannot subdue.

"She guided me in this guise to your glorious hall,
To assay, if such it were, the surfeit of pride
That is rumored of the retinue of the Round Table.
She put this shape upon me to puzzle your wits,

To afflict the fair queen, and frighten her to death
With awe of that elvish man that eerily spoke
With his head in his hand before the high table.
She was with my wife at home, that old withered lady,
Your own aunt1 is she, Arthur's half-sister,

The Duchess' daughter of Tintagel, that dear King Uther
Got Arthur on after, that honored is now.
And therefore, good friend, come feast with your aunt;
Make merry in my house; my men hold you dear,
And I wish you as well, sir, with all my heart,
As any man God ever made, for your great good faith.'

But the knight said him nay, that he might by no means.
They clasped then and kissed, and commended each other
To the Prince of Paradise, and parted with one assent.

Gawain sets out anew;
Toward the court his course is bent;
And the knight all green in hue,
Wheresoever he wished, he went.

Wild ways in the world our worthy knight rides
On Gringolet, that by grace had been granted his life.
He harbored often in houses, and often abroad,
And with many valiant adventures verily he met
That I shall not take time to tell in this story.
The hurt was whole that he had in his neck,

And the bright green belt on his body he bore,
Oblique, like a baldric, bound at his side,
Below his left shoulder, laced in a knot,
In betokening of the blame he had borne for his fault;
And so to court in due course he comes safe and sound.

Bliss abounded in hall when the high-born heard
That good Gawain was come; glad tidings they thought it.
The Icing kisses the knight, and the queen as well,
And many a comrade came to clasp him in arms,
And eagerly they asked, and awesomely he told,

Confessed all his cares and discomfitures many,
How it chanced at the Chapel, what cheer made the knight,
The love of the lady, the green lace at last.
The nick on his neck he naked displayed
That he got in his disgrace at the Green Knight's hands,

1. Morgan was the daughter of Igraine, duchess of Tintagel, and her husband the duke; Igraine conceived Arthur when his father, Uther, lay with her through one of Merlin's trickeries.
alone.
With rage in heart he speaks,
And grieves with many a groan;
The blood burns in his cheeks
For shame at what must be shown.

'Behold, sir,' said he, and handles the belt,
'This is the blazon of the blemish that I bear on my neck;
This is the sign of sore loss that I have suffered there
For the cowardice and coveting that I came to there;
This is the badge of false faith that I was found in there,
And I must bear it on my body till I breathe my last.
For one may keep a deed dark, but undo it no whit,
For where a fault is made fast, it is fixed evermore.'
The king, comforts the knight, and the court all together
Agree with gay laughter and gracious intent
That the lords and the ladies belonging to the Table,
Each brother of that band, a baldric should have,
A belt borne oblique, of a bright green,
To be worn with one accord for that worthy's sake.
So that was taken as a token by the Table Round,
And he honored that had it, evermore after,
As the best book of knighthood bids it be known.
In the old days of Arthur this happening befell;
The books of Brutus' deeds bear witness thereto
Since Brutus, the bold knight, embarked for this land
After the siege ceased at Troy and the city fared amiss.

Many such, ere we were born,
Have befallen here, ere this.
May He that was crowned with thorn
Bring all men to His bliss! Amen.

Honi Soit Qui Mai Pense

2. "Shame be to the man who has evil in his mind." This is the motto of the Order of the Garter, founded ca. 1350; apparently a copyist of the poem associated this order with the one founded to honor Gawain.

GEORGE CHAUCER
ca. 1343-1400

Medieval social theory held that society was made up of three "estates": the nobility, composed of a small hereditary aristocracy, whose mission on earth was to rule over and defend the body politic; the church, whose duty was to look after the spiritual welfare of that body; and everyone else, the large mass of commoners who were supposed to do the work that provided for its physical needs. By the late fourteenth century, however, these basic categories were layered into complex, interrelated, and unstable social strata among which birth, wealth, profession, and personal ability all played a part in determining one's status in a world that was rapidly changing economically, politically, and socially. Chaucer's life and his works, especially The Canterbury Tales, were profoundly influenced by these forces. A growing and prosperous middle class was beginning to play increasingly important roles in church and state, blurring the traditional class boundaries, and it was into this middle class that Chaucer was born.

Chaucer was the son of a prosperous wine merchant and probably spent his boyhood in the mercantile atmosphere of London's Vintry, where ships docked with wines from France and Spain. Here he would have mixed daily with people of all sorts, heard several languages spoken, become fluent in French, and received schooling in Latin. Instead of apprenticing Chaucer to the family business, however, his father was apparently able to place him, in his early teens, as a page in one of the great aristocratic households of England, that of the countess of Ulster who was married to Prince Lionel, the second son of Edward III. There Chaucer would have acquired the manners and skills required for a career in the service of the ruling class, not only in the role of personal attendant in royal households but in a series of administrative posts. (For Chaucer's portrait, see the color insert in this volume.)

We can trace Chaucer's official and personal life in a considerable number of surviving historical documents, beginning with a reference, in Elizabeth of Ulster's household accounts, to an outfit he received as a page (1357). He was captured by the French and ransomed in one of Edward III's campaigns during the Hundred Years War (1359). He was a member of King Edward's personal household (1367) and took part in several diplomatic missions to Spain (1366), France (1368), and Italy (1372). As controller of customs on wool, sheepskins, and leather for the port of London (1374—85), Chaucer audited and kept books on the export taxes, which were one of the Crown's main sources of revenue. During this period he was living in a rent-free apartment over one of the gates in the city wall, probably as a perquisite of the customs job. He served as a justice of the peace and knight of the shire (the title given to members of Parliament) for the county of Kent (1385—86) where he moved after giving up the controllership. As clerk of the king's works (1389—91), Chaucer was responsible for the maintenance of numerous royal residences, parks, and other holdings; his duties included supervision of the construction of the nave of Westminster Abbey and of stands and lists for a celebrated tournament staged by Richard II. While the records show Chaucer receiving many grants and annuities in addition to his salary for these services, they also show that at times he was being pressed by creditors and obliged to borrow money.

These activities brought Chaucer into association with the ruling nobility of the kingdom, with Prince Lionel and his younger brother John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, England's most powerful baron during much of Chaucer's lifetime; with their father, King Edward; and with Edward's grandson, who succeeded to the throne as Richard II. Near the end of his life Chaucer addressed a comic Complaint to His Purse to Henry IV—John of Gaunt's son, who had usurped the crown from his cousin Richard—as a reminder that the treasury owed Chaucer his annuity. Chaucer's wife, Philippa, served in the households of Edward's queen and of John of Gaunt's second wife, Constance, daughter of the king of Castile. A Thomas Chaucer, who was probably Chaucer's son, was an eminent man in the next generation, and Thomas's daughter Alice was married successively to the earl of Salisbury and the duke of Suffolk. The gap between the commoners and the aristocracy would thus have been bridged by Chaucer's family in the course of three generations.

None of these documents contains any hint that this hardworking civil servant wrote poetry, although poetry would certainly have been among the diversions cultivated at English courts in Chaucer's youth. That poetry, however, would have been in French, which still remained the fashionable language and literature of the English aristocracy, whose culture in many ways had more in common with that of the French nobles with whom they warred than with that of their English subjects. Chaucer's earliest models, works by Guillaume de Machaut (13007-1377) and Jean Froissart (1333?—1400?), the leading French poets of the day, were lyrics and narratives about courtly love, often cast in the form of a dream in which the poet acted as a protagonist or participant in some aristocratic love affair. The poetry of Machaut and Froissart derives from the thirteenth-century Romance of the Rose, a long dream allegory in which the dreamer suffers many agonies and trials for the love of a symbolic rosebud. Chaucer’s apprentice work may well have been a partial translation of the twenty-one-thousand-line Romance. His first important original poem is The Book of the Duchess, an elegy in the form of a dream vision commemorating John of Gaunt’s first wife, the young duchess of Lancaster, who died in 1368.

The diplomatic mission that sent Chaucer to Italy in 1372 was in all likelihood a milestone in his literary development. Although he may have acquired some knowledge of the language and literature from Italian merchants and bankers posted in London, this visit and a subsequent one to Florence (1378) brought him into direct contact with the Italian Renaissance. Probably he acquired manuscripts of works by Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio—the last two still alive at the time of Chaucer’s visit, although he probably did not meet them. These writers provided him with models of new verse forms, new subject matter, and new modes of representation. The House of Fame, still a dream vision, takes the poet on a journey in the talons of a gigantic eagle to the celestial palace of the goddess Fame, a trip that at many points affectionately parodies Dante’s journey in the Divine Comedy. In his dream vision The Parliament of Fowls, all the birds meet on St. Valentine’s Day to choose their mates; their “parliament” humorously depicts the ways in which different classes in human society think and talk about love. Boccaccio provided sources for two of Chaucer’s finest poems—although Chaucer never mentions his name. The Knight’s Tale, the first of The Canterbury Tales, is based on Boccaccio’s romance II Teseida (The Story of Theseus). His longest completed poem, Troilus and Criseyde (ca. 1385), which tells the story of how Trojan Prince Troilus loved and finally lost Criseyde to the Greek warrior Diomede, is an adaptation of Boccaccio’s II Filostrato (The Love-Stricken). Chaucer reworked the latter into one of the greatest love poems in any language. Even if he had never written The Canterbury Tales, Troilus would have secured Chaucer a place among the major English poets.

A final dream vision provides the frame for Chaucer’s first experiment with a series of tales, the unfinished Legend of Good Women. In the dream, Chaucer is accused of heresy and antifeminism by Cupid, the god of love himself, and ordered to do penance by writing a series of “legends,” i.e., saints’ lives, of Cupid’s martyrs, women who were betrayed by false men and died for love. Perhaps a noble patron, possibly Queen Anne, asked the poet to write something to make up for telling about Criseyde’s betrayal of Troilus.

Throughout his life Chaucer also wrote moral and religious works, chiefly translations. Besides French, which was a second language for him, and Italian, Chaucer also read Latin. He made a prose translation of the Latin Consolation of Philosophy, written by the sixth-century Roman statesman Boethius while in prison awaiting execution for crimes for which he had been unjustly condemned. The Consolation became a favorite book for the Middle Ages, providing inspiration and comfort through its lesson that worldly fortune is deceitful and ephemeral and through the platonist doctrine that the body itself is only a prison house for the soul that aspires to eternal things. The influence of Boethius is deeply ingrained in The Knight’s Tale and Troilus. The ballade Truth compresses the Boethian and Christian teaching into three stanzas of homely moral advice.

Thus long before Chaucer conceived of The Canterbury Tales, his writings were many faceted: they embrace prose and poetry; human and divine love; French, Italian, and Latin sources; secular and religious influences; comedy and philosophy. Moreover, different elements are likely to mix in the same work, often making it difficult to extract from Chaucer simple, direct, and certain meanings.

This Chaucerian complexity owes much to the wide range of Chaucer’s learning and his exposure to new literary currents on the Continent but perhaps also to the special social position he occupied as a member of a new class of civil servants. Born into the urban middle class, Chaucer, through his association with the court and service of the Crown, had attained the rank of "esquire," roughly equivalent to what would later be termed a "gentleman." His career brought him into contact with overlapping bourgeois and aristocratic social worlds, without his being securely anchored in either. Although he was born a commoner and continued to associate with commoners in his official life, he did not live as a commoner; and although his training and service at court, his wife's connections, and probably his poetry brought him into contact with the nobility, he must always have been conscious of the fact that he did not really belong to that society of which birth alone could make one a true member.
Situated at the intersection of these social worlds, Chaucer had the gift of being able to view with both sympathy and humor the behaviors, beliefs, and pretensions of the diverse people who comprised the levels of society. Chaucer's art of being at once involved in and detached from a given situation is peculiarly his own, but that art would have been appreciated by a small group of friends close to Chaucer's social position—men like Sir Philip de la Vache, to whom Chaucer addressed the humorous envoy to Truth. Chaucer belongs to an age when poetry was read aloud. A beautiful frontispiece to a manuscript of Troilus pictures the poet's public performance before a magnificently dressed royal audience, and he may well have been invited at times to read his poems at court. But besides addressing a listening audience, to whose allegedly superior taste and sensibility the poet often ironically defers (for example, The General Prologue, lines 745—48), Chaucer has in mind discriminating readers whom he might expect to share his sense of humor and his complex attitudes toward the company of "sondry folk" who make the pilgrimage to Canterbury.

The text given here is from E. T. Donaldson's Chaucer's Poetry: An Anthology for the Modern Reader (1958, 1975) with some modifications. For The Canterbury Tales the Hengwrt Manuscript has provided the textual basis. The spelling has been altered to improve consistency and has been modernized in so far as is possible without distorting the phonological values of the Middle English. A discussion of Middle English pronunciation, grammar, and prosody is included in the introduction to "The Middle Ages" (pp. 15-21).

The Canterbury Tales  Chaucer's original plan for The Canterbury Tales—if we assume it to be the same as that which the fictional Host proposes at the end of The General Prologue—projected about one hundred twenty stories, two for each pilgrim to tell on the way to Canterbury and two more on the way back. Chaucer actually completed only twenty-two and the beginnings of two others. He did write an ending, for the Host says to the Parson, who tells the last tale, that everyone except him has told "his tale." Indeed, the pilgrims never even get to Canterbury. The work was probably first conceived in 1386, when Chaucer was living in Greenwich, some miles east of London. From his house he might have been able to see the pilgrim road that led toward the shrine of the famous English saint, Thomas a Becket, the archbishop of Canterbury who was murdered in his cathedral in 1170. Medieval pilgrims were notorious tale tellers, and the sight and sound of the bands riding toward Canterbury may well have suggested to Chaucer the idea of using a fictitious pilgrimage as a framing device for a number of stories. Collections of stories linked by such a device were common in the later Middle Ages. Chaucer's contemporary John Gower had used one in his Confessio Amantis (see p. 319). The most famous medieval framing tale besides Chaucer's is Boccaccio's Decameron, in which ten different narrators each tell a tale a day for ten days. Chaucer could have known the Decameron, which contains tales with plots analogous to plots found also in The Canterbury Tales, but these stories were widespread, and there is no proof that Chaucer got them from Boccaccio.

Chaucer's artistic exploitation of the device is, in any case, altogether his own. Whereas in Gower a single speaker relates all the stories, and in Boccaccio the ten speakers—three young gentlemen and seven young ladies—all belong to the same sophisticated social elite, Chaucer's pilgrim narrators represent a wide spectrum of ranks and occupations. This device, however, should not be mistaken for "realism." It is highly unlikely that a group like Chaucer's pilgrims would ever have joined together and communicated on such seemingly equal terms. That is part of the fiction, as is the tacit assumption that a group so large could have ridden along listening to one another tell tales in verse. The variety of tellers is matched by the diversity of their tales: tales are assigned to appropriate narrators and juxtaposed to bring out contrasts in genre, style, tone, and values. Thus the Knight's courtly romance about the rivalry of two noble lovers for a lady is followed by the Miller's fabliau of the seduction of an old carpenter's young wife by a student. In several of The Canterbury Tales there is a fascinating accord between the narrators and their stories, so that the story takes on rich overtones from what we have learned of its teller in The General Prologue and elsewhere, and the character itself grows and is revealed by the story. Chaucer conducts two fictions simultaneously—that of the individual tale and that of the pilgrim to whom he has assigned it. He develops the second fiction not only through The General Prologue but also through the "links," the interchanges among pilgrims connecting the stories. These interchanges sometimes lead to quarrels. Thus The Miller's Tale offends the Reeve, who takes the figure of the Miller's foolish, cuckolded carpenter as directed personally at himself, and he retaliates with a story satirizing an arrogant miller very much like the pilgrim Miller. The antagonism of the two tellers provides comedy in the links and enhances the comedy of their tales. The links also offer interesting literary commentary on the tales by members of the pilgrim audience, especially the Host, whom the pilgrims have declared "governour" and "juge" of the storytelling. Further dramatic interest is created by the fact that several tales respond to topics taken up by previous tellers. The Wife of Bath's thesis that women should have sovereignty over men in marriage gets a reply from the Clerk, which in turn elicits responses from the Merchant and the Franklin. The tales have their own logic and interest quite apart from the framing fiction; no other medieval framing fiction, however, has such varied and lively interaction between the frame and the individual stories.

The composition of none of the tales can be accurately dated; most of them were written during the last fourteen years of Chaucer's life, although a few were probably written earlier and inserted into The Canterbury Tales. The popularity of the poem in late medieval England is attested by the number of surviving manuscripts: more than eighty, none from Chaucer's lifetime. It was also twice printed by William Caxton, who introduced printing to England in 1476, and often reprinted by Caxton's early successors. The manuscripts reflect the unfinished state of the poem—the fact that when he died Chaucer had not made up his mind about a number of details and hence left many inconsistencies. The poem appears in the manuscripts as nine or ten "fragments" or blocks of tales; the order of the poems within each fragment is generally the same, but the order of the fragments themselves varies widely. The fragment containing The General Prologue; the Knight's, Miller's, and Reeve's tales; and the Cook's unfinished tale, always comes first, and the fragment consisting of The Parson's Tale and The Retraction always comes last. But the others, such as that containing the Wife of Bath, the Friar, and the Summoner or that consisting of the Physician and Pardoner or the longest fragment, consisting of six tales concluding with the Nun's Priest's, are by no means stable in relation to one another. The order followed here, that of the Ellesmere manuscript, has been adopted as the most nearly satisfactory.
Chaucer did not need to make a pilgrimage himself to meet the types of people that his fictitious pilgrimage includes, because most of them had long inhabited literature as well as life: the ideal Knight, who had taken part in all the major expeditions and battles of the crusades during the last half-century; his fashionably dressed son, the Squire, a typical young lover; the lady Prioress, the hunting Monk, and the flattering Friar, who practice the little vanities and larger vices for which such ecclesiastics were conventionally attacked; the prosperous Franklin; the fraudulent Doctor; the lusty and domineering Wife of Bath; the austere Parson; and so on down through the lower orders to that spellbinding preacher and mercenary, the Pardoner, peddling his paper indulgences and phony relics. One meets all these types throughout medieval literature, but particularly in a genre called estates satire, which sets out to expose and pilory typical examples of corruption at all levels of society. (For more information on estates satire, see "Medieval Estates and Orders" at Norton Literature Online.) A remarkable number of details in The General Prologue could have been taken straight out of books as well as drawn from life. Although it has been argued that some of the pilgrims are portraits of actual people, the impression that they are drawn from life is more likely to be a function of Chaucer’s art, which is able to endow types with a reality we generally associate only with people we know. The salient features of each pilgrim leap out randomly at the reader, as they might to an observer concerned only with what meets the eye. This imitation of the way our minds actually perceive reality may make us fail to notice the care with which Chaucer has selected his details to give an integrated sketch of the person being described. Most of these details give something more than mere verisimilitude to the description. The pilgrims’ facial features, the clothes they wear, the foods they like to eat, the things they say, the work they do are all clues not only to their social rank but to their moral and spiritual condition and, through the accumulation of detail, to the condition of late-medieval society, of which, collectively, they are representative. What uniquely distinguishes Chaucer’s prologue from more conventional estates satire, such as the Prologue to Piers Plowman, is the suppression in all but a few flagrant instances of overt moral judgment. The narrator, in fact, seems to be expressing chiefly admiration and praise at the superlative skills and accomplishments of this particular group, even such dubious ones as the Friar’s begging techniques or the Manciple’s success in cheating the learned lawyers who employ him. The reader is left free to draw out the ironic implications of details presented with such seeming artlessness, even while falling in with the easygoing mood of "felaweship" that pervades Chaucer’s prologue to the pilgrimage.

And born him wel as of so litel space,\(^3\)
In hope to stonden in his lady\(^1\)' grace.

Embrouded\(^4\) was he as it were a mede,\(^4\)
Al ful of fresshe flowres, white and rede;\(^9\)
Singing he was, or floiting,\(^6\) al the day:
He was as fresh as is the month of May.
Short was his gowne, with sleeves longe and wide.
Wel coude he sitte on hors, and faire ride;
He coude songes make, and wel endite,
Juste\(^5\) and eek\(^7\) daunce, and wel portraye and write.
So hote\(^8\) he loved that by nightertale
He slepte namore than dooth a nightingale.
Curteis he was, lowely,\(^8\) and servisable,
And carf biforn his fader at the table.\(^7\)
A Yeman hadde he\(^8\) and servants namo\(^0\)
At that time, for him Iiste ride so;
And he\(^1\) was clad in cote and hood of greene.
A sheef of pecok arwes,\(^8\) bright and keene,
Under his belt he bar\(^8\) ful thriftily;
Wel coude he dresse\(^2\) his takel\(^4\) yemanly:
His arwes drouped nought with fetheres lowe.
And in his hand he bar a mighty bowe.
A not-heed\(^9\) hadde he with a brown visage,
Of wodecraft wel coude\(^0\) he al the usage.
Upon his arm he bar a gay bracer,\(^3\)
And by his side a sword\(^4\) and a bokeler,\(^4\)
And on that other side a gay daggere,
Harnised\(^6\) wel and sharp as point of spere;
A Cristophre\(^5\) on his brest of silver sheene;
An horn he bar, the baudrik\(^6\) was of greene.
A forster\(^6\) was he soothly,\(^8\) as I gesse.

9. In a workmanlike way.
10. I.e., the Yeoman.
That no drope ne fille upon hir brest.
In curteisye was set ful muchel hir lest.
That in hir coppe ther was no ferthing seene
Of grece, when she dronken hadde hir draughte;
Ful semely after hir mete she raughte.

And sikerly she was of greet disport,
And plesant, and amiable of port,
And pained hire to countrefete cheere
Of court, and to been statlich of manere,
And to being holden dignite of reverence.

But, for to spoken of hir conscience,
She was so charitable and so pitous
She wolde weepe if that she saw a mous Caught in a trappe, if it were deed or bledde.

Of smale houndes hadde she that she fedde
With rosted flessh, or milk and wastelbreed;
But sore wepte she if oon of hem were deed,
Or if men smoot it with a yerde smerte;
And al was conscience and tendre herte.

Ful fetis was hir cloke, as I was war;
Of smal coral aboute hir arm she bar
A paire of bedes, gauded all with greene,
And theron heeng a brooch of gold ful sheene,
On which ther was first writen a crowned A,
And after, Amor vincit omnia.

Another Nonne with hire hadde she
That was hir chapelaine, and preestes three.
A Monk ther was, a fair for the maistrye,
An outridere that loved venerye,
Ful many a daintee hors hadde he in stable,
And when he rood, men mighte his bridel heere
Ginglen in a whistling wind as clere
And eek as loude as dooth the chapel belle Ther as this lord was kepere of the celle.

This ilke° Monk ieet olde thinges pace,°
And heeld° after the newe world the space.°
He yaf° nought of that text a pulled hen7
That saith that hunteres been7 nought holy men,
Ne that a monk, when he is recchelees.8

Is likned til° a fissh that is waterlees—
This is to sayn, a monk out of his cloistre;
But thilke° text heeld he nat worth an oystre.
And I saide his opinion was good:
What° sholde he studye and make himselven wood°
Upon a book in cloistre alway to poure,
Or swinke° with his handes and laboure,
As Austin bit?9 How shal the world be served?
Lat Austin have his swink to him reserved!
Therefore he was a prikasour° aright.
Grehoundes he hadde as swift as fowl in flight.
Of priking° and of hunting for the hare
Was al his lust,
For no cost wolde he spare.
I sawgh his sleeves purfiled° at the hand
With gris,° and that the fineste of a land;
And eek his face, as he hadde been anoint:
He was a lord ful fat and in good point;
His yen steepe,° and rolling in his heed,
That stemed as a furnais of a leed,3
His bootes souple,° his hors in greet estat°
Now certainly he was a fair prelat.4
He was nat pale as a forpined° gost:
A fat swan loved he best of any rost.
His palfrey° was as brown as is a berye.
A Frere ther was, a wantoune° and a merye,
A limitour,° a ful solempne° man.
In alle the ordres foure is noon° that can°
So muche of daliaunce° and fair langage:
He hadde maad ful many a mariage
Of yonge wommen at his owene cost;
Unto his ordre he was a noble post.6
Ful wel biloved and familier was he
With frankelains over al° in his contree,
And with worthy wommen of the town—
For he hadde power of confessioun,
As saide himself, more than a curat.°
For oP his ordre he was licenciat.\(^8\)
Ful swetely herde he confessioun,
And plesant was his absolucioun.
He was an esy man to yive penaunce
Ther as he wiste to have\(^9\) a good pitaunce;\(^6\)
For unto a poore ordre for to yive
Is signe that a man is wel yshrive,\(^1\)
For if he yaf, he dorste make avaunt\(^9\)
He wiste\(^9\) that a man was repentaunt;
For many a man so hard is of his herte
He may nat wepe though him sore smerte:\(^2\)
Therefore, in stede of weeping and prayeres,
Men mote\(^6\) yive silver to the poore freres.\(^3\)

He knew the tavernes wel in every town,
And every hostiler\(^2\) and tappestere,
Bet\(^8\) than a Iazar or a beggestere.\(^5\)
For unto swich a worthy man as he Accorded nat, as by his facultee,
To have with sike\(^8\) lazars aquaintaunce:
It is nat honeste,\(^0\) it may nought avaunce,\(^0\)
For to delen with no swich poraile,\(^7\)
But al with riche, and selleres of vitaile;\(^8\)
And over al ther as\(^8\) profit sholde arise,
Curteis he was, and Iowely of servise.
There was no man nowher so vertuous:
He was the beste beggere in his hous.\(^0\)
And yaf a certain ferme for the graunt:\(^9\)
Noon of his bretheren cam ther in his haunt.\(^1\)
For though a widwe\(^8\) hadde nought a sho,\(^9\)
So pleasant was his In principio\(^2\)
Yit wolde he have a ferthing\(^0\) er he wente;
His purchas was wel better than his rente;\(^3\)

8. I.e., licensed to hear confessions.
9. Where he knew he would have.
1. Shrivin, absolved.
2. Although he is sorely grieved.
3. Before granting absolution, the confessor must be sure the sinner is contrite; moreover, the absolution is contingent on the sinner’s performance of an act of satisfaction. In the case of Chaucer’s Friar, a liberal contribution served both as proof of contrition and as satisfaction.
4. He absolutely took the prize for ballads.
5. ‘Beggestere\(^5\)’: female beggar. ‘Lazar\(^7\)’ leper.
6. It was not suitable because of his position.
7. I.e., poor trash. The oldest order of friars had been founded by St. Francis to administer to the spiritual needs of precisely those classes the Friar avoids.
8. Everywhere.
9. And he paid a certain rent for the privilege of begging.
1. Assigned territory.
2. A friar’s usual salutation: ‘In the beginning [was the Word]’ (John 1.1).
3. I.e., the money he got through such activity was more than his proper income.
4. And he could flirt wantonly, as if he were a puppy.
5. Days appointed for the settlement of lawsuits out of court.
For ther he was nat lik a cloisterer,
With a thredbare cope, as is a poore scoler,
But he was lik a maister6 or a pope.

Of double worstede was his semicope,0
Somewhat rounded as a belle out of the presse,0
To make his English sweete upon his tonge;
And in his harping, when he hadde songe,*
His yen twinkled in his heed aright
As doon the sterres in the frosty night.

This worthy Iimitour was cleped Huberd.
A Marchant was ther with a forked beerd,
In motlee, and hye on hors he sat,
Upon his heed a Flandrissh0 bevere hat,
His resons he spak ful solempnely,
Souning alway th' encrees of his winning.

He wolde the see were kept for any thing
Bitwixen Middelburgh and Orewelie.
Wei coude he in eschaunge sheeldes
This worthy man ful wel his wit bisette:
Ther wiste no wight that he was in dette,
So statly was he of his governaunce,
With his bargainings, and with his chevissaunce.

Forsooth he was a worthy man withalle;
But, sooth to sayn, I noot how men him calle.
A Clerk ther was of Oxenforde also
That unto Iogik hadde longe ygo.
As lene was his hors as is a rake,
And he was nought right fat, I undertake,
Ful thredbare was his overeste courtepy,
For he hadde geten him yit no benefice,
Ne was so worldly for to have office.
For him was levere have at his beddes heed
Twenty bookes, clad in blak or reed,
Of Aristotle and his philosophye,
Than robes riche, or fithele, or gay sautrye.
But al be that he was a philosophre
Yit hadde he but Iitel gold in cofre;
But al that he mighte of his freendes hente,*
On bookes and on Ierning he it spente,
And bisily gan for the soules praye
Of hem that yaf him wherwith to scoleye.

6. A man of recognized learning.
7. Motley, a cloth of mixed color.
8. I.e., he wished the sea to be guarded at all costs.

Merchant's export and import of wool—the basis of England's chief trade at the time.
9. Shields were units of transfer in international credit, which he exchanged as a profit.
1. The management of his affairs.
2. The Clerk is a student at Oxford; to become a student, he would have had to signify his intention of becoming a cleric, but he was not bound to proceed to a position of responsibility in the church.
3. Who had long since matriculated in philosophy.
4. Ecclesiastical living, such as the income a parish priest receives. "Courtepy": outer cloak.
5. He would rather.
6. Psaltery (a kind of harp).
7. The word may also mean alchemist, someone who tries to turn base metals into gold. The Clerk's "philosophy" does not pay either way.
Of studye took he most cure and most heede. Nought oo word spak he more than was neede, And that was said in forme and reverence, And short and quik, and ful of heigh sentence; Souning in moral vertu was his speeche, And gladly wolde he lerne, and gladly teche.

A Sergeant of the Lawe, war and wis, That often hadde been at the Parvis Ther was also, ful riche of excellence. Discreet he was, and of greet reverence— He seemed swich, his wordes weren so wise. For his science and for his heigh renown Of fees and robes hadde he many oon. So greet a purchasour was nowher noon; Al was fee simple to him in effect— His purchasing mighte nat been infect. Nowher so bisy a man as he ther nas; And yit he seemed bisier than he was. In termes hadde he caas and doomes alle That from the time of King William were falle. Thereto he coude endite and make a thing. Ther coude no wight pinchen at his writing; And every statut coude he plein by rote. He rood but hoomly in a medlee cote, Girt with a ceint of silk, with barres smale. Of his array telle I no Ienger tale.

A Frankelain was in his compaignye: Whit was his beerd as is the dayesye; Of his complexion he was sanguin. Wel loved he by the morwe a sop in win. To liven in delit was evere his wone, For he was Epicurus owene sone, That heeld opinion that plein delit Was verray felicitee parfit. An housholdere and that a greet was he: Saint Julian he was in his contree. His breed, his ale, was always after oon.

8. With decorum.

A bettre envined man was nevere noon. Withouten bake mete was nevere his hous,
Of fissh and flessh, and that so plentevous It snewed in his hous of mete and drinke,
Of alle daintees that men coude thinke. After the sondry sesons of the yeer
So chaunged he his mete and his soper. Ful many a fat partrich hadde he in mewe,
And many a bream, and many a luce in stewe. Wo was his cook but if his sauce were Poinant and sharp, and redy all his gere. His table dormant in his halle alway Stood redy covered all the longe day. At sessions ther was he lord and sire.
Ful ofte time he was Knight of the Shire. An anlaas and a gipser al of silk Heeng at his girdel, whit as morne milk. A shirreve hadde he been, and countour.
Was nowhere swich a worthy vavasour. An Haberdasshere and a Carpenter,
A Webbe, a Dyere, and a Tapicer — And they were clothed alle in oo liveree
Of a solempne and greet fraternitee. Ful fresshe and newe hir gere apiked was;
Hir knives were chaped nought with bras, But al with silver; wrought ful clene and weel
Hir girdles and hir pouches everydeel. Wei seemed eech of hem a fair burgeis To sitten in a yeldehalle on a dais.
Everich, for the wisdom that he can, Was shaply for to been an alderman.
For catel hadde they ynough and rente, And eek hir wives wolde it wel assente— And elles certain were they to blame: It is ful fair to been ycleped "Madame," And goon to vigilies all bifore, And elles certain were they to blame:
A Cook they hadde with hem for the nones, To boile the chiknes with the marybones,
And powdre-marchant tart and galingale. Wel coude he knowe a draughte of London ale.
He coude roste, and seethe, and broile, and frye, Maken mortreux, and wel bake a pie.

1. Tables were usually dismounted when not in use, but the Franklin kept his mounted and set ("covered"), hence "dormant."

9. Royally carried.
But greet harm was it, as it thought me,
That on his shine a mormal hadde he,
For blankmanger, that made he with the best.

A Shipman was ther, woning fer by weste—
For ought I woot, he was of Dartemouthe.
He rood upon a rouncy as he couthe,
In a gowne of falding to the knee.
A daggere hanging on a Iaas hadde he Aboute his nekke, under his arm adown.
The hote somer hadde maad his hewe al brown;
And certainly he was a good felawe.
Ful many a draughte of win hadde he drawe
Fro Burdeuxward, whil that the chapman sleep:
Of nice conscience took he no keep;
If that he faught and hadde the hyer hand,
By water he sente hem hoom to every land.
But of his craft, to rekene wel his tides,
His stremes and his daungers beside,
There was noon swich from HuIIe to Cartage.
Hardy he was and wis to undertake;
With many a tempest hadde his beerd been shake;
He knew alle the havenes as they were
Fro Gotlond to the Cape of Finistere,
And every crike in Britaine and in Spaine.
His barge ycleped was the Maudelaine.
With us ther was a Doctour of Physik:
In al this world ne was ther noon him lik
To speken of physik and of surgerye.
For he was grounded in astronomy,
He kepte his pacient a ful greet deel
In houres by his magik naturel.
Wel coude he fortunen the ascendent
Of his images for his pacient.
He knew the cause of every maladye,
Were it of hoot or cold or moiste or drye,
And where engendred and of what humour:
The cause yknowe, and of his harm the roote,
Anoon he yaf the sike man his boote.°
Ful redy hadde he his apothecaries
To senden him drogges and his letuaries,°
For eech of hem made other for to winne:

Hir frendship was nought newe to biginne.
Wel knew he the olde Esculapius,¹
And Deiscorides and eek Rufus,
Olde Ipocras, Hali, and Galien,
Serapion, Razis, and Avicen,
Averrois, Damascien, and Constantin,
Bernard, and Gatesden, and Gilbertin.
Of his diete mesurable⁶ was he,
For it was of no superfluitee,
But of greet norissing⁷ and digestible.
In sanguin⁸ and in pers° he clad was al,
Lined with taffata and with sendal;
And yit he was but esy of dispence;
He kepte that he wan in pestilence.

For° gold in physik is a cordial,³
Therfore he loved gold in special.
A good Wif was ther of biside Bathe,
But she was somdeel deaf,° and that was scathe.⁶
Of cloth-making she hadde swich an haunt,
She passed° hem of Ypres and of Gaunt.⁴
In al the parish wif ne was ther noon
That to the offring⁵ before hire sholde goon,
And if ther dide, certain so wroth was she
That she was out of alle charitee.

Hir coverchiefs ful fine were of ground—
Dorste° swore they weyeden⁹ ten pound
That on a Sonday weren upon hir heed.
Hir hosen° weren of fin scarlet reed,
Ful straite yteyd, and shoes ful moiste⁸ and newe.
Bold was hir face and fair and reed of hewe.
She was a worthy womman al hir live:
Housbondes at chirche dore she hadde five,
Withouten° other compaignye in youthe—
But therof needeth nought to speke as nouthe.⁵

And thries hadde she been at Jerusalem;
She hadde passed many a strange⁸ streem;
At Rome she hade been, and at Boloigne,
In Galice at Saint Jame, and at Coloigne:⁴

1. The Doctor is familiar with the treatises that the Middle Ages attributed to the 'great names' of medical history, whom Chaucer names: the purely legendary Greek demigod Aesculapius; the Greeks Dioscorides and Rufus; the Persians, Hali and Rhazes; the Arabians, Avicenna and Averroes; the early Christians, John (?) of Damascus and Constantine Afer; the Scotman, Bernard Gordon; the Englishmen John of Gatesden and Gilbert, the former an early contemporary of Chaucer.
2. He saved the money he made during the plague time.

A good man was ther of religioun,
And was a poore Person of a town,
But riche he was of holy thought and werk.
He was also a lerned man, a clerk,
That Cristes gospel trewely wolde preche;
His parisshens devoutly wolde he teche.
Benigne he was, and wonder diligently,
And in adversitee ful pacient,
And swich he was proved ofte sithes.
Ful loth were him to cursen for his tithes,
But rather wolde he yiven, out of doute,
Unto his poore parisshens aboute
Of his offring and eek of his substaunce:
He coude in litel thing have suffisaunce.
Wid was his parissh, and houses fer asonder,
But he ne Iafte nought for rain ne thonder,
In siknesse nor in meschief, to visite
The ferreste in his parissh, muche and lite,
Upon his feet, and in his hand a staf.
This noble ensample to his sheep he yaf
That first he wroughte, and afterward he taughte.
Out of the Gospel he tho° wordes caughte, a
And this figure he added eek therto:
That if gold ruste, what shal iredo?
For if a preest be foul, on whom we truste,
No wonder is a Iewed man to ruste.
And shame it is, if a preest take keep,
A shiten shepherde and a clene sheep.
Wel oughte a preest ensample for to yive
By his clennesse how that his sheep sholde live.
He sette nought his benefice to hire
And leet° his sheep encombred in the mire
And ran to London, unto Sainte Poules,
To seeken him a chaunterye for soules,
Or with a bretherhede to been withholde,3
But dwelte at hoom and kepte wel his folde,
So that the wolf ne made it nought miscarye:
He was a shepherde and nought a mercenarye.
And though he holy were and vertuous,
Ne of his speeche daungerous ne digne,9
But in his teching discreet and benigne,
To drawen folk to hevene by fairnesse
By good ensample—this was his bisinesse.
But if they were any persone obstinat,
What so he were, of heigh or lowe estat,
Him wolde he snibben sharply for the nones:
A bettre preest I trowe ther nowher noon is.
He waited after no pompe and reverence,
Ne maked him a spiced conscience,
But Cristes lore and his Apostles twelve
He taughte, but first he folwed it himselve.

With him ther was a Plowman, was his brother,
That hadde ylad of dong ful many a fother.
A trewe swinkere and a good was he,
Living in pees and parfit charitee.
God loved he best with al his hoole herte
At alle times, though him gamed or smerte,
And thanne his neighebor right as himselve.
For Cristes sake, for every poore wight,
Withouten hire, if it laye in his might.
His tithes payed he ful faire and wel,
Bothe of his propre swink and his catel.
Ther was also a Reeve and a Millere,
A Somnour, and a Pardoner also,
A Manciple, and myself—ther were namo.
The Millere was a stout carP for the nones.
Ful big he was of brawn and eek of bones—
That preved, wel, for overal ther he cam
At wrastling he wolde have alway the ram.
He was short-shuldred, brood, a thikke knarre.
Ther was no dore that he nolde heve of harre,
Or breke it at a renning with his heed.
His beerd as any sowe or fox was reed;
Upon the cop right of his nose he hade

Can clepen "Watte"3 as wel as can the Pope—
But who so coude in other thing him grope,6
Thanne hadde he spent all his philosophye;9
Ay Quosto quid juris1 wolde he crye.

He was a gentil harlot6 and a kinde;
A bettre felawe sholde men nought finde:
He wolde suffre,6 for a quart of win,
A good felawe to have his concubin
A twelfmonth, and excusen him at the fulle;6
Ful prively6 a finch eek coude he puile.7
And if he found6 owher6 a good felawe
He wolde techen him to have noon awe
In swich cas of the Ercedekenes curs,8
But if9 a mannes soule were in his purs,
For in his purs he sholde ypunisshed be.
"Purs is the Ercedekenes helle," saide he.

But wel I woot he lied right in deede:
Of cursing6 oughte eech gilhy man him drede,
For curs wol slee6 right as assoiling6 savith—
And also war him of a significavit.1
In daunger2 hadde he at his owene gise6
The yonge girles of the diocise,
And knew hir conseil,6 and was al hir reed.3
A gerland hadde he set upon his heed
As greet as it were for an ale-stake,4
A bokeler hadde he maad him of a cake.

With him ther rood a gentil Pardoner5
Of Rouncival, his freend and his compeer,6
That straight was comen fro the Court of Rome/
Ful loute he soong,6 "Com hider, love, to me."
This Somnour bar to him a stif burdoun:
Was nevere trompe6 of half so greet a soun.
This Pardoner hadde heer as yelow as wex,
But smoothe it heeng6 as dooth a strike
Of flex;6 heenge his lokkes that he hadde,
And therwith he his shuldres overspradde,9
But thinne it lay, by colpons,6 oon by oon;
But hood for jolitee8 wered9 he noon,
For it was trussed up in his walet:°
Him thoughte he rood al of the newe jet.9

A vois he hadde as smal° as hath a goot;
No beerd hadde he, ne nevere sholde have;
As smoothe it was as it were late yshave:
I trowe° he were a gelding or a mare.
But of his craft, fro Rerwik into Ware,²
Ne was ther swich another pardoner;
For in his male⁶ he hadde a pilwe-beer⁶
Which that he saides was Oure Lady veil;
He saides he hadde a gobet⁶ of the sail
That Sainte Peter hadde whan that he wente
Upon the see, til Jesu Crist him hente.⁰
He hadde a croiz° of Iaton,° ful of stones,
And in a glas he hadde pigges bones,
But with thise relikes⁸ whan that he found* A poore person⁶ dwelling upon Iond,⁴
Upon a day he gat° him more moneye

And thus with feined° flaterye and japes⁵ He made the person and the peple his apes.°
But trewely to telle at the laste,
He was in chirche a noble ecclesiaste;
Wel coude he rede a lesson and a storye,⁶
But alderbest° he soong an offertorye,⁷
For wel he wiste° whan that song was songe,
He muste° preche and wel affile his tonge
To winne silver, as he ful wel coude—
Therefore he soong the merierly and loude.
Now have I told you soothly in a clause⁶
Th'estaat, th'array, the nombre, and eek the cause
Why that assembled was this compaignye
In Southwerk at this gentil hostelrye
That highte the Tabard, faste° by the Belle;⁷
But now is time to you for to telle
How that we baren us° that like* night
Whan we were in that hostelrye alight;
And after wol I telle of oure viage,⁸
And al the remenant of oure pilgrimage.
But first I praye you of youre curteisye
That ye n'arette it nought my vilainye
Though that I plainly speke in this materie
To telle you hir wordes and hir cheere,⁹

1. A neutered stallion, i.e., a eunuch.
2. I.e., from one end of England to the other.
3. Relics, i.e., the pig's bones that the Pardoner represented as saints' bones.
Ne though I speke hir wordes proprely;,
For this ye knowen also wel as I:
Who so shal telle a tale after a man
He moot\(^0\) rehearse,\(^0\) as neigh as evere he can,
Everich a word, if it be in his charge,\(^0\)
Al speke he\(^1\) nevere so rudeliche and large,\(^0\)
Or elles he moot telle his tale untrewes,
Or feine\(^0\) thing, or finde\(^0\) wordes newe;
He may nought spare\(^2\) although he were his brother:
He moot as wel saye oo word as another.
Crist spak himself ful brode\(^0\) in Holy Writ,
And wel ye woot no vilainye\(^0\) is it;
Eek Plato saith, who so can him rede,
The wordes mote be cosin to the deede.
Also I praye you to foryive it me
Al\(^3\) have I nat set folk in hir degree
Here in this tale as that they sholde stonde:
My wit is short, ye may wel understonde.
Greet cheere made oure Host\(^4\) us everichoon,
And to the soper sette he us anoon.\(^0\)
He served us with vitaile\(^0\) at the beste.
Strong was the win, and wel to drinke us lestee.\(^7\)
A semely man oure Hoste was withalle
For to been a marshal\(^4\) in an haile;
A large man he was, with yen steepe,\(^0\)
A fairer burgeis\(^5\) was ther noon in Chepe—
Bold of his speeche, and wis, and wel ytaught,
And of manhod him lakkede right naught.
Eek therto he was right a merye man,
And after soper playen he bigan,
And spak of mirthe amonges othere thinges—
Whan that we hadde maad oure rekeninges—
And saide thus, "Now, lordinges, trewely,
Ye been to me right welcome, hertely.
For by my trouthe, if that I shal nat lie,
I sawgh nat this yeer so merye a compaignye
At ones in this herberwe\(^6\) as is now.
Fain\(^7\) wolde I doon you mirthe, wiste I how.
And of a mirthe I am right now bithought,
To doon you ese, and it shal coste nought.
"Ye goon to Canterbury—God you speede;
The blisful martyr quite you youre meede.\(^8\)
And wel I woot as ye goon by the waye
Ye shapen you\(^9\) to talen\(^5\) and to playe,
For trewely, confort ne mirthe is noon
To ride by the waye domb as stoon;
And therefore wol I maken you disport
As I saide erst,\(^9\) and doon you som confort;
And if you liketh alle, by oon assent,
For to stonden at my juggement,
And for to werken as I shall you saye,
Tomorwe whan ye riden by the waye—
Now by my fader soule that is deed,
But ye be merye I wol yive you myn heed!

Hold up youre handes withouten more speeche."
Oure counsel was nat longe for to seeche;
Us thought it was not worth to make it wis;
And graunted him withouten more avis," And bade him saye his voidit as him leste.

"Lordinges," quod he, "now herkneth for the beste;
But taketh it nought, I praye you, in desdain.
This is the point, to spoken short and plain,
That eech of you, to shorte with oure waye
In this viage, shal tellen tales twaye—
To Canterburyward, I mene it so,
And hoomward he shal tellen othere two,
Of aventures that whilom have bifalle;
That is to sayn, that telleth in this cas
That eech of you that bereth him best of alle—
That is to sayn, that telleth in this cas
Shal have a soper at oure aller cost,
Here in this place, sitting by this post,
Whan that we come again fro Canterbury.
And for to make you the more mury"—
I wol myself goodly with you ride—
Right at myn owene cost—and be youre gide.
And who so wol my juggement withsaye Shal paye al that we spende by the waye.
And if ye vouche sauf that it be so,
Telle me anoon, withouten wordes mo," And I wol erly shape me therefore."
This thing was graunted and oure othes swore
With ful glad herte, and prayden him also
That he wolde vouche sauf for to do so,
And that he wolde been oure governour,
And of oure tales juge and reportour, And sette a sooper at a certain pris, And we wol ruled been at his devis, In heigh and lowe; and thus by oon assent
We been accorded to his juggement.
And therupon the win was fet anoon;
We dronken and to reste wente eechoon
Withouten any longer taryinge.
Amorwe whan that day bigan to springe
Up roos oure Host and was oure aller cok,
And gadred us togidres in a flok,
And forth we riden, a litel more than pas, Unto the watering of Saint Thomas;
And ther oure Host bigan his hors arreste,
And saide, "Lorde, herknet if you leste:"
Ye woot youre forward and it you recorde.
If evensong and morwesong accorde,
Lat see now who shal telle the firste tale.
As evere mote I drinken win or ale,
Who so be rebel to my juggement
Shal paye for al that by the way is spent.
Now draweth cut er that we ferrer twinne:
He which that hath the shorteste shal biginne.
"Sire Knight," quod he, "my maister and my lord,
Now draweth cut, for that is myn accord.
Cometh neer," quod he, "my lady Prioresse,
And ye, sire Clerk, lat be youre shamefastnesse—
Ne studieth nought. Lay hand to, every man!"
Anoon to drawen every wight bigan,
And shortly for to tellen as it was
Were it by aventure, or sort, or cas,
The soothe is this, the cut fil to the Knight;
Of which ful blithe and glad was every wight,
And telle he moste his tale, as was resoun,
As ye han herd. What needeth wordes mo?
And whan this goode man sawgh that it was so,
As he that wis was and obedient
He saide, "Sin I shal biginne the game,
What, welcome be the cut, in Goddes name!
Now lat us ride, and herkneth what I saye."
And with that word we riden forth oure waye,
And he bigan with right a merye cheere
His tale anoon, and saide as ye may heere.

[Thte Knight's Tale is a romance of 2,350 lines, which Chaucer had written before beginning The Canterbury Tales—one of several works assumed to be earlier that he inserted into the collection. It is probably the same story, with only minor revisions, that Chaucer referred to in The Legend of Good Women as "al the love of Palamon and Arcite." These are the names of the two heroes of The Knights Tale, kinsmen and best friends who are taken prisoner at the siege and destruction of ancient Thebes by Theseus, the ruler of Athens. Gazing out from their prison cell in a tower, they fall in love at first sight and almost at the same moment with Theseus's sister-in-law, Emily, who is taking an early-morning walk in a garden below their window. After a bitter rivalry, they are at last reconciled through a tournament in which Emily is the prize. Arcite wins the tournament but, as he lies dying after being thrown by his horse, he makes a noble speech encouraging Palamon and Emily to marry. The tale is an ambitious combination of classical setting and mythology, romance plot, and themes of fortune and destiny.]

The Miller's Prologue and Tale

The Miller's Tale belongs to a genre known as the "fabliau": a short story in verse that deals satirically, often grossly and fantastically as well as hilariously, with intrigues and deceptions about sex or money (and often both these elements in the same story). These are the tales Chaucer is anticipating in The General Prologue when he warns his presumably genteel audience that they must expect some rude speaking (see lines 727–44). An even more pointed apology follows at the end of The Miller's Prologue. Fabliau tales exist everywhere in oral literature; as a literary form they flourished in France, especially in the thirteenth century. By having Robin the Miller tell a fabliau to "quit" (to requite or pay back) the Knight's aristocratic romance, Chaucer sets up a dialectic between classes, genres, and styles that he exploits throughout The Canterbury Tales.

The Prologue

Whan that the Knight hadde thus his tale ytold,
In al the route° nas° ther yong ne old
That he ne saide it was a noble storye,
And worthy for to drawen° to memorye,
And namely° the gentils everichoon.
   Oure Hoste lough° and swoor, "So mote I goon,"°
This gooth aright; unbokeled is the male.°
   Lat see now who shal telle another tale.
   For trewely the game is wel bigonne.
Now telleth ye, sire Monk, if that ye conne,°
Somewhat to quite° with the Knightes tale.°
   The Millere, that for dronken° was al pale,
So that unnethe° upon his hors he sat,
   He no!de° avalen° neither hood ne hat,
Ne abiden no man for his curteisye,
But in Pilates vois° he gan to crye,
   And swoor, "By armes and by blood and bones,
I can° a noble tale for the nones,
With which I wol now quite the Knightes tale.°
   Oure Hoste sawgh° that he was dronke° of ale,
Ne abiden no man for his curteisye,
   But first I make a protestacioun°
That I am dronke: I knowe it by my soun.°
And therfore if that I misspeke° or saye,
Wite it° the ale of Southwerk, I you praye;

1. So might I walk—an oath.
2. I.e., drunkenness.
3. The harsh voice usually associated with the character of Pontius Pilate in the mystery plays.
4. I.e., by God's arms, a blasphemous oath.
5. I.e., in the devil's name.
6. Each and every one.
7. Blame it on.
For I wol telle a legende\(^8\) and a lif
Bothe of a carpenter and of his wif,
How that a clerk hath sett the wrightes cappe.\(^8\)
The Reeve answerde and saide, "Stint thy clappe!"\(^9\)
Lat be thy lewed\(^{9}\) dronken harlotrye.
To apaire\(^{9}\) any man or him defame,
And eek to bringen wives in swich fame.\(^9\)
Thou maist enow of othere thinges sayn."
This dronken Millere spak ful soone again,
And saide, "Leve\(^9\) brother Osewold,
Who hath no wif, he is no cokewold.\(^9\)
But I saye nat therfore that thou art oon.
Ther ben ful goode wives many oon,\(^9\)
And evere a thousand goode ayains oon badde.
That knowestou wel thyself but if thou madde.\(^9\)
Why artou angry with my tale now?
I have a wif, pardee,\(^9\) as wel as thou,
Yit nolde\(^9\) I, for the oxen in my plough,
Take upon me more than ynough\(^9\)
As deemen of myself that I were oon:!
I wol blywe wel that I am noon.
An housbonde shal nought been inquisitif
Of Goddes privetee,\(^9\) nor of his wif.
So\(^9\) he may finde Goddes foison\(^9\) there,
Of the remenant\(^9\) needeth nought enquere.\(^9\)
What sholde I more sayn but this Millere
He nolde his wordes for no man forbere,

http://englishworld20111.wordpress.com/
Whilom there was dwelling at Oxenforde
A rich churl that gestes heeld to boorde,
And of his craft he was a carpenter.
With him ther was dwelling a poore scoler,
Hadde lerned art, but al his fantasy
Was turned for to lere astrology,
And coude a certain of conclusiouns,
To deemen by interrogaciouns,
If that men axed him in certain houres
Whan that men sholde have droughte or elles showres,
Or if men axed him what shal bifalle
Of every thing—I may nat rekene hem alle.

This clerk was cleped Nicholas.
Of derne love he coude, and of solas,
And therto he was sly and ful privée,
And lik a maide meeke for to see.
A chambre hadde he in that hostelrye
Allone, withouten any compaignye,
Ful fetisly ydight with herbes swoote,
And he himself as sweete as is the roote
Of licoris or any setewale.
His Almageste and bookes grete and smale,
His astrelabye, longing for his art,
His augrim stones, Iayen faire apart
On shelves couched at his beddes heed;
His presse ycovered with a falding reed;
And al above ther lay a gay sautrye,
On which he made a-nightes melodye
So swety that al the chambre roong,
And Angelius ad Virginem he soong,
And after that he soong the Kinges Note
Ful often blessed was his merye throte.
And thus this sweete clerk his time spente
After his freendes finding and his rente.

This carpenter hadde wedded newe a wif
Which that he loved more than his lif.
Of eighteteene yeer she was of age;
Jalous he was, and heeld hire narwe in cage,
For she was wilde and yong, and he was old,
And deemed himself been lik a cokewold.
He knew nat Caton, for his wit was rude,
That bad men sholde wedde his similitude:
Men sholde wedden after hir estat,
For youthe and elde is often at debat.
But sith that he was fallen in the snare,
He moste endure, as other folk, his care.
Fair was this yonge wif, and therwithal
As any wesele hir body gent and smal.
A ceint she wered, barred al of silk;
Upon hir Iendes, ful of many a gore;
Whit was hir smok, and broiden al before,
And eek bihinde, on hir coler aboute,
OP col-blak silk, withinne and eek withoute;
The tapes of hir white voluper
Were of the same suite of hir coler;
Hir filet brood of silk and set ful hye;
And sikerly she hadde a likerous ye;
Ful smale ypulled were hir browes two,
And tho were bent, and blake as any slo.
She was ful more blisful on to see
Than is the newe perejonette tree,
And softer than the wolle is of a wether,
And by hir girdel heeng a purs of lether,
Tasseled with silk and perled with latoun.
In al this world, to seeken up and down,
Ther nis no man so wis that coude thenche
So gay a popelote or swich a wenche.
Ful brighter was the shining of hir hewe
Than in the Towr the noble yforged newe.
But of hir song, it was as loud and yerne
As any swalwe sitting on a berne.
Therto she coude skippe and make game
As any kide or calf folwing his dame.
Hir mouth was sweete as bragot or the meeth,
Or hoord of apples laid in hay or heeth.
Winsing she was as is a joly colt,
Long as a mast, and upright as a bolt.
A brooch she bar upon hir Iowe coler
As brood as is the boos of a bokeler;
Hir shoes were laced on hir legges yhe.
She was a primrose, a piggeseyne.
For any lord to leggen in his bedde,
Or yit for any good yeman to wedde.
Now sire, and eft sire, so bifel the cas
That on a day this hende Nicholas

FiP with this yonge wif to rage\textsuperscript{4} and playe, Whil that hir housbonde was at Oseneye\textsuperscript{4}
(As clerkes been ful subtil and ful quainte),\textsuperscript{6}
And prively he caughte hire by the queinte,\textsuperscript{7}
And saide, ’Ywis,\textsuperscript{8} but’ if ich\textsuperscript{9} have my wille,
For derne\textsuperscript{10} love of thee, leman, I spille,\textsuperscript{10}
And heeld hire harde by the haunche-bones,\textsuperscript{10}
And saide, ’Lemman,’ love me al atones,\textsuperscript{11}
Or I wol dien, also\textsuperscript{12} God me save.\textsuperscript{13}
And she swoong\textsuperscript{6} as a colt dooth in a trave,\textsuperscript{7}
And with hir heed she wried\textsuperscript{7} faste away;
She saide, ’I wol nat kisse thee, by my fay,\textsuperscript{9}
Why, lat be,’ quod she, ’lat be, Nicholas!\textsuperscript{1}
Or I wol crye ’Out, harrow,\textsuperscript{3} and alias!’
Do way youre handes, for your curteisise!’
This Nicholas gan mercy for to crye,
And spak so faire, and profred him so faste,\textsuperscript{8}
That she hir love him graunted atte Iaste,
And swoor hir ooth by Saint Thomas of Kent\textsuperscript{9}
That she wolde been at his comandement,
Whan that she may hir Ieiser\textsuperscript{1} wel espye.
”Myn housbonde is so ful of jalousye
That but ye waite\textsuperscript{2} wel and been privye
I woot right wel I nam but deed,’\textsuperscript{2} quod she.
”Ye moste been ful derne
as in this cas.”
”Nay, therof care thee nought,” quod Nicholas.
”A clerk hadde litherly biset his while,
But if he coude a carpenter bigile.”
And thus they been accorded and ysworn
To waite\textsuperscript{1} a time, as I have told biforn.
Whan Nicholas hadde doon this everydeel,\textsuperscript{6}
And thakked\textsuperscript{10} hire upon the Iendes\textsuperscript{10} weel,
He kiste hire sweete, and taketh his sautrye,
And playeth faste, and maketh melodye.
Thanne fil\textsuperscript{5} it thus, that to the parish chirche,
Cristes owene werkes for to wirche,
This goode wif wente on an haliday:
Hir forheed shoon as bright as any day,
So was it wasshen whan she Ieet\textsuperscript{3} hir werk.
Now was ther of that chirche a parish clerk,\textsuperscript{4}
The which that was ycleped\textsuperscript{4} Absolon:
Crul\textsuperscript{5} was his heer, and as the gold it shoon,
And strouted\textsuperscript{5} as a fanne\textsuperscript{5} large and brode;
Ful straight and evene lay his joly shode.\textsuperscript{6}
His rode\textsuperscript{7} was reed, his yen greye as goos.”

\textsuperscript{4}. A town near Oxford.
\textsuperscript{5}. Elegant (thing); a euphemism for the female genitals.
\textsuperscript{6}. Right now.
\textsuperscript{7}. Frame for holding a horse to be shod.
\textsuperscript{8}. I.e., made such vigorous advances.
\textsuperscript{9}. Thomas a Becket.
\textsuperscript{1}. I.e., opportunity.
With Poul's window corven on his shoos,
In hosesrede he wente fetisly.
Ye clad he was ful smale and properly,
Al in a kirte of a light waget—
Ful faire and thikke been the pointes set—
And therupon he hadde a gay surplice,
As whit as is the blosme upon the ris.°
A merye child he was, so God me save.
Wel coude he Iaten blood, and clippę, and shave,
And maken a chartre of land, or acquitaunce;
In twenty maner coude he trippe and daunce
After the scolle of Oxenforde tho,
And with his legges casten to and fro,
And playen songs on a smal rubible;
Therto he soong somtime a loud quinible,
And as wel coude he playe on a giterne:
In al the town nas brewhous ne taverne
That he ne visited with his solas,
Ther any gailard tappestere was.
But sooth to sayn, he was somdeel squaimous.
This Absolon, that joly was and gay,
Gooth with a cencer on the haliday,
Cencing the wives of the parissh faste,
And many a lovely look on hem he caste,
And namely on this carpenteres wif:
To looke on hire him thoughte a merye lif.
She was so propre and sweete and likerous,
I dar wel sayn, if she hadde been a mous,
And he a cat, he wolde hire hente anoon.
This parish clerke, this joly Absolon,
Hath in his herte swich a Iove-longinge
That of no wif ne took he noon offringe—
For curteisye he saide he wolde noon.
The moone, whan it was night, ful brighte shoon,
And Absolon his giterne hath ytake—
For paramours he thoughte for to wake—
And forth he gooth, joliP and amorous,
Til he cam to the carpenteres hous,
A litel after cokkes hadde ycrowe,
And dressed him up by a shot-windowe
That was upon the carpenteres wal.
He singeth in his vois gentil and smal,
"Now dere lady, if thy wille be,
I praye you that ye wol rewe on me,"
Ful wel accordant to his giterninge.
This carpenter awook and herde him singe,
And spak unto his wif, and saide anoon,
"What, Alison, heerestou nought Absolon
That chaunteth thus under oure bowres wal?"
And she anserwe hir housbonde therewithal,
"Yis, God woot, John, I heere it everydeel."

This passeth forth. What wol ye bet than weel?
Fro day to day this joly Absolon
So woweth hire that him is wo-bigoon:
He waketh al the night and al the day;
He kembed his lokkes brode and made him gay;
He woweth hire by menes and brocage,
And swoor he wolde been hir owene page
He singeth, brokking as a nightingale;
He sente hire piment, meeth, and spiced ale,
And wafres piping hoot out of the gleede;
And for she was of towne, he profred meede—
For som folk wol be wonnen for richesse,
And som for strokes, and som for gentilesse.
Somtime to shewe his Iightnesse and maistrye,
He playeth Herodes upon a scaffold hye.
But what availeth him as in this cas?
She Ioveth so this hende Nicholas
That Absolon may blowe the bukkes horn;
He ne hadde for his labour but a scorn.
And thus she maketh Absolon hir ape,
And al his ernest turneth til a jape.
Ful sooth is this proverbe, it is no lie;
Men saith right thus: "Alway the nye slye Maketh the ferre Ieve to be loth."

For though that Absolon be wood or wroth,
By cause that he fer was from hir sighte,
This nye Nicholas stood in his lighte.
Now beer the thee wel, thou hende Nicholas,
For Absolon may waile and singe alias.
And so bifel it on a Saterday
This carpenter was goon til Oseney,
And hende Nicholas and Alisoun
Accorded been to this conclusioun,
That Nicholas shal shapen this sely jalous housbonde to bigile,
And if so be this game wente aright,
She sholden sleepen in his arm al night—
For this was his desir and hire also.
And right anoon, withouten wordes mo,
This Nicholas no lenger wolde tarye,
But dooth ful softe unto his chambre carye
Bothe mete and drinke for a day or twaye,
And to hir housbonde bad hire for to saye,
If that he axed after Nicholas,
She sholde saye she niste° wher he was—
Of al that day she sawgh him nought with ye:
She trowed° that he was in maladye,
For for no cry hir maide coude him calle,
He nolde answere for no thing that mighte falle.°
This passeth forth al thilke° Saterday
That Nicholas stille in his chambre lay,
And eet,° and sleep,° or dide what him leste,°
Til Sondray that the sonne gooth to reste.
This sely carpenter hath greet mervaile
Of Nicholas, or what thing mighte him aile,
And saide, "I am adrad,° by Saint Thomas,
It stondeth nat aright with Nicholas.
God shilde° that he deide sodeinly!
This world is now ful tikel,° sikerly:
I sawgh today a corps yborn to chirche
That now a° Monday last I sawgh him wirche.°
Go up,° quod he unto his knave° anoon,
"Clepe° at his dore or knokke with a stoon.
Looke how it is and tel me boldely.°
This knave gooth him up ful sturdily,
And at the chambre dore whil that he stood
He cride and knokked as that he were wood,°
'What? How? What do ye, maister Nicholay?
How may ye sleepen al the longe day?"°
But al for nought: he herde nat a word.
An hole he foond ful lowe upon a boord,
Ther as the cat was wont in for to creepe,
And at that hole he looked in ful deepe,
And atte laste he hadde of him a sighte.
This Nicholas sat evere caping° uprighte
As he hadde kiked° on the newe moone.
Adown he gooth and tolde his maister soone
In what array° he saw this ilke° man.
This carpenter to blessen him° bigan,
And saide, "Help us, Sainte Frideswide!°
A man woot Iitel what him shal bitide.
This man is falle, with his astromye,°
In som woodnesse° or in som agonye.
I thoughte ay° wel how that it sholde be:
Men sholde nought knowe of Goddes privetee.°
Ye, blessed be alway a lewed° man
That nought but only his bileve° can.
So ferde° another clerk with astromye:
He walked in the feeldes for to prye°
Upon the sterres,° what ther sholde bifalle,
Til he was in a marie-pit° yfalle—
He saw nat that. But yit, by Saint Thomas,

If that I may, by Jesus, hevene king!
Get me a stafer that I may underspore,6
Whil that thou, Robin, hevest7 up the dore.
He shal8 out of his studying, as I gesse,"9
And to the chambere dore he gan him dresse.7
His knave was a strong carle10 for the nones,0
And by the huspe he haed9 it up atones:
Into the floor the dore fil10 anoon.
This Nicholas sat ay as stille as stoon,
And evere capped up into the air.
This carpenter wende9 he were in despair,
And hente10 him by the shuldres mightily,
And shook him harde, and cride spistyly,
"What, Nicholay, what, how! What! Looke adown!
Awaak and thenk on Cristes passioun!11
I crouche15 thee from elves and fro wightes,"10
Therwith the nightspel saide he anoonrightes'11
On foure halves11 of the hous aboute,
And on the threshold11 on the dore withoute:
"Jesu Crist and Sainte Benedight,11
Blesse this hous from every wikked wight!
For nightes nerye the White Pater Noster.2
Where wentestou,11 thou Sainte Petres soster?11
And at the laste this hende Nicholas
Gan for to sike12 sore, and saide, "Alias, Shal al the world be lost eftsoones8 now?"
This carpenter answerde, "What saistou?
This Nicholas answerde, "Fecche me drinke,
And after wol I speke in privattee
Of certain thing that toucheth me and thee.
I wol telle it noon other man, certain."
This carpenter gooth down and comth again,
And broughte of mighty11 ale a large quart,
And when that eech of hem hadde dronke his part,
This Nicholas his dore faste shette,9
And down the carpenter by him he sette,
And saide, "John, myn hoste liep and dere,
Thou shalt upon thy trouthe12 swere me here
That to no wight thou shalt this consei13 wraye;0
For it is Cristes conseil that I saye,

10. The night-charm he said right away (to ward off evil spirits).
11. Pater Noster is Latin for "Our Father," the beginning of the Lord's Prayer. The line is obscure, but a conjectural reading would be, "May the White 'Our Father' (or 'Our White Father') (either a prayer or the personification of a protecting power) defend (sacred) us against nights." The "nightspel" is a jumble of Christian references and pagan superstition.

"Now John," quod Nicholas, "I wol nought lie.
I have yfounde in myn astrologye,
As I have looked in the moone bright,
That now a Monday next, at quarter night,
Shal falle a rain, and that so wilde and wood,
That half so greet was nevere Noees° flood.
This world," he saide, "in lasse° than an hour
Shal be dreint,° so hidous is the showr.
Thus shal mankinde drenche° and lese° hir lif."

This carpenter answere, "Alias, my wif!
And shal she drenche? Alias, myn Alisoun!"
For sorwe of this he fil almost° adown,
And saide, "Is there no remedye in this cas?"
"Why yis, for"° Gode," quod hende Nicholas,°
"If thou wolt werken after lore and reed —
Thou maist nought werken after thyn owene heed;°
For thus saith Salomon that was ful trewe,
'Werk al by conseil and thou shalt nought rewe.'°
And if thou werken wolt by good conseil,
I undertake, withouten mast or sail,
Yit shal I save hire and thee and me."

"Hastou nat herd how saved was Nooe
Whan that oure Lord hadde warned him biforn
That al the world with water sholde be lorn?°
"Yis," quod this carpenter, "ful yore° ago."°
"Hastou nat herd," quod Nicholas, "also

This sely carpenter biginneth quake;
His thinketh verrailiche that he may see Noees flood come walwing as the see
To drenchen Alison, his hony dere.
He weepeth, waileth, maketh sory cheere;
He siketh with ful many a sory swough,
And gooth and geteth him a kneeding-trough,
And after a tubbe and a kimelin,
And prively he sente hem to his in,°
And hem vitailed, bothe trough and tubbe,
With breed and cheese and good ale in a jubbe," Suffising right ynoough as for a day.

This parish clerk, this amorous Absolon,
That is for love alway so wo-bigoon,
Upon the Monday was at Oseneye,
With compaignye him to disporte and playe,
And axed upon caas a cloisterer³
Ful prively after John the carpenter;
And he drow him apart out of the chirche,
And saide, "I noot;⁴ I sawgh him here nought wirche⁹

The Man of Law’s Epilogue

The Reeve has taken The Miller’s Tale personally and retaliates with a fabliau about a miller whose wife and daughter are seduced by two clerks. Next the Cook begins yet another fabliau, which breaks off after fifty-five lines, thereby closing Fragment I of The Canterbury Tales. Chaucer may never have settled on a final order for the tales he completed, but all modern editors, following many manuscripts, agree in putting The Man of Law’s Tale next. The Man of Law tells a long moralistic tale about the many trials of a heroine called Constance for the virtue she personifies. This tale is finished, but Fragment II shows that The Canterbury Tales reaches us as a work in progress, which Chaucer kept revising, creating many problems for its scribes and editors. In the link that introduces him, the Man of Law says he will tell a tale in prose, but the story of Constance turns out to be in a seven-line stanza called rhyme royal. That inconsistency has led to speculation that at one time the Man of Law was assigned a long prose allegory, which Chaucer later reassigned to his own pilgrim persona. In thirty-five manuscripts The Man of Law’s Tale is followed by an Epilogue omitted in twenty-two of the manuscripts that contain more or less complete versions of The Canterbury Tales. The often-missing link begins with the Host praising the Man of Law’s Tale and calling upon the Parson to tell another uplifting tale. The Parson, however, rebukes the Host for swearing. The Host angrily accuses the Parson of being a "Lollard," a derogatory term for followers of the reformist polemicist John Wycliffe. This is Chaucer’s only overt reference to an important religious and political controversy that anticipates the sixteenth-century English Reformation.

A third speaker, about whose identity the manuscripts disagree (six read “Summoner”; twenty-eight, “Squire”; one, “Shipman”), interrupts with the promise to tell a merry tale. Several modern editions, including the standard one used by scholars, print The Man of Law’s Epilogue at the end of Fragment II, and begin Fragment III with The Wife of Bath’s Prologue. Because the third speaker in the former sounds like the Wife, an argument has been made that she is the pilgrim who refers to “My joly body” (line 23), who at one time told a fabliau tale in which the narrator speaks of married women in the first person plural (“we,” “us,” “our”). Chaucer, so the argument goes, later gave that story to the Shipman. If in fact the Wife of Bath did once tell what is now The Shipman’s Tale, that would be an indication of the exciting new possibilities he discovered in the literary form he had invented.

The Wife of Bath’s Prologue and Tale

In creating the Wife of Bath, Chaucer drew upon a centuries-old tradition of antifeminist writings that was particularly nurtured by the medieval church. In their conviction that the rational, intellectual, spiritual, and, therefore, higher side of human nature predominated in men, whereas the irrational, material, earthly, and, therefore, lower side of human nature predominated in women, St. Paul and the early Church fathers exalted celibacy and virginity above marriage, although they were also obliged to concede the necessity and sanctity of matrimony. In the fourth century, a monk called Jovinian wrote a tract in which he apparently presented marriage as a positive good rather than as a necessary evil. That tract is known only through St. Jerome’s extreme attack upon it. Jerome’s diatribe and other antifeminist and anti-matrimonial literature provided Chaucer with a rich body of bookish male “auctoritee” (authority) against which the Wife of Bath asserts her female “experience” and defends her rights and justifies her life as a five-time married woman. In her polemical wars with medieval clerks and her matrimonial wars with her five husbands, the last of whom was once a clerk of Oxenford, the Wife of Bath seems ironically to confirm

2. Contemptuous term for a religious reformer considered radical; a heretic.
3. On the speaker here, see discussion in head-note.
4. Gloss, with the sense of distorting the meaning of scripture.
5. Sow tares (impure doctrine) in our pure wheat.
6. No such word exists. The speaker is coining a professional-sounding term in philosophy, law, or medicine.

the accusations of the clerks, but at the same time she succeeds in satirizing the shallowness of the stereotypes of women and marriage in antifeminist writings and in demonstrating how much the largeness and complexity of her own character rise above that stereotype.

The Prologue

Experience, though noon auctoritee
Were in this world, is right ynough for me
To speke of wo that is in mariage:

For lوردinges, sith I twelf yeer was of age—
Housbondes at chirche dore I have had five (If I so ofte mighte han wedded be),
And alle were worthy men in hir degree.

But me was told, certain, nat longe agoon is,

That sith that Crist ne wente nevere but ones
To wedding in the Cane of Galilee,
That by the same ensample taughte he me
That I ne sholde wedded be but ones.

Herke eek, lo, which a sharp word for the nones, also / what

Beside a welle, Jesus, God and man,
Spak in repreve of the Samaritan:
"Thou hast yhad fives housbondes," quod he,
"And that ilke man that now hath thee
Is nat thyn housbonde." Thus saide he certain.

What that he mente therby I can nat sayn,
But that I axe why the fifthe man
Was noon housbonde to the Samaritan?
How manye mighte she han in mariage?
Yit herde I nevere tellen in myn age
Upon this nombre diffinicioun.

Men may divine and glosen up and down,
But wel I woot he saide that myn housbonde
Sholde lete fader and moder and take to me,
But of no nombre mencion made he—
Of bigamye or of octogamye:
Why sholde men thanne speke of it viiainye?

Lo, here the wise king daun Salomon:
I trowe he hadde wives many oon,
As wolde God it leveful were to me
To be refresshed half so ofte as he.
Which yifte of God hadde he for alle his wives!

1. The actual wedding ceremony was celebrated at the church door, not in the chancel.
2. Cana (see John 2.1).
3. To the purpose.
4. Christ was actually referring to a sixth man who was not married to the Samaritan woman (cf. John 4.6 ff.).
5. I.e., increase (see Genesis 1.28).
6. See Matthew 19.5.
7. I.e., of two or even eight marriages. The Wife of Bath is referring to successive, rather than simultaneous, marriages.
8. Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines (1 Kings 11.3).
No man hath swich° that in this world alive is. God woot this noble king, as to my wit,"knowledge

5. I.e., shall come along.
8. "It is better to marry than to burn" (1 Corinthians 7.9). Many of the Wife's citations of St. Paul are from this chapter, often secondhand from St. Jerome's tract Against Jovinian.
1. The first man whom the Bible mentions as having two wives (Genesis 4.19—24); he is cursed, however, not for his marriages but for murder.
2. I.e., at the same time.
3. I.e., prize in a race.
4. Understood for, i.e., applicable to.
5. Where.
I woot wel that th'Apostle was a maide,\(^6\)
But natheles, though that he wroot and saide
He wolde that every wight were swich\(^6\) as he,
Al nis but conseil to virginitee;
And for to been a wif ye yaf me leve
Of indulgence; so nis it no repreve\(^6\)
To wedde me\(^6\) if that my make\(^6\) die,
Withouten excepcion of bigamye\(^7\)—
Al\(^7\) were it good no womman for to touche\(^8\)

Wolde leden al hir lif in chastitee.
I graunte it wel, I have noon envye
Though maidenhede preferre\(^6\) bigamye:\(^6\)
It liketh hem to be clene in body and gost.\(^7\)
Of myn estaat ne wol I make no boost;
For wel ye knowe, a lord in his houshold
Ne hath nat every vessel al of gold:
Some been of tree,\(^n\) and doon hir lord servise.
God clepeth\(^3\) folk to him in sondry wise,
And everich hath of God a propre\(^3\) yifte,
Som this, som that, as him liketh shifte.\(^3\)
Virginitee is greet perfeccioun,
And continence eek with devocioun,
But Crist, that of perfeccion is welle,
Bad nat every wight he sholde go selle
Al that he hadde and vive it to the poore,
And in swich wise folwe him and his fore:\(^4\)
He spak to hem that wolde live parfitly\(^9\)—
And lordinges, by youre leve, that am nat I.
I wol bistowe the flour of al myn age
In th’actes and in fruit of mariage.
Telle me also, to what conclusioun\(^5\)
Were membres maad of generacioun
And of so parfit wis a wrighte ywrought?\(^5\)
Trusteth right wel, they were nat maad for nought
Glose\(^6\) whoso wol, and saye bothe up and down
That they were maked for purgacioun
Of urine, and our bothe things smale
Was eek\(^6\) to knowe a female from a male,
And for noon other cause—saye ye no?
Th’experience woot it is nought so.
So that the clerkes be nat with me wrothe,
I saye this, that they been maad for bothe—

6. For me to marry.
7. I.e., without there being any legal objection on the score of remarriage.
8. "It is good for a man not to touch a woman" (1 Corinthians 7.1).
9. I.e., what this metaphor may apply to.
1. This is all there is to it.
2. Frailty I call it unless.
3. I.e., his own.
5. And wrought by so perfectly wise a maker.
That is to sayn, for office and for ese use and pleasure of engendrure, ther we nat God displese. Why sholde men elles in hir bookes sette that man shal yeelde to his wif hir dette? Now wherewith sholde he make his payement if he ne used his sely instrument? Thanne were they maad upon a creature To purge urine, and eek for engendrure. But I saye nought that every wight is holde, That hath swich harneis as I to you tolde, To goon and usen hem in engendrure:

Thanne sholde men take of chastitee no cure. Crist was a maide and shapen as a man, And many a saint sith that the world bigan, Yit lived they evere in parfit chastitee. I nil envye no virginitee: Lat hem be breed of pured whete seed, And lat us wives hote barly breed— And yit with barly breed, Mark telle can, Oure Lord Jesu refresshed many a man. In swich estaat as God hath cleped us I wol persevere: I nam nat precious. In wifhood wol I use myn instrument As freely as my Makere hath it sent. If I be daungorous, God yive me sorwe: Myn housbonde shal it han both eve and morwe, Whan that him list come forth and paye his dette. An housbonde wol I have, I wol nat lette, Which shal be bothe my dettour and my thral, And have his tribulacion withal. Upon his flessh whil that I am his wif. I have the power during al my lif Upon his propre body, and nat he: Right thus th’Apostle tolde it unto me, And bad oure housbondes for to love us week Al this sentence me liketh everydeel.

[AN INTERLUDE]

Up sterte the Pardoner and that anoon: "Now dame," quod he, "by God and by Saint John, Ye been a noble prechour in this cas. [THE WIFE CONTINUES]

Now sire, thanne wol I telle you forth my tale.
As evere mote I drinke win or ale,
I shal saye sooth: tho° housbondes that I hadde,
As three of hem were goode, and two were badde.
The three men were goode, and riche, and olde;
Unnethe° mighte they the statut holde
In which they were bounden unto me—
Ye woot wel what I mene of this, pardee.
As help me God, I laughe whan I thinke
How pitously anight I made hem swinke;
And by my fay,° I tolde of it no stoor:
They hadde me yiven hir land and hir tresor;
Me needed nat do lenger diligence
To winne hir love or doon hem reverence.
They loved me so wel, by God above,
That I ne tolde no daintee of hir love.
A wis womman wol bisye hire evere in oon°
To gete hire love, ye, ther as she hath noon.
But sith I hadde hem hoolly in myn hand,

I governed hem so wel after my lawe
That eech of hem ful blisful was and fawe
To bringe me gaye thinges fro the faire;
They were ful glade when I spak hem faire,
For God it woot, I chidde hem spitously.
Now herkneth how I bar me properly:
Ye wise wives, that conne understande,
Thus sholde ye speke and bere him wrong on honde—
For half so boldly can ther no man
Swere and lie as a woman can.

Of alle men yblessed mote he be
The wise astrologeti daun Ptolomee,
That saith this proverbe in his Almageste:
'Of alle men his wisdom is the hyeste
That rekket nat who hath the world in honde.'¹⁰
By this proverbe thou shalt understonde,
Have thou ynough, what thar thee rekke or care
How merily that other folkes fare?
For certes, olde dotard, by youre leve,
Ye shal han queinte right ynough at eve:
He is too greet a nigard that wil werne
A man to lighte a candle at his lanterne;
He shal han neuer the lasse lighte, pardee.
Have thou ynough, thee thar nat plaine thee.¹²
"Thou saist also that if we make us gay
With clothing and with precious array,
That it is peril of oure chastitee,
And yit, with sorwe, thou moste enforce thee,¹³
And saye thise wordes in th' Apostles' name:
'In habit maad with chastitee and shame
Ye wommen shal apparaile you,' quod he,
'And nat in tressed heer and gay perree,¹⁴
As perles, ne with gold ne clothes riche.'¹⁵
After thy text, ne after thy rubriche,¹⁶
I wol nat werke as muchel as a gnat.
Thou saidest this, that I was lik a cat:
For whoso wolde senge a cattes skin,
Thanne wolde the cat wel dwellen in his in;¹⁷
And if the cattes skin be slik and gay,
She wol nat dwelle in house half a day,
But forth she wol, er any day be dawed,¹⁸
To shewe her skin and goon a-caterwawed.¹⁹
This is to saye, if I be gay, sire shrewe,
I wol renne out, my boreI for to shewe.
Sir olde fool, what helpe⁵ thee t'espyen?

Though thou praye Argus with his hundred yeven, as he can best,
In faith, he shal nat keepe me but me lest:
Yit coude I make his beard, so mote I thee.°
"Thou saidest eek that ther been thinges three,
The whiche thinges troublen al this erthe,
And that no wight may endure the ferthe.°
Yit prechestou and saist an hateful wif
Yrekened is for oon of thise meschaunces.°
Been ther nat none othere resemblaunces
That ye may likne youre parables to,°
But if° a sely wif be oon of tho?
"Thou liknest eek wommanes love to helle,
To bareine land ther water may nat dwelle;
Thou liknest it also to wilde fir—
The more it brenneth, the more it hath desir
To consumen every thing that brent wol be;
Thou saist right° as wormes shende° a tree,
Right so a wif destroyeth hir housbonde—
This knowen they that been to wives bond.°
Lordinges, right thus, as ye han understonde,
Bar I stifly mine olde housbondes on honde
That thus they saiden in hir dronkenesse—
And al was fals, but that I took witnesse
On Janekin and on my nece also.
O Lord, the paine I dide hem and the wo,
Ful giltelees, by Goddes sweete pine!
For as an hors I coude bite and whine;°
I coude plaine° and° I was in the gilt,
Or elles often time I hadde been spilt.°
Whoso that first to mille comth first grint.°
I plained first: so was oure werre stint.°
They were ful glade to excusen hem ful blive°
Of thing of which they nevere agilte hir live.°
Of wenches wolde I beren hem on honde,°
Whan that for sik° they mighte unnethe° stonde, Yit tikled I his herte for that he Wende° I hadde had of him so greet cheertee.°
I swoor that al my walking out by nighte
Was for to espye wenches that he dighte.°
Under that colour° hadde I many a mirthe.
For al swich wit is yiven us in oure birthe:
Deceite, weeping, spinning God hath yive
To wommen kindely° whil they may live.

7. Argus was a monster whom Juno set to watch over one of Jupiter's mistresses. Mercury put all one hundred of his eyes to sleep and slew him.
8. Unless I please.
1. For the other three misfortunes see Proverbs 30.21-23.
2. Are there no other (appropriate) similitudes to which you might draw analogies?
And thus of oo thing I avaunte me:
At ende I hadde the bet° in eech degree,
By sleighte or force, or by som manere thing,
As by continuel murmure° or grucching;
Namely° abedde hadden they meschaunce:
Ther wolde I chide and do hem no plesaunce;
I wolde no lenger in the bed abide
If that I felte his arm over my side,
Til he hadde maad his raunson° unto me;
Thanne wolde I suffre him do his nicetee.
And therfore every man this tale I telle:
Winne whoso may, for al is for to selle;
With empty hand men may no hawkes lure.
For winning° wolde I al his lust endure,
And make me a feined° appetit—
And yit in bacon° hadde I neve delit.
That made me that evere I wolde hem chide;
For though the Pope hadde seten° hem bische,
I wolde nought spare hem at hir owene boord.
For by my trouthe, I quitte° hem word for word.
As help me verray God omnipotent,
Though I right now sholde make my testament,
I ne owe hem nat a word that it nis quit.
I broughte it so aboute by my wit
That they moste yive it up as for the beste,
Or elles hadde we nevere been in reste;
For though he looked as a wood° leoun,
Yit sholde he faile of his conclusiou;n°
Thanne wolde I saye, "Goodelief, taak keep,
How mekely lOOKeth Wilekin,° ooure sheep!

Ye be to blame. By God, I saye you sooth!°
Swiche manere° wordes hadde we on honde.
Now wol I speke of my ferthe° housbonde.

1. Boast.
2. Give them no pleasure.

My ferthe housbonde was a revelour. This is to sayn, he hadde a paramour. And I was yong and ful of ragerye. Stibourne and strong and joly as a pie. How coude I daunce to an harpe smale. And singe, ywis, as any nightingale, When I hadde dronke a draughte of sweete win. Metellius, the foule cherl, the swin, That with a staf birafte his wif hir lif For she drank win, though I hadde been his wif, Ne sholde nat han daunted me fro drinke; And after win on Venus moste I thinke, For also siker as cold engendreth hail, A likerous mouth moste han a likerous tail: In womman vinolent is no defence—This knowen Iechours by experience.

But Lord Crist, whan that it remembreth me Upon my youthe and on my jolitee, It tikleth me aboute myn herte roote— Unto this day it dooth myn herte boote That I have had my world as in my time. But age, alias, that al wol envenime, Hath me birafte my beautee and my pith— Lat go, farewel, the devel go therwith! The flour is goon, ther is namore to telle: The bren as I best can now moste I selle; But yit to be right merye wol I fonde. Now wol I tellen of my ferthe housbonde. I saye I hadde in herte greet despit That he of any other hadde delit, But he was quit, by God and by Saint Joce: I made him of the same wode a croce— Nat of my body in no foul manere— But, certainly, I made folk swich cheere That in his owene grece I made him frye, For angre and for verray jalousye. By God, in erthe I was his purgatorye, For which I hope his soule be in glorye. For God it woot, he sat ful ofte and soong Whan that his sho ful bitterly him wroong. Ther was no wight save God and he that wiste In many wise how sore I him twiste. He deide whan I cam fro Jerusalem, And lygrave under the roode-beem, Ai is his tombe nought so curious As was the sepulcre of him Darius, Which that Apelles wroughte subtilly: It nis but wast to burye him preciously.

8. When I look back. 9. Has taken away from me. 1. I made him a cross of the same wood. The proverb has much the same sense as the one quoted in line 493. 2. Pretended to be in love with others. 3. And lies buried under the rood beam (the crucifix beam running between nave and chancel). 4. Carefully wrought. 5. According to medieval legend, the artist Apelles decorated the tomb of Darius, king of the Persians.
Lat him fare wel, God yive his soule reste;
He is now in his grave and in his cheste.

Now of my fiftene housbonde wol I telle—
God lete his soule nevere come in helle—
And yit he was to me the moste shrewel
That feele I on my ribbes al by rewe,
And evere shal unto myn ending day.

But in oure bed he was so fresssh and gay,
And therwithal so wel coude he me glose"
Whan that he wolde han my bele chose,
That though he hadde me bete on every boon,
He coude winne again my love anoon.

I trowe I loved him best for that he Was of his love daungerous to me.

We wommen han, if that I shal nat lie,
In this materre a quainte fantasye:
Waite what thing we may nat lightly have,
Therafter wol we crye al day and crave;
Forbede us thing, and that desiren we;
Preesse on us faste, and thanne wol we flee.

With daunger oure we al oure chaffare:
Greet prees at market maketh dere ware,
And too greet chepe is holden at litel pris.

This knoweth every womman that is wis.

My fiftene housbonde—God his soule blesse!—
Which that I took for love and no richesse,
He somtime was a clerk at Oxenforde,
And hadde laft scole and wente at hoom to boorde
With my gossib, dwelling in oure town
God have hir soule!—hir name was Alisoun;
She knew myn herte and eek myn privetee
Bet better than oure parish preest, as mote I thee.
To hire biwrayed I my conseil al,
For hadde myn housbonde pissed on a wal,
Or doon a thing that sholde han cost his lif,
To hire, and to another worthy wif,
And to my nece which I loved weel,
I wolde han told his conseil entirely;
And so I dide ful often, God it woot,
That made his face often reed and hoot
For verray shame, and blamed himself for he Hadde told to me so greet a privetee.

And so bifel that ones in a Lente—
So ofte times I to my gossib wente,
For evere yit I loved to be gay,
And for to walke in March, Averil, and May,
From hous to hous, to beere sondry tales—
That Janekin clerk and my gossib dame Alis
And I myself into the feeldes wente.
[Myn housbonde was at London al that Lente:]
I hadde the better leiser for to playe, And for to see, and eek for to be seye
Of lusty folk—what wiste I wher my grace Was shapen for to be, or in what place? Therfore I made my visitaciouns To vigilies and to processiouns, To preching eek, and to thise pilgrimages, To playes of miracles and to mariages, And wered upon my gaye scarlet gites— Thise wormes ne thise motthes ne thise mites, Upon my peril, hem neveradeel: And woostou why? For they were used week Now wol I tellen forth what happed me. I saye that in the feeldes walked we, Til trewely we hadde swich daliaunce: This clerk and I, that of my purveyaunce I spak to him and saide him how that he, If I were widwe, sholde wedde me. For certainly, I saye for no bobaunce, Yit was I nevere withouten purveyaunce Of mariage n’of othere thinges eek: I holde a mouses herte nought worth a leek That hath but oon hole for to sterte to, And if that faile thanne is al ydo. I bar him on hand he hadde enchaunted me (My dame taughte me that subtiltee); And eek I saide I mette of him al night: He wolde han slain me as I lay upright, And al my bed was ful of verray blood— "But yit I hope that ye shul do me good; For blood bitokeneth gold, as me was taught." And al was fals, I dremed of it right naught, But as I folwed ay my dames lore As wel of that as othere thinges more. But now sire—lat me see, what shal I sayn? Aha, by God, I have my tale again. Whan that my fervere housbonde was on beere, I weep, algate, and made sory cheere, As wives moten, for it is usage, And with my cowerchief covered my visage; But for I was purveyed of a make, I wepte but smale, and that I undertake. To chirche was myn housbonde born amorwe; With neighebores that for him maden sorwe, And Janekin oure clerk was oon of tho. As help me God, whan that I saw him go After the beere, me thoughte he hadde a paire Of legges and of feet so clene and faire, 8. I pretended to him. 9. In the morning. 1. I.e., next.

That al myn herte I yaf unto his hold.
He was, I trowe, twenty winter old,
And I was fourty, if I shal saye sooth—
But yit I hadde alway a coltes tooth:
Gat-toothed was I, and that bicam me weel;
I hadde the prente of Sainte Venus seel.
As help me God, I was a lusty oon,
And fair and riche and yong and wel-bigoon,
And treuely, as mine housbondes tolde me,
I hadde the beste quoniam mighte be.
For certes I am al Venerien
In feeling, and myn herte is Marcien:
Venus me yaf my lust, my likerousnesse,
And Mars yaf me my sturdy hardinesse.
Myn ascendent was Taur and Mars therinne—
Alias, alias, that evere love was sinne!
I folwed ay my inclinacioun
By vertu of my constellacioun,
That made me I coude nought withdrawe
My chambre of Venus from a good felawe.
Yit have I Martes merk upon my face,
And also in another privee place.
For God so wis be my savacioun,
I loved nevere by no discrecioun,
But evere folwede myn appetit,
Al were he short or long or blak or whit;
I took no keep, so that he liked me,
How poore he was, ne eek of what degree.
What sholde I saye but at the monthes ende
This joly clerk Janekin that was so hende
Hath wedded me with greet solempnitee,
And to him yaf I al the land and fee
That evere was me yiven therbifore—
But afterward repented me ful sore:
He nolde suffre no thing of my list.
By God, he smoot me ones on the list
For that I rent out of his book a leef,
That of the strook myn ere weex al deef.
Stibourne I was as is a Ieonesse,
And of my tonge a verray jangleresse,
And walke I wolde, as I hadde doon biforn,
From hous to hous, although he hadde it sworn;
For which he often times wolde preche,
And me of olde Romain geestes teche,
How he Simplicius Gallus lafte his wif,
And hire forsook for terme of al his lif,
Nought but for open-heveded he hire sey.
Looking out at his dore upon a day,
That, for his wif was at a someres\(^6\) game
Withouten his witing,\(^6\) he forsook hire eke;
And thanne wolde he upon his Bible seeke
That ilke proverbe of Ecclesiaste\(^2\)
Where he comandeth and forbedeth faste\(^9\)
Man shal nat suffre his wif go roule\(^9\) aboute;
Thanne wolde he saye right thus withouten doute:
"Whoso that buildeth his hous al of salwes,\(^6\)
And priketh\(^6\) his blinde hors over the falwes,\(^3\)
And suffreth\(^6\) his wif to go seeken halwes,\(^6\)
Is worthy to be hanged on the galwes."\(^6\)
But al for nought—I sette nought an hawe
Of his proverbes n'of his olde sawe;
N' I wolde nought of him corrected be:
I hate him that my vices telleth me,
And so doon mo, God woot, of us than I.
This made him with me wood al outrely:
I nolde nought forbere\(\) him in no cas.
Now wol I saye you sooth, by Saint Thomas,
Why that I rente\(\) out of his book a leef,
For which he smoot me so that I was deef.
He hadde a book that gladly night and day
For his disport\(\) he wolde rede alway.
He cleped it Valerie\(^5\) and Theofraste,
At which book he lough\(\) alway ful faste;
And eek ther was somtime a clerk at Rome,
A cardinal, that highte Saint Jerome,
That made a book\(\) again\(\) Jovinian;
In which book eek ther was Tertulan,
Crysippus, Trotula, and Helouis,\(^7\)
That was abbesse nat fer fro Paris;
And eek the Parables of Salomon,
Ovides Art,\(^8\) and bookes many oon—
And alle thise were bounden in oo volume.
And every night and day was his custume,
When he hadde leiser and vacacioun\(\)
From other worldly occupacioun,
To reden in this book of wikked wifes.
He knew of hem mo legendes and lives
Than been of goode wifes in the Bible.
For trusteth wel, it is an impossibility\(\)
That any clerk wol speke good of wives,
But if it be of holy saintes lives,

2. Ecclesiastical (25.25).
3. Plowed land.
4. I did not rate at the value of a hawthorn berry.
5. "Valerie": \textit{i.e.}, the Letter of Valerius Concerning Not Marrying, by Walter Map; "Theophrastus's Book Concerning Marriage. Medieval manuscripts often contained a number of different works, sometimes, as here, dealing with the same subject.
7. "Tertulan": \textit{i.e.}, Tertullian, author of treatises on sexual modesty. "Crysippus": mentioned by Jerome as an antifeminist. "Trotula": a female doctor whose presence here is unexplained. "Helouis": \textit{i.e.}, Eloise, whose love affair with the great scholar Abelard was a medieval scandal.
8. Ovid's \textit{Art of Love}. "Parables of Salomon": the biblical Book of Proverbs.
N'of noon other womman nevere the mo—
Who painted the leon, tel me who? 9
By God, if wommen hadden writen stories,
As clerkes han within hir oratories, 9
They wolde han written of men more wikkednesse
Than al the merk of Adam may redresse.
The children of Mercurye and Venus 2
Been in hir working ful contrarious: 9
Mercurye loveth wisdom and science,
And Venus loveth riot and dispence; 9
And for hir diverse disposicioun
Each falleth in othere exaltacioun. 3
And thus, God woot, Mercurye is desolat
In Pisces wher Venus is exaltat. 4
And Venus falleth ther Mercurye is raised:
Therfore no womman of no clerk is praised.
The clerk, whan he is old and may nought do
Of Venus werkes worth his olde sho. 5
Thanne sit he down and writ in his dotage
That wommen can nat keepe hir mariage.

But now to purpose why I tolde thee
That I was beten for a book, pardee:
Upon a night Janekin, that was our sire, 5
Redde on his book as he sat by the fire
Of Eva first, that for hir wikkednesse
Was al mankinde brought to wrecchednesse,
For which that Jesu Crist himself was slain
That boughte us with his herte blood again—
Lo, heer expres of wommen may ye finde
That womman was the los of al mankinde. 6
Tho redde he me how Sampson loste his heres:
Sleeping his lemmans kitte it with hir sheres,
Thurgh which treson loste he both his yen.
Tho redde he me, if that I shal nat lien,
Of Ercules and of his Dianire,
That caused him to sette himself afire.
No thing forgat he the sorwe and wo
That Socrates hadde with his wives two—
How Xantippa caste pisse upon his heed:
This sely man sat stille as he were deede;
He wiped his heed, namore dorste he sayn
But 'Er that thonder stinte, 7 comth a rain.'
Of Pasipha that was the queene of Crete—
For shrewednesse him thoughte the tale sweete—

9. In one of Aesop's fables, the lion, shown a picture of a man killing a lion, asked who painted the picture. Had a lion been the artist, of course, the roles would have been reversed.
1. Mark, sex.
2. I.e., clerks and women, astrologically ruled by Mercury and Venus, respectively.
3. Because of their contrary positions (as planets), each one descends (in the belt of the zodiac) as the other rises, hence one loses its power as the other becomes dominant.
4. I.e., Mercury is deprived of power in Pisces (the sign of the Fish), where Venus is most powerful.
5. My husband.
6. The stories of wicked women Chaucer drew mainly from St. Jerome and Walter Map.
7. Deianira unwittingly gave Hercules a poisoned shirt, which hurt him so much that he committed suicide by fire.
8. Pasiphae, who had intercourse with a bull.
Fy, speek namore, it is a grisly thing
Of hir horrible lust and hir liking.⁹
Of Clytemnestra⁹ for hir lecherye
That falsly made hir housbonde for to die,
745 He redde it with ful good devocioun.
    He tolde me eek for what occasioun
Amphiorax¹ at Thebes loste his lif:
Myn housbonde hadde a legende of his wif
Eriphylem, that for an ouche° of gold
750 Hath prively unto the Greekes told
    Wher that hir housbonde hidde him in a place,
For which he hadde at Thebes sory grace.
Of Livia tolde he me and of Lucie:²
They bothe made hir housbondes for to die,
755 That oon for love, that other was for hate;
Livia hir housbonde on an even late
Empoisoned hath for that she was his fo;
Lucia likerous³ loved hir housbonde so
That for⁴ he sholde alway upon hire thinke,
760 She yaf him swich a manere love-drinke
That he was deed er it were by the morwe.³
And thus algates⁵ housbondes han sorwe.
Thanne tolde he me how oon Latumius
Complained unto his felawe Arrius
765 That in his garden growed swich a tree,
On which he saide how that his wives three Hanged themself for herte despitous.⁴
"O leve° brother," quod this Arrius, dear
"Yif me a plante of thilke blessed tree, 770 And in my gardin planted shal it be."
Of latter date of wives hath he red
That some han slain hir housbondes in hir bed
And lete hir lechour dighte⁵ hire al the night,
Whan that the cors° lay in the floor upright;⁶
775 And some han driven nailes in hir brain
Whil that they sleepe, and thus they han hem slain;
Some han hem yiven poison in hir drinke.
He spak more harm than herte may bithinke,⁹
And therewithal he knew of mo proverbes
780 Than in this world ther growen gras or herbes:
"Bet° is," quod he, "thyn habitacioun
Be with a leon or a foul dragoun
Than with a womman using⁶ for to chide."
"Bet is," quod he, "hye in the roof abide 785 Than with an angry wif down in the hous:
They been so wikked⁷ and contrarious,
They haten that hir housbondes loveth ay.⁹

⁹. Clytemnestra, who, with her lover, Aegisthus, slew her husband, Agamemnon.
  1. Amphiorax, betrayed by his wife, Eriphyle, and forced to go to the war against Thebes.
  2. Livia murdered her husband in behalf of her lover, Sejanus. "Lucie": i.e., Lucilla, who was said to have poisoned her husband, the poet Lucretius, with a potion designed to keep him faithful.
  3. He was dead before it was near morning.
  4. For malice of heart.
  5. Have intercourse with.
He saide, "A womman cast hir shame away
When she cast off hir smok," and fethermo,
"A fair womman, but she be chast also,
Is like a gold ring in a sowes nose."
Who wolde weene, or who wolde suppose
The wo that in myn herte was and pine?
And whan I sawgh he wolde neveere fine
To reden on this cursed book al night,
Al sodeinly three leves have I plight
Out of his book right as he redde, and eke
I with my fist so took him on the cheeke
That in oure fir he fil bakward adown.
And up he sterte as dooth a wood Ieoun,
And with his fist he smoot me on the heed
That in the floor I lay as I were deed.
And whan he sawgh how stille that I lay,
He was agast, and wolde have fled his way,
Til atte laste out of my swough I  braide:
"O hastou slain me, false thief?" I saide,
"And for my land thus hastou mordred me?
Er I be deed yit wol I kisse thee."
And neer he cam and kneeled faire adown,
And saide, "Dere suster Aisoun,
As help me God, I shal thee nevere smite.
That I have doon, it is thyself to wite."
Foryif it me, and that I thee biseeke."
And yit eftsoones I hitte him on the cheeke,
And saide, "Thief, thus muchel am I wreke."
Now wol I die: I may no lenger speke."
But at the laste with muchel care and wo
We fille accorded by us selven two.
He yaf me al the bridel in myn hand,
To han the governance of hous and land,
And of his tonge and his hand also;
And made him brenne his book anoonright tho.
And whan that I hadde geten unto me
By maistrye al the sovereinetee,
And that he saide, "Myn owene trewe wif,
Do as thee lust the terme of al thy lif;
Keep thyn honour, and keep eek myn estat,"
After that day we hadde neveere debat.
God help me so, I was to him as kinde
As any wif from Denmark unto Inde,
And also trewe, and so was he to me.
I praye to God that sit in majestee,
So blesse his soule for his mercy dere.
Now wol I saye my tale if ye wol heere.

[ANOTHER INTERRUPTION]

The Frere lough whan he hadde herd all this:
'Now dame,' quod he, 'so have I joye or blis,
This is a long preamble of a tale."
And when the Somnour herde the Frere gale,"
"Lo," quod the Somnour, "Goddes armes two,
A frere wol entremette him! everemo!
Lo, goode men, a flye and eek a frere
Wol falle in every dissh and eek matere.
What spekestou of preambulacioun?
What, amble or trotte or pisse or go sitte down!
Thou lettest our disport in this manere."
"Ye, woltou so, sire Somnour?" quod the Frere.
"Now by my faith, I shal er that I go
Telle of a somnour swich a tale or two
That al the folk shal laughen in this place."
"Now elles, Frere, I wol bishrewwe
Thou lettest our disport in this manere."
"Ye, woltou so, sire Somnour?" quod the Frere.
"Now by my faith, I shal er that I go
Telle of a somnour swich a tale or two
That al the folk shal laughen in this place."
"Now elles, Frere, I wol bishrewwe,
But if I telle tales two or three
Of freres, er I come to Sidingborne,2
That al the folk shal laughen in this place."
"Al redy, sire," quod she, "right as you lest—
If I have licence of this worthy Frere."
"Yis, dame," quod he, "tel forth and I wol heere."

The Tale
As was suggested in the headnote to The Man of Law’s Epilogue, Chaucer may have originally written the fabliau that became The Shipman’s Tale for the Wife of Bath. If so, then he replaced it with a tale that is not simply appropriate to her character but that develops it even beyond the complexity already revealed in her Prologue. The story survives in two other versions in which the hero is Sir Gawain, whose courtesy contrasts sharply with the behavior of the knight in the Wife’s tale. (For excerpts from The Marriage of Sir Gawain and Dame Ragnell, see “King Arthur” at Norton Literature Online.) As Chaucer has the Wife tell it, the tale expresses her views about the relations of the sexes, her wit and humor, and her fantasies. Like Marie de France’s lay Lanval (see p. 142), the Wife’s tale is about a fairy bride who seeks out and tests a mortal lover.

In th’olde dayes of the King Arthour,
Of which that Britouns spoken greet honour,
Al was this land fulfild of fa’rye:3
The elf-queene with hir joly compaignye
Daunced ful ofte in many a greene mede—
This was the olde opinion as I rede;
I speke of many hundred yeres ago.
But now can no man see none elves mo,
For now the grete charitee and prayeres
Of limitours,4 and othere holy freres,
That serchen every land and every streem,
As thikke as motes\(^5\) in the sonne-beem,
Blessing halles, chambres, kichenes, bowres,
Citees, burghes,\(^6\) castels, hye towres,
Thropes, bernes, shipnes,\(^7\) dayeries—
This maketh that ther been no fairies.
For ther as wont to walken was an elf
Ther walketh now the limitour himself,
In undermeles\(^8\) and in morweninges,\(^9\)
And saith his Matins and his holy thinges,
As he gooth in his limitacioun.
Wommen may go sauffly\(^9\) up and down:
In every bussh or under every tree
Ther is noon other incubus\(^7\) but he,
And he ne wol doon hem but\(^8\) dishonour.
And so bifel it that this King Arthur
Hadde in his hous a lusty bachelor,\(^6\)
That on a day cam riding fro river,\(^9\)
And happed\(^6\) that, allone as he was born,
He sawgh a maide walking him biforn;
Of which maide anoon, maugree hir heed,\(^1\)
By verray force he rafte\(^6\) hir maidenheed;
For which oppression\(^8\) was swich clamour,
And swich pursuite\(^9\) unto the King Arthur,
That dampned was this knight for to be deed\(^2\)
By cours of lawe, and sholde han lost his heed—
Paraventure\(^9\) swich was the statut tho—
But that the queene and othere ladies mo
So longe prayeden the king of grace,
Til he his lif him graunted in the place,
And yaf him to the queene, al at hir wille,
To chese\(^3\) wheither she wolde him save or spille,\(^3\)
The queene thanked the king with al hir might,
And after this thus spak she to the knight,
Whan that she saw hir time upon a day:
"Thou standest yit," quod she, "in swich array\(^6\)
That of thy lif yit hastou no suretee.
I graunte thee lif if thou canst tellen me
What thing it is that wommen most desiren:
Be war and keep thy nekke boon\(^6\) from iren.
And if thou canst nat tellen me anoon,\(^9\)
Yit wol I yive thee love for to goon
A twelfmonth and a day to seeche\(^6\) and lere\(^6\)
An answere suffissant\(^9\) in this matere,
And suretee wol I han er that thou pace,\(^6\)
Thy body for to yeelden in this place."
Wo was this knight, and sorwefullly he siketh.\(^0\)
But what, he may nat doon al as him liketh,
And atte laste he chees\(^{\circ}\) him for to wende,
Arid come again right at the yeres ende,
With swich answere as God wolde him purveye,\(^{6}\)
And taketh his leve and wendeth forth his waye.
He seeketh every hous and every place
Wher as he hopeth for to finde grace,
To Ierne what thing wommen love most.
But he ne coude arrivene in no coost\(^{4}\)
Wher as he mighte finde in this matere
Two creatures according in mere.

Some saiden wommen loven best richesse;\(^{5}\)
Some saide honour, some saide jolinesse;\(^{6}\)
Some riche array, some saiden lust abedde,
And ofte time to be widwe and wedde.
Some saide that oure herte is most esed
Whan that we been yflatered and yplesed—
He gooth ful neig the soother, I wol nat lie:
A man shal winne us best with flaterye,
And with attendance\(^{0}\) and with bisinesse\(^{0}\)
Been we ylimed,\(^{0}\) bothe more and lesse.
And some sayen that we loven best
For to be free, and do right as us lest,\(^{0}\)
And that no man repreve\(^{0}\) us of oure vice,
But saye that we be wise and no thing nice.
For trewely, ther is noon of us alle,
If any wight wol clawe\(^{0}\) us on the galle,\(^{0}\)
That we nil kike\(^{0}\) fior\(^{0}\) he saith us sooth:
Assaye\(^{0}\) and he shal finde it that so dooth.
For we neveere so vicious withinne,
We wol be holden\(^{0}\) wise and clene of sinne.
And some sayen that greet delit han we
For to be holden stable and eek secreet,\(^{6}\)
And in oo\(^{0}\) purpos stedefastly to dwelle,
And nat biwraye\(^{0}\) thing that men us telle—
But that tale is nat worth a rake-stele.\(^{0}\)
Pardee,\(^{0}\) we wommen conne no thing hele;\(^{0}\)
Witnesse on Mida.\(^{0}\) Wol ye heere the tale?
Ovide, amonges othere thinges smale,
Saide Mida hadde under his longe heres,
Growing upon his heed, two asses eres,
The whiche vice\(^{0}\) he hidde as he best mighte
Ful subtilly from every mannnes sighte,
That save his wif ther wiste\(^{0}\) of it namo.
He loved hire most and trusted hire also.
He prayed hire that to no creature
She sholde tellen of his disfigure.\(^{0}\)
She swoor him nay, for al this world to winne,
She noide do that vilainye or sinne
To make hir housbonde han so foul a name:

\(^{4}\) I.e., country.

\(^{5}\) Agreeing together.

\(^{6}\) Reliable and also closemouthed.
She nolde nat telle it for hir owene shame.
But nathelees, hir thoughte that she dyde webel.
That she so longe sholde a conseil hide;
Hire thoughte it swal secret so sore about hir herte
That nedely som word hire moste asterte,2
And sith she dorste nat telle it to no man,
Down to a mareis3 faste4 by she ran—
Til she cam there hir herte was afire—
And as a bitore bombleth in the mire,
She laide hir mouth unto the water down:
"Biwray5 me nat, thou water, with thy soun,"6
Quod she. "To thee I telle it and namo:7
Myn housbonde hath longe asses eres two.
Now is myn herte al hool, now is it oute.
I mighte no lenger keep it, out of doute.8
Here may ye see, though we a time abide,
Yit oute it moot:9 we can no conseil hide.
The remenant of the tale if ye wol heere,
Redeth Ovide, and ther ye may it lere.Λ
This knight of which my tale is specially,
Whan that he sawgh he mighte nat come thereby—
This is to saye what wommen loven most—
Within his brest ful sorweful was his gost,Λ
But hoom he gooth, he mighte nat sojourne:Ω
The day was come that hoomward moste he turne.
And in his way it happed him to ride
In al this care under a forest side,
Wher as he sawgh upon a daunce go
Of ladies foure and twenty and yit mo;
Toward the whiche daunce he drow ful yerne,2
In hope that som wisdom sholde he lerne.
But certainly, er he cam fully there,
Vanisshed was this daunce, he niste where.
No creature sawgh he that bar lif,
Save on the greene he sawgh sitting a wiP—
A fouler wight ther may no man devise.6
Again7 the knight this olde wif gan rise,
And saide, "Sire knight, heer forth lith no way.9
Telle me what ye seeken, by youre fay.°
Paraventure it may the better be:
Thise olde folk conne muchel thing," quod she.
"My leve moder,"10 quod this knight, "certain,
I nam but deed but if that I can sayn
What thing it is that wommen most desire.
Coude ye me wisse,10 I wolde wel quyte youre hire."11
"Plight12 me thy trouthe here in myn hand," quod she,
"The nexte thing that I require thee,
Thou shalt it do, if it lie in thy might,

7. Of necessity some word must escape her.
9. I.e., sound.
10. I.e., sound.
11. Learn. The reeds disclosed the secret by whis-
And I wol telle it you er it be night."
'Have heer my trouthe,' quod the knight. 'I graunte.'
"Thanne," quod she, 'I dar me wel avaunte
Thy lif is sauf,' for I wol stande therby.
Upon my lif the queene wol saye as I.
Lat see which is the prудdeste° of hem alle
That wereth on° a coverchief or a calle°
That dar saye nay of that I shal thee teche.
Lat us go forth withouten lenger speeche."
Tho rouned° she a pisteP in his ere,
And bad him to be glad and have no fere.
Whan they be comen to the court, this knight
Saide he hadde holde his day as he hadde hight,°
And redy was his answere, as he saide.
Ful many a noble wif, and many a maide,
And many a widwe—for that they been wise—
The queene hisself sitting as justise,
Assembled been this answere for to heere,
And afterward this knight was bode° appere.
To every wight comanded was silence,
And that the knight sholde telle in audience°
What thing that worldly wommen loven best.
This knight ne stood nat stille as dooth a best,°
But to his question anoon answere
With manly vois that al the court it herde.
"My lige° lady, generally," quod he,
'Wommen desire to have sovereinetee°
As wel over hir housbonde as hir love,
And for to been in maistrye him above.
This is youre moste desir though ye me kille.
Dooth as you list:° I am here at youre wille."
In al the court ne was ther wif ne maide
Ne widwe that contraried° that he saide,
But saiden he was worthy han° his lif.
And with that word up sterlte° that olde wif,
Which that the knight sawgh sitting on the greene;
"Mercy," quod she, "my soverein lady queene,
Er that youre court departe, do me right.
I taughte this answere unto the knight,
For which he plighte me his trouthe there
The firste thing I wolde him requere°
He wolde it do, if it laye in his might.
Bifore the court thanne praye I thee, sire knight,°
Quod she, "that thou me take unto thy wif,
For wel thou woost that I have kept° thy lif.
If I saye fals, say nay, upon thy fay."°
This knight answere, "Alias and wailaway,
I woot right wel that swich was my biheeste.°
For Goddes love, as chees° a newe requeste:
Taak al my good and lat my body go."
"Nay thanne," quod she, "I shrewe° us bothe two.
5. That wears.
For though that I be foul and old and poore,
That under erthe is grave or lith above,
But if thy wif I were and eek thy love."
"My love," quod he. "Nay, my damnacioun!"
Alias, that any of my nacioun Sholde evere so foule disparaged be."
But al for nought, th'ende is this, that he Constrained was: he needes moste hire wedde,
And taketh his olde wif and gooth to bedde.
Now wolden some men saye, paraventure,
That for my necligence I do no cure?
To tellen you the joye and al th'array
That at the feeste was that ilke day.
To which thing shortly answere I shal:
I saye ther nas no joye ne feeste at al;
Ther nas but hevinesse and muche sorwe.
For privelie he wedded hire on morwe,
And al day after hidde him as an owle,
So wo was him, his wif looked so foule.
Greet was the wo the knight hadde in his thought:
When he was with his wif abeded brought,
He walweth and he turneth to and fro.
His olde wif lay smiling everemo,
And saide, "O dere housbonde, benedicite,
Fareth every knight thus with his wif as ye?
Is this the lawe of King Arthures hous?
Is every knight of his thus daungerous?
I am youre owene love and youre wif;
I am she which that saved hath youre lif;
And certes yit ne dide I you nevere unright.
Why fare ye thus with me this firste night?
Ye faren like a man hadde lost his wit.
What is my gilt? For Goddes love, telle it,
And it shal been amended if I may."
"Amended!" quod this knight. "Alias, nay, nay,
It wol nat been amended neveremo.
Thou art so lothly and so old also,
And therto comen of so lowe a kinde,"
That litel wonder is though I walwe and winde.
So wolde God myn herte wolde breste!"
"Is this," quod she, "the cause of youre unreste?"
"Ye, certainly," quod he. "No wonder is."
"Now sire," quod she, "I coude amende al this,
If that me liste, er it were dayes three,
So' wel ye mighte bere you" unto me.
"But for ye spoken of swich gentilesse"
As is descended out of old richesse—
That therfore sholden ye be gentilmen—Swech arrogance is nat worth an hen.
Looke who that is most vertuous alway,
Privee and apert, and most entendeth ay
To do the gentil deeds that he can,
Taak him for the gretteste gentleman,
Crist wol we claime of him oure gentillesse,
Nat of oure eldres for hir 'old richesse.'
For though they veye us al hir heritage,
For which we claime to been of heigh parage,
Yit may they nat biquethe for no thing
To noon of us hir vertuous living,
That made hem gentilmen ycalled be,
And bad us folwen hem in swich degree.
"Wel can the wise poete of Florence,
That highte Dant, spoke in this sentence;
Lo, in swich manere rym is Dantes tale:
'Ful selde up riseth by his braunches smale
Prowesse of man, for God of his prowesse
Wol that of him we claime oure gentillesse.'
For of oure eldres may we no thing claime
But temporel thing that man may hurte and maime.
Eek every wight woot this as wel as I,
If gentilesse were planted natureelly
Unto a certain lineage down the line,
Privee and apert, thanne wolde they nevere fine
To doon of gentilesse the faire office
They mighte do no vilainye or vice.
"Taak fir and beer it in the derkest hous
Bitwixe this and the Mount of Caucasus,
And lat men shette the dores and go thenne,
Yit wol the fir as faire lye and brenne
As twenty thousand men mighte it biholde:
His office natureel ay wol it holde,
Up peril of my lif, til that it die.
Heer may ye see wel how that genterye
Is nat annexed to possessioun,
Sith folk ne doon hir operacioun
Alway, as dooth the fir, lo, in his kinde.
For God it woot, men may wel often finde
A lorde's sone do shame and vilainye;
And he that wol han pris of his gentrye,
For he was boren of a gentil hous,
And hadde his eldres noble and vertuous,
And nil himselven do no gentil deedes,
Ne folwen his gentil auncestre that deed is,
He nis nat gentil, be he due or erl—
For vilaines sinful deedes maken a cherl.
Thy gentilesse is nat renomee
Of thine auncestres for hir heigh bountee,
Which is a straunge thing for thy persone.
For gentilesse cometh fro God allone.
Thanne comth oure verray gentillesse of grace:

Privately and publicly.
I.e., they bade.
Dante (see his Convivio).
I.e., by the branches of a man's family tree.
5. I.e., inheritable property.
6. Have credit for his noble birth.
7. I.e., the gentility you claim.
8. I.e., true gentility.
It was no thing biquethe us with oure place.
Thenketh how noble, as saith Valerius, 9
Was thilke Tullius Hostilius
That out of povert\"roos to heigh noblesse.
Redeth Senek° and redeth eek Boece:" 1175
Ther shul ye seen expres that no drede° is
That he is gentil that dooth gentil deedes.
And therfore, leve housbonde, I thus conclude:
Al° were it that mine auncestres weren rude,
Yit may the hye God—and so hope I—
Graunte me grace to liven vertuously.
Thanne am I gentil whan that I biginne
To liven vertuously and waive sinne.
"And ther as ye of poverte me repreve,
The hye God, on whom that we bileve,
In wilful° poverte chees° to live his lif;
May understonde that Jesus, hevene king,
Glad poverte is an honeste° thing, certain;
This wol Senek and othere clerkes sayn.
Who so that halt him paid off2 his poverte,
I holde him riche al hadde he nat a sherte.
He that coveiteth3 is a poore wight,
For he wolde han that is nat in his might;
But he that nought hath, ne coveiteth4 have,
Is riche, although we holde him but a knave.
Verray° poverte it singeth proprely.5
Juvenal saith of poverte, 'Merily
The poore man, whan he gooth by the waye,
Biforn the theves he may singe and playe.'
Poverte is thing, although it seeme elenge,6
Possession that no wight wol challenge;
Poverte ful often, when a man is lowe,
Maketh7 his God and eek himself to knowe;
Poverte a spectacle8 is, as thinketh me,
Thurgh which he may his verray° freendes see.

And therfore, sire, sin that I nought you greve,
Of my poverte namore ye me repreve.
"Now sire, of elde° ye repreve me:
And certes sire, though noon auctoritee
Were in no book, ye gentils of honour
Sayn that men sholde an old wight doon favour,
And clepe him fader for youre gentilesse—
And auctours° shal I finde, as I gessye.

1. I.e., low born.
2. Considers himself satisfied with.
3. I.e., suffers desires.
4. I.e., remover of cares.
5. Claim as his property.
6. I.e., makes him.
7. I.e., authorities.
"Now ther ye saye that I am foul and old:
Thanne drede you nought to been a cokewold,\(^0\) cuckold
For filthe and elde, also mote I thee,\(^8\) guardians
Been grete wardeins\(^0\) upon chastitee.
But nathelees, sin I knowe your delit,
I shal fulfille youre worldly appetit.
"Chees\(^0\) now," quod she, "oon of thise thinges twaye:
To han me foul and old til that I deye
And be to you a trewe humble wif,
And nevere you displese in al my lif,
Or elles ye wol han me yong and fair,
And take youre aventure\(^9\) of the repair\(^9\) chance
That shal be to youre hous by cause of me—
Or in some other place, wel ma be.
Now chees yourselven whether\(^0\) that you liketh."
This knight aviseth him\(^1\) and sore siketh;\(^9\) sighs
But atte laste he saide in this manere:
"My lady and my love, and wif so dere,
I putte me in youre wise governaunce:
Cheseth\(^0\) youreself which may be most plesaunce\(^0\) choose / pleasure
And most honour to you and me also.
I do no fors the wheither\(^2\) of the two,
For as you liketh it suffiseth\(^0\) me.* satisfies
"Thanne have I gete° of you maistrye," quod she,
"Sin I may chese and governe as me lest?"\(^0\) got
"Ye, certes, wif," quod he. "I holde it best."
"Kisse me," quod she. "We be no Ienger wrothe.
For my trouthe, I wol be to you bothe—
This is to sayn, ye, bothe fair and good.
I praye to God that I mote sterven wood,\(^3\) unless
But\(^8\) I to you be al so good and trewe
As evere was wif sin that the world was newe.
And but I be tomorn\(^8\) as fair to seene tomorrow morning
As any lady, emperisse, or queene.
That is bitwixe the eest and eek the west,
Do with my lif and deeth right as you lest:
Caste up the curtin,\(^4\) looke how that it is."
And whan the knight sawgh verraily al this,
That she so fair was and so yong thereto,
For joye he hente\(^2\) hire in his armes two;
His herte bathed in a bath of blisse;
A thousand time arewe° he gan hire kisse, in a row
And she obeyed him in every thing
That mighte do him plesance or liking,\(^8\) pleasure
And thus they live unto hir lives ende
In parfit\(^6\) joye. And Jesu Crist us sende
Housbondes meeke, yonge, and fressh he abedde—
And grace t'overbide\(^0\) hem that we wedde.
And eek I praye Jesu shorte\(^0\) hir lives

So may I prosper. 2. I do not care whichever.
I.e., visits. 3. Die mad.
Considers. 4. The curtain around the bed.
The Pardoner's Prologue and Tale

As with The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale, The Pardoner's Prologue and Tale develop in profound and surprising ways the portrait sketched in The General Prologue. In his Prologue the Pardoner boasts to his fellow pilgrims about his own depravity and the ingenuity with which he abuses his office and extracts money from poor and ignorant people.

The medieval pardoner's job was to collect money for the charitable enterprises, such as hospitals, supported by the church. In return for donations he was licensed by the pope to award token remission of sins that the donor should have repented and confessed. By canon law pardoners were permitted to work only in a prescribed area; within that area they might visit churches during Sunday service, briefly explain their mission, receive contributions, and in the pope's name issue indulgence, which was not considered to be a sale but a gift from the infinite treasury of Christ's mercy made in return for a gift of money. In practice, pardoners ignored the restrictions on their office, made their way into churches at will, preached emotional sermons, and claimed extraordinary power for their pardons.

The Pardoner's Tale is a bombastic sermon against gluttony, gambling, and swearing, which he preaches to the pilgrims to show off his professional skills. The sermon is framed by a narrative that is supposed to function as an exemplum (that is, an illustration) of the scriptural text, the one on which the Pardoner, as he tells the pilgrims, always preaches: "Radix malorum est cupiditas" (Avarice is the root of evil).

The Introduction

Oure Hoste gan to swere as he were wood
"Harrow," quod he, "by nailes and by blood,
This was a fals cherl and a fals justise.
As shameful deeth as herte may devise
Come to thise juges and hir advocats.
Algate this sely maide is slain, alias!
Alias, too dere boughte she beautee!
Wherefore I saye alday that men may see
The yiftes of Fortune and of Nature

1. I.e., God's nails and blood.
2. The Host has been affected by the Physician's sad tale of the Roman maiden Virginia, whose great beauty caused a judge to attempt to obtain her person by means of a trumped-up lawsuit in which he connived with a "churl" who claimed her as his slave; in order to preserve her chastity, her father killed her.
3. I.e., never mind.
4. Jordans (chamber pots): the Host is somewhat confused in his endeavor to use technical medical terms. "Urinals": vessels for examining urine.
5. A medicine, probably invented on the spot by the Host, named after Galen. "Ipocras": a medicinal drink named after Hippocrates.
And every boiste box / medicine ful of thy letuarye —
God blesse hem, and oure lady Sainte Marye.
So mote I theen, make / grieve thou art a propre man,
And lik a prelat, by Saint Ronian!
Saide I nat wel? I can nat speke in terme.
But wel I woot, that I almost have caught a cardinacle.
By corpus bones, unless / medicine but iP I have triacle,
Or elles a draughte of moiste fresh / malty and corny ale,
Or but I here anoon at once a merye tale,
Myn herte is lost for pitee of this maide.
"Thou bel ami," he saide,
"Tel us som mirthe or japes right anoon."
"It shal be doon," quod he, "by Saint Ronion.
But first," quod he, "here at this ale-stake jast loaf of bread I wol bothe drinke and eten of a cake."
And right anoon thise gentils gan to crye,
"Nay, lat him telle us of no ribaudye."
"Tel us som moral thing that we may lere, learn Som wit, and thanne wol we gladly heere."
"I graunte, ywis," but I moost thinke certainly certainly Upon som honeste decent thing whil that I drinke."

The Prologue
Lordinges—quod he—in chirches whan I preche,
I paine me to han an hautein speeche,
And ringe it out as round as gooth a belle,
For I can al by rote that I telle.

My theme is alway oon, and evere was:
Radix malorum est cupiditas.
First I pronounce whenne that I come,
And thanne my bulles shewe I alle and some:
Oure lige lordes seel on my patente,
That shewe I first, my body to warente,
That no man be so bold, ne preest ne clerk,
Me to destourbe of Cristes holy werk.
And after that thanne telle I forth my tales—
Bulles of popes and of cardinales,
Of patriarches and bishopes I shewe,
And in Latin I speke a wordes fewe,
To saffron with preaching my predicacioun,
And for to stire hem to devocioun.

Ycrammed ful of cloutes and of bones rags

6. So might I prosper.
7. St. Ronan or St. Ninian, with a possible play on "runnion" (sexual organ).
8. Speak in technical idiom.
9. Apparently a cardiac condition, confused in the Host's mind with a cardinal.
1. An illiterate oath, mixing 'God's bones' with corpus dei ('God's body').
2. Fair friend.
4. I.e., something with significance.
5. Take pains.
6. I know all by heart.
7. I.e., the same. "Theme": biblical text on which the sermon is based.
8. Avarice is the root of evil (1 Timothy 6.10).
1. I.e., the pope's or bishop's seal on my papal license.
2. I go on with my yarn.
3. To add spice to.
Relikes been they, as weenen\(^0\) they eechoon.

Thanne have I in laton\(^1\) a shulder-boon
Which that was of an holy Jewes sheep.

"Goode men," I saye, "take of my wordes keep:
If that this boon be washe in any welle,
If cow, or calf, or sheep, or oxe swelle,
That any worm hath ete or worm ystonge,\(^4\)
Take water of that welle and wassh his tonge,
And it is hool\(^1\) anoon. And fethermoor,
Of pokkes\(^5\) and of scabbe and every soor\(^6\)

Shal every sheep be hool that of this welle
Drinketh a draughte. Take keep eek\(^7\) that I telle:
If that the goode man that the beestes oweth\(^8\)
Wol every wike,\(^9\) or the cok him croweth,
Fasting drinken of this welle a draughte—
As thilke\(^8\) holy jew ourse elders taughte—
His beestes and his stoor\(^8\) shal multiplye.

"And sire, also it heleth jalousye:
For though a man be falle in jalous rage,
Lat maken with this water his potage,\(^10\)
And nevere shal he more his wif mistriste,\(^6\)
Though he the soothe of his defaute wiste,\(^6\)
Al hadde she\(^7\) taken preestes two or three.

"Here is a mitein\(^e\) eek that ye may see:
He that his hand wol putte in this mitein
He shal have multiplying of his grain,
Whan he hath sowen, be it whete or otes—
So that he offre pens or elles grotes.

"Goode men and wommen, oo thing warne I you:
If any wight be in this churche now
That hath doon sinne horrible, that he Dar nat for shame of it yshriven\(^9\) be,
Or any womman, be she yong or old,
That hath ymaked hir housbonde cokewold,\(^9\)
Swich\(^9\) folk shal have no power ne no grace
To offren to\(^9\) my relikes in this place;
And whoso findeth him out of swich blame,
He wol come up and offre in Goddes name,
And I assoile\(^6\) him by the auctoritee
Which that by bulle ygraunted was to me.'

By this gaude\(^8\) have I wonne, yeer by yeer,
An hundred mark\(^1\) sith\(^1\) I was pardoner.
I stonde lik a clerk in my pulpet,
And whan the Iewed\(^5\) peple is down yset,
I preche so as ye han herd bifoire,
And telle an hundred false japes\(^4\) more.
Thanne paine I me\(^9\) to strecke forth the nekke,
And eest and west upon the peple I bekke\(^7\)
As dooth a douve,\(^1\) sitting on a berne;\(^8\)

Mine handes and my toung goon so yern that it is joye to see my businesse.
Of avarice and of swich cursednesse is al my preching, for to make hem free to yiven hir pens, and namely unto me, For myn entente is nat but for to winne, and no thing for correccion of sinne: I rekke nevere whan that they been beried though that hir soules goon a-blakeberied. For certes, many a predicacioun comth ofte time of yvel entencioun: Som for plesance of folk and flaterye, To been avanuced by ypocrisye, And som for vaine glorye, and som for hate; For whan I dar noon otherways debate, Thanne wol I stinge him with my toung smerte in preching, so that he shal nat asterte to been defamed falsly, if that he Hath trespassed to my bretheren or to me. For though I telle nought his propre name, Men shal wel knowe that it is the same By signes and by othere circumstaunces. Thus quite I folk that doon us displesaunces; Thus spete I out my venim under hewe of holinesse, to seeme holy and trewe. But shortly myn entente I wol devise: I preche of no thing but for coveitise; Therfore my theme is yit and evere was Radix malorum est cupiditas. Thus can I preche again that same vice Which that I use, and that is avarice. But though myself be gilty in that sinne, Yit can I make other folk to twinne from avarice, and sore to repente — But that is nat my principal entente: I preche no thing but for coveitise, Of this matere it oughte ynough suffise. Thanne telle I hem ensamples many oon Of olde stories longe time agoon, For lewed peple loven tales olde — Swiche thinges can they wel reporte and holde. What, trowe ye that whiles I may preche, And winne gold and silver for I teche, That I wol live in poverte wilfully? Nay, nay, I thoughte it nevere, treweley, For I wol preche and begge in sondry landes; I wol nat do no labour with mine handes, Ne make baskettes and live therby, But cause I wol nat begge idelly, I wol none of the Apostles countrefete: I preche of no thing but for coveitise. Of this matere it oughte ynough suffise. Thanne telle I hem ensamples many oon Of olde stories longe time agoon, For lewed peple loven tales olde — Swiche thinges can they wel reporte and holde. Nay, I wol drinke licour of the vine 165 And have a joly wenche in every town.
But herkneth, lordinges, in conclusioun,
Youre liking° is that I shal telle a tale:
Now have I dronke a draughte of corny ale,
By God, I hope I shal you telle a thing
170 That shal by reson been at youre liking;
For though myself be a ful vicious man,
A moral tale yit I you telle can,
Which I am wont to preche for to winne.
Now holde youre pees, my tale I wol biginne.

The Tale

175 In Flandres whilom° was a compaignye
Of yonge folk that haunteden° folye—
As riot, hasard, stewes,4 and tavernes,
Wher as with harpes, lutes, and giternes°
They daunce and playen at dees° bothe day and night, 180 And ete also and drinke over hir might,
Thurgh which they doon the devel sacrifise
Within that develes temple in cursed wise
By superfluitee° abhominable.
Hir othes been so grete and so damnable
185 That it is grisly for to heere hem swere:
Oure blessed Lordes body they totere—
Hem thoughte that Jewes rente° him nought ynough.
And eech of hem at otheres sinne lough.
And right anoon thanne comen tombesteres,
190 Fetis° and smale,° and yonge frutesteres,7
Singeres with harpes, bawdes,° wafereres°—
Whiche been the verray develes officeres,
To kindle and blowe the fir of lecherye
That is annexed unto glotonye:°

200 Herodes, who so wel the stories soughte, Whan he of win was repleet
at his feeste,
Right at his owene table he yaf his heeste To sleen° the Baptist John, ful giltelees.

Seneca saith a good word doubtless:
He saith he can no difference finde
Bitwix a man that is out of his minde
And a man which that is drunkenly.
But that woodnesse, yfallen in a shrewe,
Persevereth longer than dooth dronkenesse.
O glotonye, ful of cursednesse!
O cause first of oure confusion!
O original of oure dampanioun,
Til Crist hadde bought\textsuperscript{8} us with his blood again!
Lo, how dere, shortly for to sayn,
Abought\textsuperscript{9} was thilke\textsuperscript{9} cursed vilainye;
Corrupt was al this world for glotonye:
Adam oure fader and his wif also Fro Paradis to labour and to wo
Were driven for that vice, it is no drede.\textsuperscript{10}
For whil that Adam fasted, as I rede,
He was in Paradis; and whan that he Eet\textsuperscript{11} of the fruit defended\textsuperscript{11} on a tree,
Anoon he was out cast to wo and paine.
O glotonye, on thee wel oughte us plainly!
O, wiste a man how manye maladies
Folwen of excesse and of glotonies,
He wolde been the more mesurable\textsuperscript{12}
Of his diete, sitting at his table.

Alias, the shorte throte, the tendre mouth,
Maketh that eest and west and north and south,
In erthe, in air, in water, men to swinke,
To gete a gloton daintee mete\textsuperscript{13} and drinke.
Of this materie, O Paul, wel canstou trete:
"Mete unto wombe,"\textsuperscript{14} and wombe eek unto mete, Shal God destroyen bothe," as Paulus saith.\textsuperscript{8}
Alias, a foul thing is it, by my faith,
To saye this word, and fouler is the deede
Whan man so drinketh of the white and rede\textsuperscript{15}
That of his throte he maketh his privee\textsuperscript{16}
Thurgh thilke cursed superfluitee.\textsuperscript{9}
The Apostle\textsuperscript{8} weeping saith ful pitously,
"Ther walken manye of which you told have I—
I saye it now weeping with pitous voiks—
They been enemies of Cristes crois,\textsuperscript{4}
Of whiche the ende is deeth—wombe is hir god!
O wombe, O bely, O stinking cod,\textsuperscript{9}
Fulfilled\textsuperscript{9} of dong\textsuperscript{9} and of corrupcioun!
At either ende of thee foul is the soun.\textsuperscript{10}
How greet labour and cost is thee to finde!\textsuperscript{9}
Thise cookes, how they stampe\textsuperscript{9} and straine and grinde,
And turnen substance into accident\textsuperscript{11}

\textsuperscript{9} I.a Philosopher, depending on the distinction between inner reality (substance) and outward appearance (accident).
To fulfillen al thy likerous talent! Out of the harde bones knokke they
The mary, for they caste nought away
That may go thurgh the golet softe and soote.
Of spicerye of leef and bark and roote
Shal been his sauce ymaked by delit,
To make him yit a newer appetit.
But certes, he that haunteth swiche delices
Is deed whil that he liveth in tho vices.
A lecherous thing is win, and dronkenesse
Is ful of striving arid of wrecchednesse.
O dronke man, disfigured is thy face!
Sour is thy breeth, foul artou to embrace!
And thurgh thy dronke nose seemeth the soun
As though thou saidest ay, 'Sampsoun, Sampsoun.'
And yit, God woot, Sampson drank nevere win.
Thou fallest as it were a stiked swin; thy tonge is lost, and al thyn honeste cure,
For dronkenesse is verray sepulture Of mannes wit and his discrecioun.
In whom that drinke hath dominacioun
He can no conseil keepe, it is no drede.
Now keepe you fro the white and fro the rede—
And namely fro the white win of Lepe
That is to selle in Fisshstreete or in Chepe:
The win of Spaine creepeth subtilly
Of which ther riseth swich fumositee
That whan a man hath dronken draughtes three
And weeneth that he be at hoom in Chepe,
He is in Spaine, right at the town of Lepe,
Nat at The Rochele ne at Burdeux town;
But herkneth, Iordinges, oo word I you praye,
That alle the sovereign actes, dar I saye,
Of victories in the Olde Testament,
Thurgh verray God that is omnipotent,
Were doon in abstinence and in prayere:
Looketh the Bible and ther ye may it Iere.
Looke Attila, the grete conquereour:
Deide in his sleep with shame and dishonour,
Bleeding at his nose in dronkenesse:
A capitain sholde live in sobrenesse.
And overal this, aviseth you right wel
What was comanded unto Lamuel—

2. Through the gullet.
3. Before Samson's birth an angel told his mother that he would be a Nazarite throughout his life; members of this sect took no strong drink.
4. Care for self-respect.
5. A town in Spain.
6. Fisshstreet and Cheapside in the London market district.
7. The Pardoner is joking about the illegal custom of adulterating fine wines of Bordeaux and La Rochelle with strong Spanish wine.
8. Distinguished deeds.
9. Attila was the leader of the Huns who almost captured Rome in the 5th century.
Nat Samuel, but Lamuel, saye I—Redeth the Bible and finde it expressly,
Of win-yiving" to hem that han" justise:
Namore of this, for it may wel suffise.
And now that I have spoken of glotonye,
Now wol l you defende" hasardrye:"
Hasard is verray moder° of lesinges,"
And of deceite and cursed forsweringes," Blaspheme of Crist, manslaughtre, and wast° also
Of catel° and of time; and ferthermo,
It is repreve° and contrarye of honour
For to been holden a commune hasardour,"
And evere the hyer he is of estat
The more is he holden desolat."
If that a prince useth hasardrye,
In alle governance and policye
He is, as by commune opiinioun,
Yholde the lasse° in reputacioun.

Stilbon, that was a wis embassadour,
Was sent to Corinthe in ful greet honour
Fro Lacedomye° to make hir alliaunce,
And whan he cam him happede° parchaunce
That alle the gretteste° that were of that lond
Playing at the hasard he hem foond,"
For which as soone as it mighte be
He stal him hoom again to his contree,
And saide, "Ther wol I nat lese° my name,
N'l wol nat take on me so greet defame,"
You to allye unto none hasardours:
Sendeth othere wise embassadours,
For by my trouthe, me were levere° die
Than I you sholde to hasardours allye.
For ye that been so glorious in honours
Shal nat allye you with hasardours
As by my wil, ne as by my treete."°
This wise philosophre, thus saide he.

Looke eek that to the king Demetrius
The King of Parthes,° as the book° saith us,
Sente him a paire of dees° of gold in scorn,
For he hadde used hasard therbiforin,
For which he heeld his glorye or his renown
At no value or reputacioun,
Lordes may finden other manere play
Honeste° ynough to drive the day away.
Now wol I speke of othes false and grete
A word or two, as olde bookes trete:
Greet swering is a thing abhominable,
And fals swering is yit more reprevable."
The hye God forbad swering at al—
Witnesse on Mathew. But in special
Of swering saith the holy Jeremie,
"Thou shalt swere sooth thine othes and nat lie,
And swere in doom and eek in rightwisnesse.
But idel swering is a cursednesse."

  Biholde and see that in the firste Table
Of hye Goddes heestes honorable
How that the seconde heeste of him is this:
"Take nat my name in idel or amis."
Lo, rather he forbedeth swich swering
Than homicide, or many a cursed thing.
I saye that as by ordre thus it stondeth—
This knoweth that his heestes understondeth
How that the seconde heeste of God is that.
And fertherover, I wol thee telle al plat
That vengeance shal nat parten from his hous
That of his othes is too outrageous.
"By Goddes precious herte!" and "By his nailes!"
And "By the blood of Crist that is in Hailes," Sevene is my chaunce, and thyn is cink and traye!
"By Goddes armes, if thou falsly playe
This daggere shal thurghout thyn herte go!"
This fruit cometh of the bicche bones two—Forswering, ire, falsnesse, homicide.
Now for the love of Crist that for us dyde,
"Lete" youre othes bothe grete and smale.
But sires, now wol I telle forth my tale.
Thisse riotoures three of whiche I telle,
Longe erst er prime ronge of any belle,
Were set hem in a taveme to drinke,
And as they sat they herde a belle clinke
Biforn a cors was caried to his grave.
That oon of hem gan callen to his knave:
Go bet, quod he, "and axe redily
What cors is this that passeth heer forby,
And looke that thou reporte his name weel."
"Sire," quod this boy, "it needeth neveradeel:
It was me told er ye cam heer two houres.
He was, pardee, an old felawe of yours,
And sodeinly he was yslain tonight;
Fordronke as he sat on his bench upright;
Ther cam a prive thief men clepeth Deeth,
That in this contree al the peple sleeth,
And with his sperhe he smoot his herte atwo,
And wente his way withouten wordes mo.
He hath a thousand slain this pestilence.

8. "But I say unto you, Swear not at all" (Matthew 5.34).
1. I.e., the first three of the Ten Commandments.
2. I.e., he that.
3. An abbey in Gloucestershire supposed to possess some of Christ's blood.
4. Five and three.
5. I.e., damned dice.
6. Long before 9 A.M.
7. Better, i.e., quick.
8. It isn't a bit necessary.
And maister, er ye come in his presence,
Me thinketh that it were necessarie
For to be war of swich an adversarye;
Beeth redy for to meete him everemore:
Thus taughte me my dame. I saye namore.'

"By Sainte Marye," said this taverner,
"The child saith sooth, for he hath slain this yeer,
Henne' over a mile, within a greet village.
Bothe man and womman, child and hine and page.
I trowe his habitacion be there.
To been avised greet wisdom it were Er that he dide a man a dishonour."

"Ye, Goddes armes," quod this riotour,
'Is it swich peril with him for to meete:9
I shal him seeke by way and eek by streete,1
I make avow to Goddes dignite bones.
Herkneth, felawes, we three been alle ones:9
Lat eech of us holde up his hand to other
And eech of us become otheres brother,
And we wol sleen this false traitour Deeth.
He shal be slain, he that so manye sleeth,
By Goddes dignitee, er it be night."

Togidres han thise three hir trouthes plight
To live and dien eech of hem with other,
As though he were his owene ybore' brother.
And up they sterete, al dronken in this rage,
Of which the taverner hadde spoke biforn,
And many a grisly ooth thanne han they sworn,
And Cristes blessed body they torente:9
Deeth shal be deed9 if that they may him hente.9
When they han goon nat fully half a mile,
Right as they wolde han treden over a stile,
An old man and a poore with hem mette;
This olde man ful mekely hem grette,9
And said thus, "Now lorde, God you see."3
The pruddeste9 of thise riotoures three Answerde again, "What, carl9 with sory grace,
Why artou al forwrapped save thy face?
Why livestou so longe in so greet age?"
This olde man gan looke in his visage,
And saide thus, "For' I ne can nat finde
A man, though that I walked into Inde,"
Neither in cistee ne in no village.
That wolde chaunge his youthe for myn age:
And therefore moot9 I han myn age stille,
As longe time as it is Goddes wille.
"Ne Deeth, alias, ne wol nat have my lif.
Thus walke I lik a resteleses caitif,9
And on the ground which is my modres' gate
I knokke with my staf bothe erly and late,
And saye, 'Leve' moder, leet me in:
Lo, how I vanishe, flessh and blood and skin.
Alias, when shal my bones been at reste?
Moder, with you wolde I chaunge my cheste
That in my chambre longe time hath be,
Ye, for an haire-clout to wrappe me.'
But yit to me she wol not do that grace,
For which ful pale and welked is my face.
But sires, to you it is no curteisye
To speken to an old man vilainye,
'Agains an old man, hoor upon his heed,
Ye shall arise.' Wherfore I yive you reed.'
Ne dooth unto an old man noon harm now,
Namore than that ye wolde men dide to you
In age, if that ye so longe abide.
And God be with you wher ye go or ride:
I moot go thider as I have to go."
"Nay, olde cherl, by God thou shalt nat so," Saide this other hasardour anoon.
"Thou partest nat so lightly,\(6\) by Saint John!
Thou speke\(6\) right now of thilke traitour Deeth,
That in this contree alle oure freendes sleeth:
Have here my trouthe, as thou art his espye,\(6\)
Tel wher he is, or thou shalt it abyte,"
By God and by the holy sacrament!
For soothly thou art oon of his assent\(9\)
To sleen us yonge folk, thou false thief."
"Now sires, quod he, "if that ye be so lieP
To finde Deeth, turne up this crooked way,
For in that grove I lafte him, by my fay,"
Under a tree, and ther he wol abide:
Nat for youre boost\(8\) he wol him no thing hide.
See ye that ook? 'Right ther ye shal him finde.
God save you, that boughte again\(8\) mankinde,
And you amende.' Thus saide this olde man.
And everich of thise riotoures ran
Til he cam to that tree, and ther they founde
Of florins\(5\) fine of gold ycoined rounde
Wel neigh an eighte busshels as hem thoughte—
Ne lenger thanne after Deeth they soughte,
For that the florins been so faire and brighte,
That down they sette hem by this precious hoord.
The worste of hem he spak the firste word:
"Bretheren," quod he, "take keep what that I saye:
My wit is greet though that I bourde\(6\) and playe.
4. Chest for one's belongings, used here as the symbol for life—or perhaps a coffin.
5. Haircloth, for a winding sheet.
6. In the presence of.
8. I.e., if you live so long.
9. I.e., one of his party.
1. Redeemed.
This tresor hath Fortune unto us yiven
In mirthe and jolitee our lif to liven,
And lightly as it cometh so wol we spende.
Eyi, Goddes precious dignitee, who wende?
Today that we shooldhe han so fair a grace?
But mighte this gold be caried fro this place
Hoom to myn hous—or elles unto youres—
For wel ye woot that al this gold is oures—
Thanne were we in heigh felicitee.
But trewely, by daye it mighte nat be:
Men wolde sayn that we were theves stronge,
And for oure owene tresor doon us honge.
This tresor moste ycaried be by nighte,
As wisely and as slyly as it mighte.
Therefore I rede that cut amongst us alle
Be drawe, and lat see wher the cut wol falle;
And he that hath the cut with herte blithe
Shal renne to the town, and that ful swithe;
And two of us shal keepen subtilly
This tresor wel, and if he wol nat tarye,
Whan it is night we wol this tresor carye
By oon assent wher as us thinketh best.
That oon of hem the cut broughte in his fest
And bad hem drawe and looke wher it wol falle;
And forth toward the town he wente anoon.
And also soone as that he was agoon.
That oon of hem spak thus unto that other:
"Thou knowest wel thou art my sworen brother;
Thy profit wol I telle thee anoon:
Thou woost wel that oure felawe is agoon,
And here is gold, and that ful greet plentee,
That shall departed been amongs us three.
But nathelees, if I can shape it so
That it departed were amongs us two,
Hadde I nat doon a freendes turn to thee?"
That other answerde, "I noot how that may be:
He woot that the gold is with us twaye.
What shal we doon? What shal we to him saye?"
"Shal it be conseil?" saide the firste shrewe.
"And I shal telle in a wordes fewe
What we shal doon, and bringe it wel aboute."
"I graunte," quod that other, "out of doute,
That by my trouthe I wol thee nat biwraye."
"Now," quod the firste, "thou woost wel we be twaye,
And two of us shal strenger be than oon:
Looke whan that he is set that right anoon
Aris as though thou woldest with him playe,
And I shal rive him thurgh the sides twaye,

2. Who would have supposed.
3. Have us hanged.
4. Don't know.
5. A secret.
Whil that thou strugelest with him as in game,
And with thy daggere looke thou do the same;
And thanne shal al this gold departed be,
My dere freend, bitwixe thee and me.

Thanne we may bothe oure lustes al fulfille,
And playe at dees right at oure owene wille.

This yongeste, which that wente to the town,
Ful ofte in herte he rolleth up and down
The beautee of thise florins newe and brighte.
"O Lord," quod he, "if so were that I mighte
Have al this tresor to myself allone,
Ther is no man that liveth under the trone
That he hadde leve him to sorwe bringe:
For this was outrely his fulle entente,
To sleen hem bothe, and nevere to repente.

And forth he gooth—no lenger wolde he tarye—
Into the town unto a pothecarye,
And prayed him that he him wolde selle
Som poison that he mighte his rattes quelle,
And eek ther was a polcat in his hawe
That, as he saide, his capons hadde ysiawe,
And fain he wolde wreke him if he mighte
On vermin that destroyed him by nighte.

This cursed man hath in his hand yhent
This poison in a box and sith he ran Into the nexte streete unto a man
And borwed of him large hotels three,
And in the two his poison poured he—
The thridde he kepte clene for his drinke,
For al the night he shoop him for to swinke
In carying of the gold out of that place.
And whan this riotour with sory grace
Hadde filled with win his grete hotels three,

| 8. He would gladly avenge himself. | 2. He was preparing. |
What needeth it to sermone of it more?
For right as they had cast his deeth bifore,
Right so they han him slain, and that anoon.
And whan that this was doon, thus spak that oon:
"Now lat us sitte and drinke and make us merye,
And afterward we wol his body berye."
And with that word it happed him par cas to take the botel ther the poison was,
And drank, and yaf his felawe drinke also,
For which anoon they storven bothe two.
But certes I suppose that Avicen
Wroot nevere in no canon ne in no fen
Mo wonder signes of empoisoning
Than hadde thiese wrecches two er hir ending:
Thus ended been thiste homicides two,
And eek the false empoisonere also.
O cursed sinne of alle cursednesse!
O traitours homicide, O wikkednesse!
O glotonye, luxure, and hasardrye!
Thou blasphemour of Crist with vilainye
And othes grete of usage and of pride!
That to thy Creatour which that thee wroughte,
And with his precious herte blood thee boughte,
Thou art so fals and so unkinde,
Now goode men, God forgive you youre trespas,
And ware you fro the sinne of avarice:
Myn holy pardon may you alle warice—
So that ye offrete nobles or sterlinges,
Or elles silver brooches, spoones, ringes.
Boweth your heed under this holy bulie!
Cometh up, ye wives, offrete of youre wolle!
Youre name I entre here in my rolle: anoon
Into the blisse of hevene shul ye goon.
1 you assoile by myn heigh power—
Ye that wol offre—as clene and eek as cleer
As ye were born.—And lo, sires, thus I preche.
And Jesu Crist that is oure soules Ieeche
So graunte you his pardon to receive,
For that is best—I wol you nat deceive.

The Epilogue

"But sires, oo word forgat I in my tale:
I have relikes and pardon in my male
As faire as any man in Engelond,
Whiche were me yiven by the Popes hond.
If any of you wol of devocioun
Offren and han myn absoluicion,
Come forth anoon, and kneeleth here adown,
And mekely receiveth my pardoun,
Or elles taketh pardon as ye wende,
Al newe and fressh at every miles ende—
So that ye offre alway newe and newe.
Nobles or pens whiche that be goode and trewe.
It is an honour to everich that is heer
That ye have a suffisant pardoner
T'assoile you in contees as ye ride,
For aventures whiche that may bitide:
Paraventure ther may falle oon or two
Down of his hors and breke his nekke atwo;
Looke which a suretee is it to you alle
That I am in youre felaweshipe yfalle
That may assoile you, bothe more and lasse,
When that the soule shal fro the body passe.
I rede that oure Hoste shal biginne,
For he is most envoluped in sinne.
Com forth, sire Host, and offre first anoon,
And thou shalt kisse the relics everichoon.
Ye, for a grote: unbokele anoon thy purs.
‘Nay, nay,’ quod he, ‘thanne have I Cristes curs!
Lat be,’ quod he, ‘it shal nat be, so theech!
Thou woldest make me kisse thyn olde breech
And swere it were a relic of a saint,
Though it were with thy fundament depeint.
But, by the crois which that Sainte Elaine foun,
I wolde I hadde thy coilons in myn hond,
In stede of relics or of saintuarye.
Lat cutte hem of: I wol thee helpe hem carye.
They shal be shrined in an hogges tord.’
This Pardoner answerde nat a word:
So wroth he was no word ne wolde he saye.
‘Now,’ quod oure Host, ‘I wol no lenger playe
With thee, ne with noon other angry man.’
But right anoon the worthy Knight bigan,
Whan that he sawgh that al the peple lough,
‘Namore of this, for it is right ynough.
Sire Pardoner, be glad and merye of cheere,
And ye, sire Host that been to me so dere,
I praye you that ye kisse the Pardoner,
And Pardoner, I praye thee, draw thee neer,
And as we diden lat us laughe and playe.’
Anoon they kiste and riden forth hir waye.

The Nun's Priest's Tale

In the framing story, The Nun's Priest's Tale is linked to a dramatic exchange that follows The Monk's Tale. The latter consists of brief tragedies, the common theme of which is the fall of famous men and one woman, most of whom are rulers, through the reversals of Fortune. Like The Knight's Tale, this was probably an earlier work of Chaucer's, one that he never finished. As the Monk's tragedies promise to go on and on monotonously, the Knight interrupts and politely tells the Monk that his tragedies are too painful. The Host chimes in to say that the tragedies are "not worth a butterfly" and asks the Monk to try another subject, but the Monk is offended and refuses. The Host then turns to the Nun's Priest, that is, the priest who is accompanying the Prioress. The three priests said in The General Prologue to have been traveling with her have apparently been reduced to one.

The Nun's Priest's Tale is an example of the literary genre known as the "animal fable," familiar from the fables of Aesop in which animals, behaving like human beings, point a moral. In the Middle Ages fables often functioned as elementary texts to teach boys Latin. Marie de France's fables in French are the earliest known vernacular translations. This particular fable derives from an episode in the French Roman de Renard, a "beast epic," which satirically represents a feudal animal society ruled over by Noble the Lion. Reynard the Fox is a wily trickster hero who is constantly preying upon and outwitting the other animals, although sometimes Reynard himself is outwitted by one of his victims.

In The Nun's Priest's Tale, morals proliferate: both the priest-narrator and his hero, Chauntecleer the rooster, spout examples, learned allusions, proverbs, and sententious generalizations, often in highly inflated rhetoric. The simple beast fable is thus inflated into a delightful satire of learning and moralizing and of the pretentious rhetoric by which medieval writers sometimes sought to elevate their works. Among them, we may include Chaucer himself, who in this tale seems to be making affectionate fun of some of his own works, like the tragedies which became The Monk's Tale.

A poore widwe somdeel stape in age
Was whilom dwelling in a narwe cotage.
Beside a grove, stonding in a dale:
This widwe of which I telle you my tale.

5 Sin thilke day that she was last a wif,
In pacience led a ful simple lif.
For litel was hir catel and hir rente,
By housbondrye of swich as God hire sente.
She found hirself and eek hir doughtren two.

Three large sowes hadde she and namo,
Three kin, and eek a sheep that highe Malle.
Ful sooty was hir bowr and eek hir halle.
In which she eet ful many a sclendre meel;
Of poinant sauce hire needed neveradeel:

No daintee morsel passed thurgh hir throte—
Hir diete was accordant to hir cote.
Repleccioun ne made hire nevere sik:
Attempre diete was al hir physik,
And exercise and hertes suffisaunce.

The goute lette hire nothing for to daunce,
N’apoplexye shente nat hir heed.
No win ne drank she, neither whit ne reed:
Hir boord was served most with whit and blak.
Milk and brown breed, in which she foond no lak:

A yeerd she hadde, enclosed al withoute, with stikkes, and a drye dich aboute, in which she hadde a cok heet Chauntecleer: in al the land of crowing nas his peer.
His vois was merier than the merye orgon on massedayes that in the chirche goon;
Wel sikere was his crowing in his logge dwelling
Than is a clok or an abbeye orlogge: by nature he knew eech ascensioun of th’equinoxial in thilke town: for whan degrees fifteene were ascended,
His comb was redder than the fin coral, and batailled as it were a castel wal;
His bile was blak, and as the jet it shoon; like asure were his legges and his toon; his nailes whitter than the lilye flowr, and lik the burned gold was his colour.
This gentil cok hadde in his governaunce sevene hennes for to doon al his plesaunce, whiche were his sustres and his paramours, and wonder like to him as of colours; of whiche the faireste hewed on hir throte was cleped faire damoisele Pertelote: curteis she was, discreet, and debonaire, and compaignable, and bar herself so faire, of whiche the faireste hewed on hir throte was cleped faire damoisele Pertelote: curteis she was, discreet, and debonaire, and compaignable, and bar herself so faire, sin thilke day that she was seven night old, that trewely she hath the herte in hold of Chauntecleer, loken in every lith. he loved hire so that wel was him therwith.
But swich a joye was it to heere hem singe, when that the brighte sonne gan to springe, in sweete accord my lief is faren in londe — for thilke time, as I have understonde, beestes and briddes couden speke and singe. and so bifel that in a daweninge, as Chauntecleer among his wives alle sat on his perche that was in the halle, and next him sat this faire Pertelote, this Chauntecleer gan gronen in his throte, as man that in his dreem is drecched troubled and when that Pertelote thus herde him rore, she was agast, and saide, “herte dere, roared / limb

That folk endure in this life present.
Ther needeth make of this noon argument:
The verray prove\(^5\) sheweth it in deede.

"Oon of the gretteste auctours\(^6\) that men rede
Saith thus, that whilom two felawes wente
On pilgrimage in a ful good entente,
And happed so they comen in a town,
Wher as ther was swich congregacioun
Of peple, and eek so strait of herbergage,\(^7\)

That they ne founde as muche as oo cotage
In which they bothe mighte ylogged\(^8\) be;
Wherefore they mosten\(^9\) of necessitee
As for that night departe\(^{10}\) compaignye.
And eech of hem gooth to his hostelrye,

And took his logging as it wolde falle.\(^9\)
That oon of hem was logged in a stalle,
Fer\(^{11}\) in a yeerd, with oxen of the plough;
That other man was logged wel ynoogh,
As was his aventure\(^{12}\) or his fortune,

That us governeth alle as in commune.
And so bifel that longe er it were day,
This man mette\(^{13}\) in his bed, ther as he lay,
How that his felawe gan upon him calle,
And saide, 'Alias, for in an oxes stalle
This night I shall be mordred\(^{14}\) ther I lie!
Now help me, dere brother, or I die!
In alle haste com to me,' he saide.

"This man out of his sleep for fere abraide,
But whan that he was wakened of his sleep,
He turned him and took of this no keep:\(^{15}\)
Thus twies in his sleeping dreamed he,
And at the third time yit his felawe
Cam, as him thoughte, and saide, 'I am now slawe:°
Bihold my bloody wounds deep and wide.
Aris up erly in the morwe tide,\(^{16}\)
And atte west gate of the town,' quod he,
'A carte ful of dong\(^{17}\) ther shaltou see,
In which my body is hid ful privily:

Do thilke carte arresten boldely.\(^{18}\)
My gold caused my mordre, sooth to sayn'
---And tolde him every point how he was slaine,
With a ful pitous face, pale of hewe.
And truste wel, his dreem he foun'd ful trewe,

For on the morwe\(^*\) as soone as it was day,
To his felawes in\(^*\) he took the way,
And whan that he cam to this oxes stalle,
After his felawe he began to calle.

---Actual experience.
6. I.e., one of the greatest authors (perhaps Cicero or Valerius Maximus).
7. And also such a shortage of lodging.
8. In the morning.
9. Boldly have this same cart seized.
"The hostiler answere him anoon,
And saide, 'Sire, youre felawe is agoon:
As soone as day he wente out of the town.'

"This man gan fallen in suspicioun,
Remembring on his dremes that he mette;
And forth he gooth, no lenger wolde he lette,
Unto the west gate of the town, and foond
A dong carte, wente as it were to donge Iond,
That was arrayed in that same wise
As ye han herd the dede man devise;
And with an hardy herte he gan to crye,
'Vengeance and justice of this felonye!
My felawe mordred is this same night,
And in this carte he lith gaping upright!
I crye out on the ministres,' quod he,
'That sholde keepe and rulen this citee.
Harrow, alias, here lith my felawe slain!'
What sholde I more unto this tale sayn?
The peple up sterte and caste the carte to grounde,
And in the middel of the dong they founde
The dede man that mordred was al newe.

"O blisful God that art so just and trewe,
Lo, how that thou biwrayest mordre alway!
Mordre wol out, that see we day by day:
Mordre is so watsom and abhominable
To God that is so just and resonable,
That he ne wol nat suffre it heled be,
Though it abide a yer or two or three.
Mordre wol out: this my conclusioun.
And right anoon ministres of that town
Han hent the cartere and so sore him pined,
And eek the hostiler so sore engined,
That they biknewe hir wikkednesse anoon,
And were anhanged by the nekke boon.
Here may men seen that dremes been to drede.

"And certes, in the same book I rede—Right in the nexte chapitre after this—
I gabbe nat, so have I joye or blis—
Two men that wolde han passed over see
For certain cause into a fer contree,
If that the wind ne hadde been contrarye
That made hem in a citee for to tarye,
That stood ful merye upon an haven side—
The wind gan chaunge, and blewe right as hem leste:
JoliP and glad they wenten unto reste,
And casten hem ful erly for to saile.
"But to that oo man fil a greet mervail;
That oon of hem, in sleeping as he lay,

1. Recently.
2. Tortured.
3. Worthy of being feared.
4. Just as they wished.
Him mette5 a wonder dreem again the day:
Him thoughte a man stood by his beddes side,
And him comanded that he sholde abide,
And saide him thus, 'If thou tomorwe wende,
Thou shalt be dreint:6 my tale is at an ende.'

"He wook and tolde his felawe what he mette,
And prayed him his viage to lettre;"

As for that day he prayed him to bide.
"His felawe that lay by his beddes side
Gan for to Iaughe, and scorned him ful faste.
'No dreem,' quod he, 'may so myn herte agaste
That I wol lette for to do my thinges.'

"For swevenes been but vanitees and japes:
Men dreme alday° of owles or of apes,
And of many a maze therwithal—
Men dreme of thing that nevere was ne shal.

But sith I see that thou wolt here abide,
And thus forsleuthen wilfully thy tide,
God woot, it reweth me;
and have good day.'

And thus he took his Ieve and wente his way.

But er that he hadde half his cours ysailed—
Noot I nat why ne what meschaunce it ailed—
But casuelly the shippes botme rente,
And ship  and  man  under  the water wente,
In sighte  of othere shippes  it biside,
That with hem sailed at the same tide.

And therfor, faire Pertelote so dere,
By swiche ensamples olde maistou lere°
That no man sholde been too recchelees
Of dremes,  for  I saye thee  doutelees
That many a dreem ful sore is for to drede.

"Lo,  in  the  lif of Saint Kenelm3 I rede—
That was Kenulphus sone,  the  noble  king
Of Mercenrike—how Kenelm mette a thing
A lite° er he was mordred  on a day.
His mordre  in his avision he sey.°

His norice6 him expounded everydeeP
His swevene,  and  bad  him for  to keepe  him
For traison,  but  he  nas  but  seven  yeer old,
And therfore litel tale hath he told
Of any dreem,° so holy was his herte.

By God, I hadde levere than my sherte
That ye hadde rad°  his legende  as have I.

This been the cokkes wordes and nat mine:
I can noon harm of no womman divine.
Faire in the sond to bathe hire merily
Lith Pertelote, and alle hire sustres by,
Again the sonne, and Chauntecleer so free
How that they singen wel and merily.
And so bifel that as he caste his ye
Among the wor tes on a boterflye,
He was war of this fox that lay ful lowe.
No thing ne liste him thanne for to crowe,
But cride anoon "Cok cok!" and up he ster te,
As man that was affrayed in his herte—
For naturely a beest desireth flee
This Chauntecleer, whan he gan him espye,
He wolde han fled, but that the fox anoon

Close of Canterbury Tales At the end of The Canterbury Tales, Chaucer invokes a common allegorical theme, that life on earth is a pilgrimage. As Chaucer puts it in his moral ballade Truth (p. 317), "Here in noon home . . . / Forth, pilgrim, forth!" In the final fragment, he makes explicit a metaphor that has been implicit all along in the journey to Canterbury. The pilgrims never arrive at the shrine of St. Thomas, but in The Parson’s Tale, and in its short introduction and in the “Retraction” that follows it, Chaucer seems to be making an end for two pilgrimages that had become one, that of his fiction and that of his life.

In the introduction to the tale we find the twenty-nine pilgrims moving through a nameless little village as the sun sinks to within twenty-nine degrees of the horizon. The atmosphere contains something of both the chill and the urgency of a late autumn afternoon, and we are surprised to find that the pilgrimage is almost over, that there is need for haste to make that “good end” that every medieval Christian hoped for. This delicately suggestive passage, rich with allegorical overtones, introduces an extremely long penitential treatise, translated by Chaucer from Latin or French sources. Although often assumed to be an earlier work, it may well have been written by Chaucer to provide the ending for The Canterbury Tales.

In the “Retraction” that follows The Parson’s Tale, Chaucer acknowledges, lists, revokes, and asks forgiveness for his “giltes” (that is, his sins), which consist of having written most of the works on which his reputation as a great poet depends. He thanks Christ and Mary for his religious and moral works. One need not take this as evidence of a spiritual crisis or conversion at the end of his life. The “Retraction” seems to have been written to appear at the end of The Canterbury Tales, without censoring any of the tales deemed to be sinful. At the same time, one need not question Chaucer’s sincerity. A readiness to deny his own reality before the reality of his God is implicit in many of Chaucer’s works, and the placement of the “Retraction” within or just outside the border of the fictional pilgrimage suggests that although Chaucer finally rejected his fictions, he recognized that he and they were inseparable.

LYRICS AND OCCASIONAL VERSE

In addition to his narrative verse, Chaucer wrote lyric poetry on the models of famous French and Italian poets who made lyric into a medieval art form aimed at learned and aristocratic audiences, an audience that included fellow poets. Chaucer also embedded lyric in narrative poetry. As an example of courtly lyric, we print a "song" that Troilus, the hero of Chaucer's romance Troilus and Criseyde, makes up about his violent and puzzling emotions after falling in love. The "song" is actually Chaucer's translation into rhyme royal of one of Petrarch's sonnets, more than a century before Sir Thomas Wyatt introduced the sonnet form itself to England. In the fifteenth century, Troilus's song was sometimes excerpted and included in anthologies of lyric poetry.

Chaucer also wrote homiletic ballades, one of which is entitled Truth by modern editors and called "ballade de bon conseil" (ballade of good advice) in some manuscripts. A ballade is a verse form of three or more stanzas, each with an identical rhyme scheme and the same last line, the refrain. Often a ballade ends with a shorter final stanza called an envoy in which the poem is addressed or sent to a friend or patron, or, conventionally, to a "prince" or "princes" in general. The good advice of Truth is to abandon worldly pursuits of wealth and power and to concentrate on the pilgrimage that leads to our true home in heaven. There are many copies of Truth with only this heartfelt advice. The one printed below contains a unique humorous envoy, addressed to a "Vache" (French for "cow"), who is probably a Sir Philip de la Vache.

A single stanza To His Scribe Adam comically conveys Chaucer's exasperation at the sloppy work of a professional copyist. The Complaint to His Purse is a parody of a lover's complaint to his lady: Ladies, like coins, should be golden, and, like purses, they should not be 'light' (i.e., fickle). Purse survives both without and with an envoy. The addressee in the latter case is the recently crowned Henry IV, who is being wittily implored to restore payment of Chaucer's annuity, which had been interrupted by the new king's deposition of Richard II.

Troilus's Song

1. Taking as his theme Christ’s words to his disciples (in John 8.32), And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free, Chaucer plays on the triple meaning that the Middle English word trouthe seems to have had for him: the religious truth of Christianity, the moral virtue of integrity, and the philosophical idea of reality. By maintaining one’s faith and one’s integrity, one rises superior to the vicissitudes of this world and comes eventually to know reality—which is not, however, of this world.
2. Hoarding causes.

8. Britain (Albion) was supposed to have been founded by Brutus, the grandson of Aeneas, the founder of Rome.
Of Gower's life relatively little is known: he was certainly a landowner in Kent, and from about 1377 he seems to have been resident in Southwark, just over the River Thames from the City of London. He had close relations with Chaucer, who sent Troilus and Criseyde (ca. 1385) to "moral Gower" for "correction" (5.1856). Indeed, as the co-initiator of a new tradition of English poetry, his reputation throughout the fifteenth century was very nearly on a par with that of Chaucer. He was himself more concerned than Chaucer for his own literary posterity, since he took care that texts of his work would be transmitted in finished, stable form. No contemporary poet matches him for linguistic virtuosity, since Gower wrote in three languages. His main poetic works are as follows: the Mirour de Vomme (Mirror of Man) (finished 1376—78), written in Anglo-Norman (the dialect of French spoken in England); the Latin Vox Clamantis (Voice of the Crier), written substantially before 1386; and the English Confessio Amantis (The Lover's Confession), first published in 1390. The Mirour (the last major work written in Anglo-Norman in England) was addressed primarily to an upper-class audience capable of reading both French and English, while the Latin Vox was clearly directed to a highly educated audience. The first version of the Confessio was dedicated to Richard II. By the time of the third recension (1392—93), Richard had been replaced by Henry Bolingbroke, the future Henry IV, as the poem's dedicatee. Despite these dedications to specific and powerful readers, Gower in fact addressed the Confessio to all educated readers, both men and women.

Vox Clamantis refers to the saint whose name Gower bore, John the Baptist, whom all four gospels refer to as "the voice of one crying out in the wilderness" (Matthew 3.3, Mark 1.3, Luke 3.4, John 1.23) who will prepare the way for the Lord, fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah 40.3. Gower thus identifies himself with the prophetic voice of John the Baptist as well as the apocalyptic voice of John the Evangelist in the Book of Revelation. In keeping with this posture, the Mirour and the Vox are examples of estates satire, a genre of satire in which the writer addresses and berates each main occupational grouping of society in turn. (For more information on estates satire, see "Medieval Estates and Orders" at Norton Literature Online, where there are translations of excerpts from the Mirour and Vox.) In the Vox, for example, Gower vigorously attacks the peasantry for their part in the English Uprising of 1381.

While Gower wrote as moralist and satirist in the Mirour and the Vox, he changed tack in the Confessio Amantis. To be sure, the poem is structured as a moral discourse: the Confessor figure Genius hears the confession of the penitent Amans, as if enacting the procedures of the Church's sacrament of penance (one part of which was a formal, confidential confession to a priest). In seven of the poem's eight books, Genius hears Amans's confession concerning a different Deadly Sin (respectively Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Greed, Gluttony, and Lechery). The very names of penitent and confessor themselves suggest, however, that this is no ordinary confession. For Amans (literally "one who loves") is heard by a "genial" aspect of the psyche, Genius, who is the priest of Venus. Far from condemning Amans for his hopeless subjection to erotic desire, Genius as often as not encourages Amans in his passion, or so it would seem initially. The eighty or so stories Genius tells by way of "correcting" Amans are drawn not from penitential treatises; they are rather, on the whole, drawn from secular, classical sources, and often from the poetry of Ovid, the classical poet of erotic love.

As the Confessio progresses, however, Genius increasingly registers the social and political disasters that result from solipsistic pursuit of sexual desire. While never abandoning his "genial" perspective altogether, and while never wishing wholly to repress sexual passion, Genius finally brings Amans around, to the point where Amans reintegrates with the psyche of which he is ideally a part. He finally regains his full identity as "John Gower." This recovery of identity involves a very moving self-recognition scene in the poem’s finale, in which an aged Gower recognizes his position as a lover, a citizen, and a Christian. The poem is not only about one individual, however: Gower’s sexual governance is linked to political governance of the kingdom. Just as Gower must rule yet recognize the proper demands of his body, so too must the king rule and recognize his kingdom.

Many of Genius’s narratives relate stories whose violence entirely overshadows the often pathetic, and always hopeless pursuit of Amans for his lady. The narrative of Tereus and Philomela ("Philomene" in Gower’s narrative), drawn from Ovid, Metamorphoses (6.426—676), is one such frightening text. It tells a story of unremitting domestic violence, relating the "greediness" of rape to the larger concept of greed, the sin treated by Genius in Book 5 of the Confessio. A husband (Tereus) rapes and cuts out the tongue of his sister-in-law (Philomela); his wife (Procne) and her sister take their vengeance by murdering and cooking the rapist’s child (Itys). Philomela’s concern is as much for publication of the rape as for vengeance: with her excised tongue, she relies on weaving as a means of writing to communicate the terror of her experience, just as, transformed into a chattering bird at the end of the story, she continues to remind humans of Tereus’s disgrace. When Chaucer had recounted the same story in The Legend of Good Women (ca. 1386), he omitted the most hair-raising episodes of the Ovidian source. Gower, by contrast, follows the lineaments of Ovid’s narrative fairly closely, and does not turn aside from the transformation of suffering women into terrible avengers, as Procne (here "Progne") murders and butchers her own child. Nor does he fail to register the horror of rape, as Philomela feels the inescapable weight of Tereus upon her (lines 96—101).

The Tale of Philomene and Tereus

GENIUS:

Now list, my Sone, and thou shalt heere,
So as it hath befalle er’ this
In loves cause how that it is A man to take be” ravine⁴
The preie” that is femeline.

Ther was a real⁹ noble king,
And riche of alle wordes thing,
Which of his propre⁶ inheritance
Athenes hadde in governance,
And who so” thinke thereupon,
His name was king Pandion.

Two doughtres⁴ hadde he be his wif,
The whiche he lovede as his lif;
The firste doughter Progne highte,⁴
And the secounde, as she wel mighte,
Was cleped⁸ faire Philomene,
To whom fell afterward / grief muchel tene.⁹
The fader of his purveance⁶
His daughter Progne wolde avance⁶
And yP hire unto marriage
A worthy king of hye ligneage.⁶
A noble knight eke of his hond,¹
So was he kid in every lond,
Of Trace² he highte Tereus;
The clerk Ovide³ telleth thus.
This Tereus his wif hoom fadde,
A lusty⁴ lif with hire he hadde;
Til it befell upon a tide,⁵
This Progne, as she lay him beside,
Bethoughte hire how it mighte be
That she hir suster mighte see,
And to hir lord hir will she saide,
With goodly wordes and him prayde
That she to hire mighte go:
And if it liked him noght so,
That than he wolde himselfe wende,⁶
Or elles be some other sende,
Which mighte hir deere suster greete
And shape how that they mighten meete.
Hir lord anon to that he herde
Yaf his acord, and thus answerde:
"I wol," he saide, "for thy sake
The way after thy suster take Myself, and bring hire, if I may."
And she with that, ther as he lay,
Began him in hir armes clippe,⁷
And kist him with hir softe lippe,
And saide, "Sire, grant mercy."⁸
And he soone⁹ after was redy,
And took his leve forto go;
In sory time dide he so.

This Tereus gooth forth to shipe
With him and with his felaweshipe;
By see the righte course he nam,⁹
Into the contree til he cam,
Wher Philomene was dwellinge,
And of hir suster the tidinge
He tolde, and tho they were glade,
And muchel joy of him they made.
The fader and the moder bothe
To leve hir doughter weren Iothe,
But if they weren in presence⁴
And natheles at reverence²
Of him, that wolde himselfe travaile,⁹
They wolden noght he sholde faile
Of that he prayed, and yive hire leve:
And she, that wolde noght beleve,⁹
In alle haste made hire yare⁰

To him\(^6\) anon the strengthe acrocheth,\(^0\)
Til with his\(^8\) hete it be devoured,
The tow ne may noght be socoured,\(^0\)
And so that tyrant raviner,
When that she was in his power,
And he thereto saugh time and place,
As he that lost hath alle grace,
Foryat he was a wedded man,
And in a rage on hire he ran,
Right as a wolf which takth\(^6\) his preye.
And she began to crye and praye,
"O fader, o mi moder deere,
Now help!" But they ne mighte it heere,
And she was of to litel might Defense again\(^6\) so rude\(^6\) a knight
To make, whan he was so wood\(^6\)
That he no reson understood,
But held hire under in such wise,

Beraft\(^8\) hire such thing as men sayn
May neveremore be yolde\(^8\) again,
And that was the virginitee:
Of such ravine it was pitee.

But whan she to hirselven cam,
And of hir meschief heede nam,\(^7\)
And knew how that she was no maide,
With wofull herte thus she saide:
"Q thou of alle men the worsste,
Wher was ther evere man that dorste
Do such a dede as thou hast do?
That day shal falle, I hope so,
That I shal telle out al my fille,\(^7\)

And she began to thenke tho,
Thogh she be mouthe nothing prayde,
Withinne hir herte thus she saide:
"O thou, almighty Jupiter,
That hye sits and Iookest fer,
Thou suffrest many a wrong doinge,
And yit it is noght thy willinge.

Whan thou therof wolt do\(^\text{9}\) vengeance
And shape my deliverance."
And evere among this lady wept,
And thoughte that she nevere kepeth
To been a worldes womman more,
And that she wisheth everemore.
But ofte unto hir suster deere
Hir herte spekth in this manere,
And saide, "Ha, Suster, if ye knewe
Of myn estat, ye wolde rewe,

9. I.e., deceit under cover. "Gore" is a kind of cloak; the expression is probably proverbial for deception.
Itrowe," and my deliverance
Ye wolde shape, and do vengeance
On him that is so fals a man:
And natheles, so as I can,
I wol you sende some tokeninge,
Whereof ye shul have knowlechinge
Of thing I woot, that shal you lothe.
The which you toucheth and me bothe.
And tho withinne a while als tis
She wapel a cloth of silk al whit
With lettres and ymageye.
In which was al the felonye
Which Tereus to hire hath do;
And lappede it togidre tho
And sette hir signet therupon
And sende it unto Progne anon.
The messager which forth it bar,
What it amounteth is noght war;
And natheles to Progne he goth
And prively takth hire the cloth,
And wente again right as he cam,
The court of him non heede nam.
Whan Progne of Philomene herde,
She wolde knowe how that it ferde,
And openeth that the man hath broght,
And woot therby what hath be wroght
And what meschief ther is befallie.
In swoune tho she gan doun falle,
And eft° aroos and gan to stonde,
And eft she takth the cloth on honde,
Beheld the lettres and thymages;
But atte laste, "Of such outrages,"
She sayth, "weeping is noght the boote,"
And swerth, if that she live moote,
It shal be venged otherwise.
How firsst she mighte unto hire winne
Hir suster, that noman withinne,
But only they that were swore,
It sholde knowe, and shoop therefore
That Tereus nothing it wiste;
And yit right as hirselsen liste,
Hir suster was delivered soone
Out of prison, and be the moone
To Progne she was broght be nighte.
Whan ech of other hadde a sighte,
In chambre, ther they were al one,
They maden many a pitous mone;
But Progne most of sorwe made,
Which sih' hir suster pale and fade
And speecheles and deshonoured,
Of that she hadde be defloured; And eke upon hir lord she thoughte, Of that he so untrewely wroghte And hadde his espousale broke. She makth a vow it shal be wroke:°
And with that word she kneleth doun Weeping in greet devocioun:
Unto Cupide and to Venus She prayde, and saide thanne thus:°
"O ye, to whom nothing asterte Of love may, for every herte Ye knowe, as ye that been above The god and goddesse of love; Ye witen wel that evere yit With al my will and al my wit, Sith ferst ye shoopen me to wedde, That I lay with my lord abedde, I have be trewe in my degree, And evere thoughte forto be, And nevere love in other place, But al only the king of Trace, Which is my lord and I his wif. But now alias this wofull striff! That I him thus againward finde The most untrewre and most unkinde°
That evere in lady armes lay. And wel I woot that he ne may Amende his wrong, it is so greet; For he to litel of me leet,° Whan he myn owne suster took, And me that am his wif forsook.°
Lo, thus to Venus and Cupide She prayde, and furthermore she cryde Unto Appollo the higheste, And saide, "O mighty god of reste, Thou do vengeance of this debat. My suster and al hir estat Thou woost, and how she hath forlore°
Hir maidenhood, and I therfore In al the world shal here a blame Of that my suster hath a shame, That Tereus to hire I sente: And wel thou woost that myn entente Was al for worship and for goode.°
O lord, that yisst the lives foode To every wight. I pray thee here Thes wofull sustres that been here, And let us noght to thee been loth;°
We been thyn owne wommen bothe.° Thus plaineth Progne and axeth wreche,° And thogh hir suster lacke speche,
To him that alle things woot
Hir sorwe is noght the lasse hoot:
But he that thanne had herd hem two,
Him oughte have sorwed everemo
For sorwe which was hem betweene.
With signes plaineth Philomene,
And Progne sayth, "It shal be wreke,"
That al the world therof shal speke."
And Progne tho' siknesse feineth,
Wherof unto hir lord she plaineth,
And prayth she most hir chambres keepe,
And as hire liketh wake and sleepe.
And he hire granteth to be so;
And thus togidre been they two,
That wolde him but a Iitel good.
Now herk herafter how it stood
Of wofull auntres that befelle:
Thes sustres, that been bothe felle°—
And that was noght on hem along,
But onliche on° the greete wrong
Which Tereus hem hadde do—
They shoopen forto venge hem tho.

This Tereus be Progne his wif
A sone hath, which as his lif
He loveth, and Ithis he highte:
His moder wiste wel she mighte
Do Tereus no more grief
Than slee this child, which was so lief.°
Thus she, that was, as who sayth, mad
Of wo, which hath hir overlad,
Withoute insighte of moderheede
Foryat pitee and loste dreede,
And in hir chambre privel
This child withouten noise or cry
She slou° and hewe° him al to pieces.
And after with diverse spices
The flessh, whan that it was tohewe,°
She takth, and makth therof a sewe,"
With which the fader at his mete°
Was served, til he hadde him ete;
That he ne wiste how it stood,
But thus his owene flessh and blood
Himself devoureth again kinde,"
As he that was tofore unkinde.
And thanne, er that he were arise,
For that he sholde been agrise,°
To shewen him the child was deed,
This Philomene took the heed
Between two dishes, and al wrothe°
Tho comen forth the sustres bothe,
And setten it upon the bord.
And Progne tho began the word,
And saide, "O werste of alle wicke,
Of conscience whom no pricke
May stere, lo, what thou hast do!
Lo, here been now we sustres two;
O raviner, lo here thy preie."
With whom so falsliche on the waye
Thou hast thy tyranny wyght.
Lo, now it is somdel aboight,
And bet it shal, for of thi deede
The world shal evere singe and rede
In remembrance of thy defame:
For thou to love hast do such shame,
That it shal nevere be foryete."
With that he sterte up fro the mete,
And shooP the bord unto the floor,
And caughte a swerd anon and swoor
That they sholde of his handes dye
And they unto the goddess crye
Begunnne with so loude a stevene,
That they were herd unto the hevene;
And in a twinklinge of an ye
The goddes, that the meschief sye,
Hir formes chaungen alle three.
Echoon of hem in his degree
Was torned into briddes kinde;
Diverseliche as men may finde,
After thestat that they were inne,
Hir formes were set atwinne.
And as it telleth in the tale,
The ferst into a nightingale
Was shape, and that was Philomene,
Which in the winter is noght sene,
For thanne been the leves falle
And naked been the bushes alle.
For after that she was a brid,
Hir will was evere to been hid,
And forto dwelle in privee place,
Than noman sholde seen hir face
For shame which may noght be lassed,
Of thing that was tofore passed,
Whan that she loste hir maidenhede:
For evere upon hir wommanhede,
Thogh that the goddes wolde hire chaunge,
She thenkth, and is the more straunge,
And halt hire cloos the winters day.
But whan the winter gooth away,
And that Nature the goddesse

Been heled\(^0\) al with greene leves,
So that a brid hire hide may,
Between Averil\(^0\) and March and May,
She that the winter held hire cloos,
For pure shame and noght aroos,
WTian that she seeth the bowes thikke,
And that ther is no bare stikke,
To woode comth this Philomene
And makth hir ferste yeres flight;
Wher as she singeth day and night,
And in hir song al openly
She makth hir plainte and sayth, "O why,
O why ne were I yit a maide?"\(^0\)
For so these olde wise saide,
Which understoonden what she mente,
Hir notes been of such entente.\(^0\)
And eke they saide how in hir song
She makth greet joye and mirthe among,
And sayth, "Ha, now I am a brid, Ha, now my face may been hid:
Though I have lost my maidenhede,
Shal noman see my cheekes rede."
Thus medleth\(^0\) she with joye wo
And with hir sorwe mirthe also,
So that of loves maladye
She makth diverse melodye,
And sayth love is a wofull blisse,
A wisdom which can noman wisse.\(^0\)
A lusty\(^0\) fevere, a wundre softe:
This note she reherseth ofte
To hem, whiche understondre hir tale.
Now have I of this nightingale,
Which erst was cleped Philomene,
Told al that evere I wolde mene,
Bothe of hir forme and of hir note.
Wherof men may the storye note.\(^0\)
And of hir suster Progne I finde,
How she was torned\(^0\) out of kinde
Into a swalwe\(^0\) swift of winge,
Which eke in winter lith swouninge,\(^0\)
Ther as she may nothing be sene:
But whan the world is woxe\(^0\) greene
And comen is the somertide,
Than fleth she forth and ginth\(^4\) to chide,
And chitreth out in hir langage
What falshood is in marriage.

And telleth in a manner speche
Of Tereus sposebreeche.
She wol noght in the woodes dwelle,
For she wolde openliche telle;
And eke for that she was a spouse,
Among the folke she comth to house,
To do these wifes understonde
The falshood of hir housbonde,
That they of hem be war also,
For ther been many untrewe of tho.°
Thus been the sustres briddes bothe,
And been toward the men so lothe,
That they ne wole of pure shame
Unto no mannes hand be tyme;
For evere it dwelleth in hir minde
Of that they founde a man unkinde,
And that was false Tereus.
If such oon be amonges us
I noot,° but his condicioun
Men sayn in every regioun
Withinne toune and eke withoute
Now regneth communliche aboute.
And natheles in remembrance
I wol declare what vengeance
The goddess hadden him ordained,
Of that the sustres hadden plained:
For anon after he was chaunged
And from his owene kinde straunged,°
A lappewinge made he was,
And thus he hopbeth on the gras,
And on his heed ther stant upright
A creste in tokne he was a knight;
And yit unto this day men sayth,
A lappewinge hath lore° his faith
And is the brid falseste of alle.
Bewar my sone, er thee so falle;
For if thou be of such covine,°
To get of love be ravine
Thy lust,° it may thee falle thus,
As it befell of Tereus.

AMANS:

My fader, goddes forebode!°
Me were levere be fortrode°
With wilde hors and be todrawe,°
Er I again love and his lawe
Dide any thing or loude or stille,
Which were noght my lady wille.
Men sayn that every love hath drede;
So folweth it that I hire drede,
For I hire love, and who so dredeth,
To plese his love and serve him needeth.
Thus may ye known be this skile°
That no ravine doon I wille
Again hir will be such a waye;
But while I live, I wol obeye
Abidinge on hir courtesye,
If any mercy wolde hir plye.'
Forthy, my fader, as of this
I woot noght I have doon amis:
But furthermore I you beseeche,
Some other point that ye me teche
And axeth forth, if ther be ought,°
That I may be the bettre taught.

WILLIAM LANGLAND
ca. 1330-1387

William Langland is agreed by most scholars to be the sole author of a long religious allegory in alliterative verse known as The Vision of Piers Plowman or more simply Piers Plowman, which survives in at least three distinct versions that scholars refer to as the A-, B-, and C-texts. The first, about twenty-four hundred lines long, breaks off at a rather inconclusive point in the action; the second (from which all but one of the selections here have been drawn) is a revision of the first plus an extension of more than four thousand lines; and the third is a revision of the second. About Langland we know hardly anything except what can be inferred from the poem itself. He came from the west of England and was probably a native of the Malvern Hills area in which the opening of the poem is set. We can never identify the persona of the narrator of a medieval text positively or precisely with its author, especially when we are dealing with allegory. Nevertheless, a passage that was added to the C-text, the last of the selections printed here, gives the strong impression of being at one and the same time an allegory in which the narrator represents willful Mankind and a poignantly ironic self-portrait of the stubborn-willed poet who occasionally plays on his own name: "I have lived in land . . . my name is Long Will" (15.152). In this new episode the narrator tries to defend his shiftless way of life against Conscience and Reason, presumably his own conscience and reason. Conscience dismisses his spec-iuous argument that a clerical education has left him no "tools" to support himself with except for his prayer book and the Psalms with which he prays for the souls of those from whom he begs alms. The entire work conforms well with the notion that its author was a man who was educated to enter the church but who, through mar-rriage and lack of preferment, was reduced to poverty and may well have wandered in his youth like those "hermits" he scornfully describes in the prologue.

Piers Plowman has the form of a dream vision, a common medieval type in which the author presents the story under the guise of having dreamed it. The dream vision generally involves allegory, not only because one expects from a dream the unrealistic, the fanciful, but also because people have always suspected that dreams relate the truth in disguised form—that they are natural allegories. Through a series of such visions it traces the Dreamer-narrator's tough-minded, persistent, and passionate search for answers to his many questions, especially the question he puts early in the poem to Lady Holy Church: "How I may save my soul." Langland’s theme is nothing less than the history of Christianity as it unfolds both in the world of the Old and New Testaments and in the life and heart of an individual fourteenth-century Christian—two seemingly distinct realms between which the poet’s allegory moves with dizzying rapidity.

Within the larger sequence of the poem from its beginning until the end of Passus 7, the following selections form a thematically coherent narrative. In the Prologue (the first selection), Langland’s narrator falls asleep and witnesses a compact vision of the whole of late fourteenth-century English society. Poised between two stark and static possibilities of heaven and hell, an intensely active, mobile earthly life is concentrated into a ‘field full of folk.’ Some ideal practitioners of earthly occupations are surrounded and undermined by a much larger set of very energetic social types who exploit their occupations for entirely selfish ends. Langland practices an estates satire, which surveys and excoriates each worldly occupation (cf. Chaucer’s very different example of estates satire in the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales; for other examples, see ‘Medieval Estates and Orders’ at Norton Literature Online). He reserves his especial anger for those who abuse ecclesiastical authority, and for the wealthy, pitiless laity (i.e. non-ecclesiastical figures).

Passus. Latin for “step,” is the word used for the poem’s basic divisions. Passus 1 (the second selection) promises to give some intellectual and moral purchase on the teeming energies of the Prologue. Holy Church instructs the poem’s narrator and dreamer Will in the proper relation of material wealth and spiritual health. In particular, she accentuates the value of the ‘best treasure,’ truthe, one of Langland’s key words: truthe is the justice that flows from God; it manifests itself in the exercise of earthly justice and fidelity, and in the correlative poetic value of truth-telling. Will recognizes the force of Holy Church’s sermon, but still needs to know it by an interior form of knowledge, grounded in the depths of the self.

It would seem that the rest of the poem is devoted to the discovery of that internalized truth. The first of the poem’s large-scale narratives (Passus 2—4) represents the attempt of earthly justice to control the disruptive energies of the profit economy. That economy is here represented by the personification ’Lady Mede,’ meaning ‘reward beyond deserving.’ After this sequence concerning earthly justice, the poem then turns to the deeper, more personal mechanisms of spiritual justice. In Passus 5, accordingly, the seven Deadly Sins confess in turn, before the poem’s ideal earthly representative of justice, Piers Plowman, offers to lead a spiritual pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Truthe (Passus 5.507—642, the third selection).

The ideal of truthe takes a local habitation, then, in the model of society that Piers establishes for the conduct of his “pilgrimage.” The truest form of pilgrimage is no pilgrimage at all; instead, all classes of society should stay at home and work harmoniously for the production of material food by agricultural workers, with knights helping plowmen and protecting the Church, while priests pray for both workers and knights. This ideal scene is pictured in Passus 6 (the fourth selection).

Langland’s poem might seem, thus far, to be a deeply conservative one, whereby justice is manifest only in a manorial society, within which each person knows his or her place, and works harmoniously and obediently with the others. There is, however, a problem with this model: it collapses. In Passus 6 the ideal society put into action by Piers fails entirely; workers simply refuse to work, abuse the authority of knights, and respond only to the terrible pressure of Hunger, a punishing, Gargantuuan figure who graphically evokes the ravages of famine in the fourteenth century.

In Passus 7 (the fifth selection) the limitations of the truthe model become dramatically visible. A pardon sent from God as Truthe promises no pardon at all, but only retribution for those who fail to meet the standards of God’s justice, and reward for those who do not so fail. As the plowing has demonstrated, however, all fail. Such a ‘pardon’ promises nothing but universal damnation. In an exceptionally powerful, dramatic and enigmatic moment, Piers actually tears this pardon in two, as he disputes with a priest about its force. Earlier in the poem it had seemed that all Will had to do was to absorb Holy Church's understanding of Truth; once Piers tears the pardon, however, we realize that the search for Truth modifies the goal. We realize, that is, that Truth cannot be the whole truth. The shortcomings of Truth propel Will to a more urgent search for God's love and forgiveness, beyond justice, in the deepest resources of his own self. This search climaxes in the vision of Christ's Atonement (Passus 18; see the selection in this volume, pp. 357-67).

In the last selection from the C-Text, Langland presents a moving, if less passionate and conflicted scene than the tearing of Truth's Pardon. In a passage often regarded as autobiographical, Will argues with Conscience and Reason (principles of law, but also, doubtless, Will's own conscience and reason). They reproach him for his way of life in a poor district of London, where Will barely supports his family with alms he gets by praying for the souls of wealthy burghers.

A large number of manuscripts and two sixteenth-century editions show that Piers Plowman was avidly read and studied by a great many people from the end of the fourteenth century to the reign of Elizabeth I. Some of these readers have left a record of their engagement with the poem in marginal comments. Almost from the first, it was a controversial text. Within four years of the writing of the second version—which scholars have good evidence to date 1377, the year of Edward Ill's death and Richard II's accession to the throne—it had become so well known that the leaders of of the Uprising of 1381 used phrases borrowed from it as part of the rhetoric of the rebellion (for an example of such rhetoric, see the letter by John Ball, "The Uprising of 1381," in "Medieval Estates and Orders" at Norton Literature Online). Langland's sympathy with the sufferings of the poor and his indignant satire of corruption in Church and State undoubtedly made his poem popular with the rebels. Although he may not have sympathized with the violence of the rebels and their leaders, he recognized that for the Church to be preserved, it needed profound reform. The passionate sympathy for the commoner, idealized in Piers Plowman, also appealed to reformers who felt that true religion was best represented not by the ecclesiastical hierarchy but by the humblest orders of society. Many persons reading his poem in the sixteenth century (it was first printed in 1550) saw in Piers Plowman a prophecy and forerunner of the English Reformation. Immersed as it is in thorny political and theological controversies of its own day, Piers Plowman is arguably the most difficult and, at times, even the most frustrating of Middle English texts, but its poetic, intellectual, and moral complexity and integrity also make it one of the most rewarding.

From The Vision of Piers Plowman

From The Prologue

[THE FIELD OF FOLK]

In a summer season when the sun was mild
I clad myself in clothes as I'd become a sheep;
In the habit of a hermit unholy of works,²
Walked wide in this world, watching for wonders.

And on a May morning, on Malvern Hills,

There befell me as by magic a marvelous thing:
I was weary of wandering and went to rest

---

2. For Langland's opinion of hermits, see lines 28-30 and 53-57. The sheep's clothing may suggest the habit's physical resemblance to sheep's wool as well as a false appearance of innocence.
At the bottom of a broad bank by a brook's side,
And as I lay lazily looking in the water
I slipped into a slumber, it sounded so pleasant.
There came to me reclining there a most curious dream
That I was in a wilderness, nowhere that I knew;
But as I looked into the east, up high toward the sun,
I saw a tower on a hill-top, trimly built,
A deep dale beneath, a dungeon tower in it,
With ditches deep and dark and dreadful to look at.
A fair field full of folk I found between them,
Of human beings of all sorts, the high and the low,
Working and wandering as the world requires.
Some applied themselves to plowing, played very rarely,
Sowing seeds and setting plants worked very hard;
Won what wasters gluttonously consume.
And some pursued pride, put on proud clothing,
Came all got up in garments garish to see.
To prayers and penance many put themselves,
All for love of our Lord lived hard lives,
Hoping thereafter to have Heaven's bliss—
Such as hermits and anchorites that hold to their cells,
Don't care to go cavorting about the countryside,
With some lush livelihood delighting their bodies.
And some made themselves merchants—they managed better,
As it seems to our sight that such men prosper.
And some make mirth as minstrels can
And get gold for their music, guiltless, I think.
But jokers and word jugglers, Judas' children, Invent fantasies to tell about and make fools of themselves,
And have whatever wits they need to work if they wanted.
What Paul preaches of them I don't dare repeat here:
Qui loquitur turpiloquium is Lucifer's henchman.
Beadsmen and beggars bustled about
Till both their bellies and their bags were crammed to the brim;
Staged flytings for their food, fought over beer.
In gluttony, God knows, they go to bed
And rise up with ribaldry, those Robert's boys.
Sleep and sloth pursue them always.
Pilgrims and palmers made pacts with each other
To seek Saint James and saints at Rome.
They went on their way with many wise stories,
And had leave to lie all their lives after.
I saw some that said they'd sought after saints:
In every tale they told their tongues were tuned to lie
More than to tell the truth—such talk was theirs.
A heap of hermits with hooked staffs

3. Minstrels who entertain with jokes and fantastic stories are regarded as descendants of Christ's betrayer, Judas.
5. Prayer sayers, i.e., people who offered to say prayers, sometimes counted on the beads of the rosary, for the souls of those who gave them alms.
6. Contests in which the participants took turns insulting each other, preferably in verse.
7. Virtually professional pilgrims who took advantage of the hospitality offered them to go on traveling year after year (see p. 219, n. 6).
8. I.e., his shrine at Compostela in Spain.
Went off to Walsingham, with their wenches behind them.

Great long lubbers that don't like to work
Dressed up in cleric's dress to look different from other men
And behaved as they were hermits, to have an easy life.
I found friars there—all four of the orders—
Preaching to the people for their own paunches' welfare.

Making glosses of the Gospel that would look good for interpretations themselves;
Coveting copes, they construed it as they pleased.
Many of these Masters may clothe themselves richly,
For their money and their merchandise march hand in hand.
Since Charity has proved a peddler and principally shrives lords,
Many marvels have been manifest within a few years.
Unless Holy Church and friars' orders hold together better,
The worst misfortune in the world will be welling up soon.

A pardoner preached there as if he had priest's rights,
Brought out a bull with bishop's seals,
And said he himself could absolve them all
Of failure to fast, of vows they'd broken.
Unlearned men believed him and liked his words,
Came crowding up on knees to kiss his bulls.
He banged them with his brevet and blear'd their eyes,
And raked in with his parchment-roll rings and brooches.
Thus you give your gold for gluttons' well-being,
And squander it on scoundrels schooled in lechery.
If the bishop were blessed and worth both his ears,
His seal should not be sent out to deceive the people,
—and it's nothing to the bishop that the blackguard preaches,
And the parish priest and the pardoner split the money
That the poor people of the parish would have but for them.

Parsons and parish priests complained to the bishop
That their parishes were poor since the pestilence-time,
Asked for license and leave to live in London,
And sing Masses there for simony, for silver is sweet.

Yet scores of men stood there in silken coifs
Who seemed to be law-sergeants that served at the bar,
Pleaded cases for pennies and impounded the law,
And not for love of our Lord once unloosed their lips:

You might better measure mist on Malvern Hills
Than get a "mum" from their mouths till money’s on the table.

I saw in this assemblage, as you shall hear later;
Bakers and brewers and butchers aplenty.

Weavers of wool and weavers of linen,
Tailors, tinkers, tax-collectors in markets,
Masons, miners, many other craftsmen.

Of all living laborers there leapt forth some,
Such as diggers of ditches that do their jobs badly,

And dawdle away the long day with "Dieu save dame Emme."

Cooks and their kitchen-boys crying, "Hot pies, hot!
Good geese and pork! Let’s go and dine!"

Tavern-keepers told them a tale of the same sort:
"White wine of Alsace and wine of Gascony,
Of the Rhine and of La Rochelle, to wash the roast down with."

All this I saw sleeping, and seven times more.

Passus I

(TE THE TREASURE O OF TRUTH)

What this mountain means, and the murky dale,
And the field full of folk I shall clearly tell you.

A lady lovely of look, in linen clothes,

Came down from the castle and called me gently,

And said, "Son, are you asleep? Do you see these people,
How busy they’re being about the maze?
The greatest part of the people that pass over this earth,
If they have well-being in this world, they want nothing more:
For any heaven other than here they have no thought."

I was afraid of her face, fair though she was,

And said, "Mercy, madam, what may this mean?"

"The tower on the hill-top," she said, "Truth" is within it,

And would have you behave as his words teach.

For he is father of faith, formed you all

Both with skin and with skull, and assigned you five senses
To worship him with while you are here.

And therefore he ordered the earth to help each one of you
With woolens, with linens, with livelihood at need,

In a moderate manner to make you at ease;

And of his kindness declared three things common to all:
None are necessary but these, and now I will name them
And rank them in their right order—you repeat them after.
The first is vesture to defend you from the cold;
The second is food at fit times to fend off hunger,

And drink when you’re dry—but don’t drink beyond reason
Or you will be the worse for it when you’ve work to do.

---

4. Town dwellers who had full rights as the citizens of a municipality. In contrast, barons were members of the upper nobility, and bondmen were peasants who held their land from a lord in return for customary services or rent.

6. Langland plays on three meanings of the term "Truth": (1) fidelity, integrity—as in modern "troth"; (2) reality, actuality, conformity with what is; (3) God, the ultimate truth; see Headnote.
For Lot in his lifetime because he liked drink
Did with his daughters what the Devil found pleasing,
And lechery laid hold on him and he lay with them both,
Blamed it all on the wine’s working, that wicked deed.

Let us make him drunk with wine, and let us lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father.¹

By wine and by women there Lot was overcome
And there begot in gluttony graceless brats.
Therefore dread delicious drink and you’ll do the better:

Moderation is medicine no matter how you yearn.
It’s not all good for your ghost⁶ that your gut wants
Nor of benefit to your body that’s a blessing to your soul.
Don’t believe your body for it does the bidding of a liar:
That is this wretched world that wants to betray you;

For the Fiend and your flesh both conform to it,
And that besmirches your soul: set this in your heart,
And so that you should yourself be wary I’m giving this advice.’

‘Ah, madam, mercy,” said I, “your words much please me.

But the money minted on earth that men are so greedy for,
Tell me to whom that treasure belongs?’

“Go to the Gospel,” she said, “that God himself spoke
When the people approached him with a penny in the temple
And asked whether they should worship⁹ with it Caesar the king,
And he asked them to whom the inscription referred ‘Caesaris,’¹ they said, ‘we can all see it clearly.’

‘Reddite Caesari,’ said God, ‘what Caesari belongs,²
And quae sunt Dei Deo, or else you do wrong.’
For rightfully Reason³ should rule you all,

And Kind Wit be keeper to take care of your wealth
And be guardian of your gold to give it out when you need it,
For economy⁴ and he are of one accord.’

Then I questioned her courteously, in the Creator’s name,
‘The dungeon in the dale that’s dreadful to see,

What may it mean, madam, I beseech you?’

‘That is the Castle of Care: whoever comes into it
Will be sorry he was ever born with body and soul.
The captain of the castle is called Wrong,
Father of falsehood, he founded it himself.

Adam and Eve he egged to evil,
Counseled Cain to kill his brother;
He made a joke out of Judas with Jewish silver,⁵
And afterwards on an elder tree hanged him high.

7. Genesis 19.32.
8. Spirit.
9. “Worship” in Middle English often means religious celebration, but the worship of God is only one instance of showing the appropriate honor and respect to someone or something; the word can therefore be used about objects other than God.
1. Caesar’s.
2. ‘Reddite unto Caesar’: ‘to Caesar.’ In the next line the Latin clause means “What are God’s unto God.” See Matthew 22.15-21.
3. Langland distinguishes the role of reason, as the distinctive human capacity to reach truth by discursive reasoning, from the functions of a number of other related mental processes and sources of truth, e.g., Kind Wit (next line): natural intelligence, common sense.
4. I.e., prudent management.
5. For the fall of Adam and Eve, see Genesis 3; for Cain’s murder of Abel, see Genesis 4. In the next lines, for Judas’s betrayal of Jesus, see Matthew 26.14-16; for his death (line 68), see Matthew 27.3-6.
He's a molester of love, lies to every one;
Those who trust in his treasure are betrayed soonest."
Then I wondered in my wits what woman it might be
Who could show from Holy Scripture such wise words,
And I conjured her in the high name, ere she went away,
To say who she really was that taught me so well.
"I am Holy Church," she said, "you ought to know me:
I befriended you first and taught the faith to you.
You gave me gages⁶ to be guided by my teaching
And to love me loyally while your life lasts."
Then kneeling on my knees I renewed my plea for grace,
Prayed piteously to her to pray for my sins,
And advise me how I might find natural faith
in Christ,
That I might obey the command of him who made me man.
"Teach me of no treasure, but tell me this one thing,
How I may save my soul, sacred as you are?"
"When all treasures are tried, Truth is the best.
I call on Deus caritas⁸ to declare the truth.
It's as glorious a love-gift as dear God himself.
For whoever is true of his tongue, tells nothing untrue,
Does his work with truth, wishes no man ill.
He is a god by the Gospel, on ground and aloft,
And also like our Lord by Saint Luke's words.⁹
Clerks who've been taught this text should tell it all about,
For Christians and non-Christians lay claim to it both.
To keep truth kings and knights are required by reason,
And to ride out in realms about and beat down wrong-doers,
Take transgressores¹ and tie them up tight
Until Truth has determined their trespass in full.
For David in his days when he dubbed knights¹
Made them swear on their swords to serve Truth forever.
That is plainly the profession that's appropriate for knights,
And not to fast one Friday in five score winters,
But to hold with him and with her who ask for truth,
And never leave them for love nor through a liking for presents,
And whoever passes that point is an apostate to his order.
For Christ, King of Kings, created ten orders,³ Cherubim and seraphim, seven such and another.
Gave them might in his majesty—the merrier they thought it—
And over his household he made them archangels,
Taught them through the Trinity how Truth may be known,
And to be obedient to his bidding—he bade nothing else.
Lucifer with his legions learned this in Heaven,
And he was the loveliest of light after our Lord

6. I.e., pledges (at baptism).
7. The Middle English phrase is "kynde knowynge."
9. Not Luke, but see I John 4.16 and cf. Psalms 81.6. The phrase "a god by the Gospel" is Langland's; what he means by it will be a recurrent theme.
1. Transgressors: the Latin word appears at Isaiah 53.12.
2. Behind the idea that King David created knighthood probably lies his selection of officers for his army (1 Chronicles 12.18) translated into chivalric terms: like other heroes, he was typically portrayed in the Middle Ages as a chivalric figure, just as God's creation of the angels, below, is pictured in terms of a medieval aristocratic household.
3. I.e., ten orders of heavenly beings: seraphim, cherubim, thrones, dominions, virtues, powers, principalities, archangels, angels, and the nameless order that fell with Lucifer.
Till he broke obedience—his bliss was lost to him
And he fell from that fellowship in a fiend's likeness us
Into a deep dark hell, to dwell there forever,
And more thousands went out with him than any one could count,
Leaping out with Lucifer in loathly shapes,
Because they believed Lucifer who lied in this way:
"I shall set my foot in the north and I shall be like the most high."
And all that hoped it might be so, no Heaven could hold them,
But they fell out in fiend's likeness fully nine days together,
Till God of his goodness granted that Heaven settle,
Become stationary and stable, and stand in quiet.
When these wicked ones went out they fell in wondrous wise,
Some in air, some on earth, some deep in hell,
But Lucifer lies lowest of them all.
For pride that puffed him up his pain has no end.
And all that work with wrong will surely make their way
After their death-day to dwell with that wretch.
But those who wish to work well, as holy words direct,
And who end, as I said earlier, in Truth that is the best
May be certain that their souls will ascend to Heaven
Where Truth is in Trinity, bestowing thrones on all who come.
Therefore I say as I said before, by the sense of these texts
When all treasures are tried, Truth is the best.
Let unlearned men be taught this, for learned men know it,
That Truth is the trustiest treasure on earth.'
"Yet I've no natural knowledge," said I, 'you must teach me more clearly
Through what force faith is formed in my body and where.'
"You doting dolt," said she, 'dull are your wits:
Too little Latin you learned, lad, in your youth.
Alas, I repine for a barren youth was mine.
It's a natural knowledge that's nurtured in your heart
To love your Lord more dearly than you love yourself,
To do no deadly sin though you should die for it.
This I trust is truth: whoever can teach you better,
Look to it that you let him speak, and learn it after.
For thus his word witnesses: do your work accordingly.
For Truth tells us that love is the trustiest medicine in Heaven.
No sin may be seen on him by whom that spice is used.
And all the deeds he pleased to do were done with love.
And he taught it to Moses as a matchless thing, and most like Heaven,
And also the plant of peace, most precious of virtues.
For Heaven might not hold it, so heavy it seemed,
Till it had with earth alloyed itself.
And when it had of this earth taken flesh and blood,
Never was leaf upon linden lighter thereafter,
And portable and piercing as the point of a needle:

4. Cf. Isaiah 14.13-14, which has "throne" (sedem) where Langland has "foot" (pedem).
5. Instinctive or experiential knowledge; Langland's phrase, a recurrent and important one, is "kynde knowynge."
6. Proverbia.
7. i.e., Truth.
8. i.e., love, which, as the passage goes on, becomes embodied in Christ.
No armor might obstruct it, nor any high walls.
Therefore Love is leader of the Lord’s people in Heaven,
And an intermediary as the mayor is between community and king.
Just so Love is a leader by whom the law’s enforced
Upon man for his misdeeds—he measures the fine.
And to know this naturally, it’s nourished by a power
That has its head in the heart, and its high source.
For a natural knowledge in the heart is nourished by a power
That’s let fall by the Father who formed us all,
Looked on us with love and let his son die
Meekly for our misdeeds, to amend us all.
Yet he did not ask harm on those who hurt him so badly,
But with his mouth meekly made a prayer for mercy—
For pity for those people who so painfully killed him.
Here you may see examples in himself alone,
How he was mighty and meek, and bade mercy be granted
To those who hanged him high and pierced his heart.

Love is Life’s doctor, and next our Lord himself,
And also the strait street that goes straight to Heaven.
Therefore I say as I said before, by the sense of these texts,
When all treasures are tried, Truth is the best.
Now that I’ve told you what Truth is—there’s no treasure better—
I may delay no longer now: our Lord look after you.”

From Passus 5
[PIERS PLOWMAN SHOWS THE WAY TO SAINT TRUTH]

Then Hope took hold of a horn of Deus tu conversus vivificabis nos
And blew it with Beati quorum remissae sunt iniquitates,
So that all the saints sang for sinners at once,
“Men and animals thou shalt save inasmuch as thou hast multiplied thy mercy, O God.”

A thousand men then thronged together,
Cried upward to Christ and to his clean mother
To have grace to go to Truth—God grant they might!
But there was no one so wise as to know the way thither,
But they blundered forth like beasts over banks and hills
Till they met a man, many hours later,
Apparelled like a pagan in pilgrims’ manner.
He bore a stout staff with a broad strap around it,
In the way of woodbine wound all about.
A bowl and a bag he bore by his side.

9. I.e., Christ, not the Father as in the sentence before. In such slippery transitions from one subject to another, Langland takes advantage of the greater flexibility of Middle English syntax; and usually, as here, the transition reflects an important connection of ideas, in this case the relationship between God’s action and Christ’s.
1. Next to.
2. I.e., narrow; see Matthew 7.13-14.
3. O God, you will turn and give us life (from the Mass).
4. Blessed [are they] whose transgressions are forgiven (Psalms 32.1).
5. Psalms 36.6-7.
6. I.e., outlandishly. (Langland’s word paynym was especially associated with Saracens, i.e., Arabs.)
A hundred holy water phials were set on his hat,
Souvenirs of Sinai and shells of Galicia,
And many a Cross on his cloak and keys of Rome,
And the vernicle in front so folk should know
By seeing his signs what shrines he’d been to.

These folk asked him fairly from whence he came.
"From Sinai," he said, "and from the Holy Sepulchre.
Bethlehem, Babylon, I've been to both;
In Armenia, in Alexandria, in many other places.
You can tell by the tokens attached to my hat
That I've walked far and wide in wet and in dry
And sought out good saints for my soul's health."

"Did you ever see a saint," said they, "that men call Truth?
Could you point out a path to where that person lives?"
"No, so God save me," said the fellow then.
"I've never known a palmer with knapsack or staff
To ask after him ere now in this place."

"Peter!" said a plowman, and put forth his head.
"We're as closely acquainted as a clerk and his books.
Conscience and Kind Wit coached me to his place
And persuaded me to swear to him I'd serve him forever,
Both to sow and set plants so long as I can work.
I have been his follower all these forty winters,
Both sowed his seed and overseen his cattle,
Indoors and outdoors taken heed for his profit,
Made ditches and dikes, done what he bids.
Sometimes I sow and sometimes I thresh,
In tailor's craft and tinker's, whatever Truth can devise.
I weave wool and wind it and do what Truth says.
For though I say it myself, I serve him to his satisfaction.

I get good pay from him, and now and again more.
He's the promptest payer that poor men know.
He withholds no worker's wages so he's without them by evening.
He's as lowly as a lamb and lovely of speech.
And if you'd like to learn where that lord dwells,
I'll direct you on the road right to his palace."

"Yes, friend Piers," said these pilgrims, and proffered him pay.
"No, by the peril of my soul!" said Piers, and swore on oath:
"I wouldn't take a farthing's fee for Saint Thomas's shrine.
Truth would love me the less a long time after.
But you that are anxious to be off, here's how you go:
You must go through Meekness, both men and women,
Till you come into Conscience that Christ knows the truth
That you love our Lord God of all loves the most,
And next to him your neighbors—in no way harm them,
Otherwise than you’d have them behave to you.
And so follow along a brook’s bank, Be-Modest-Of-Speech,
Until you find a ford, Do-Your-Fathers-Honor;
Honor thy father and thy mother, etc.

Wade in that water and wash yourselves well there
And you’ll leap the lighter all your lifetime.

So you shall see Swear-Not-Unless-It-Is-For-Need-
And-Namely-Never-Take-In-Vain-The-Name-Of-God-Almighty.
Then you’ll come to a croft, but don’t come into it:
The croft is called Covet-Not-Men’s-Cattle-Nor-Their-Wives
And-None-Of-Your-Neighbor’s-Serving-Men-So-As-To-Harm-Them.

See that you break no boughs there unless they belong to you.
Two wooden statues stand there, but don’t stop for them:
They’re called Steal-Not and Slay-Not: stay away from both;
Leave them on your left hand and don’t look back.
And hold well your holiday until the high evening.

Then you shall blench at a barrow, Bear-No-False-Witness:
It’s fenced in with florins and other fees aplenty.
See that you pluck no plant there for peril of your soul.
Then you shall see Speak-The-Truth-So-It-Must-Be-Done-
And-Not-In-Any-Other-Way-Not-For-Any-Man’s-Asking.

Then you shall come to a castle shining clear as the sun.
The moat is made of mercy, all about the manor;
And all the walls are of wit to hold out.
The crenelations are of Christendom to save Christiankind, Buttressed with Believe-So-Or-You-Won’t-Be-Saved;
And all the houses are roofed, halls and chambers,
Not with lead but with Love-And-Lowness-As-Brothers-Of-One-Womb.
The bridge is of Pray-Properly-You-Will-Prosper-The-More.
Every pillar is of penance, of prayers to saints;
The hooks are of almsdeeds that the gates are hanging on.
The gate-keeper’s name is Grace, a good man indeed;
His man is called Amend-Yourself, for he knows many men.
Say this sentence to him: Truth sees what’s true;
I performed the penance the priest gave me to do
And I’m sorry for my sins and shall be so always

When I think thereon, though I were a pope.'
Pray Amend-Yourself mildly to ask his master once
To open wide the wicket-gate that the woman shut
When Adam and Eve ate unroasted apples.

Through Eve it was closed to all and through the Virgin Mary it was opened again.'
For he keeps the latchkey though the king sleep.
And if Grace grants you to go in in this way
You shall see in yourself Truth sitting in your heart
In a chain of charity as though you were a child again,¹
To suffer your sire’s will and say nothing against it.²

"By Christ," cried a pickpocket, "I have no kin there."
"Nor I," said an ape-trainer, "for anything I know."
"God knows," said a cake-seller, "if I were sure of this,
I wouldn’t go a foot further for any friar’s preaching."
"Yes!" said Piers Plowman, and prodded him for his good.

"Mercy is a maiden there that has dominion over them all,
And she is sib to all sinners, and her son as well,
And through the help of these two—think nothing else—
You might get grace there if you go in time.³
"By Saint Paul!" said a pardoner, "possibly I’m not known there;
I’ll go fetch my box with my brevets and a bull with bishop’s letters."
"By Christ!" said a common woman, "I’ll keep you company.
You shall say I am your sister." I don’t know what became of them.

Passus 6

[THE PLOWING OF PIERS’S HALF-ACRE]

"This would be a bewildering way unless we had a guide
Who could trace our way foot by foot": thus these folk complained.
Said Perkin⁴ the Plowman, 'By Saint Peter of Rome!
I have a half-acre to plow by the highway;
If I had plowed this half-acre and afterwards sowed it,
I would walk along with you and show you the way to go.⁵
"That would be a long delay," said a lady in a veil.
"What ought we women to work at meanwhile?"
"Some shall sew sacks to stop the wheat from spilling.
And you lovely ladies, with your long fingers,
See that you have silk and sendal to sew when you've time
Chasubles⁶ for chaplains for the Church’s honor.
Wives and widows, spin wool and flax;
Make cloth, I counsel you, and teach the craft to your daughters.
The needy and the naked, take note how they fare:
Keep them from cold with clothing, for so Truth wishes.
For I shall supply their sustenance unless the soil fails
As long as I live, for the Lord’s love in Heaven.
And all sorts of folk that feed on farm products,
Busily abet him who brings forth your food.⁷
"By Christ!" exclaimed a knight then, "your counsel is the best.
But truly, how to drive a team has never been taught me.
But show me," said the knight, "and I shall study plowing."
"By Saint Paul," said Perkin, "since you proffer help so humbly,

¹ Cf. Mark 10.15: "whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein." This childlike quality is here envisaged as total submissiveness (line 608). "In a chain of charity": either Truth is bound by (that is, constrained by) caritas (love) or Truth is enthroned, adorned with caritas like a chain of office.
² Prostitute. "Brevets": pardoner’s credentials.
³ A nickname for Piers, or Peter.
⁴ Garments worn by priests to celebrate Mass.
⁵ "Sendal": a thin, rich form of silk.
I shall sweat and strain and sow for us both,
And also labor for your love all my lifetime,
In exchange for your championing Holy Church and me
Against wasters and wicked men who would destroy me.
And go hunt hardily hares and foxes,
And have falcons at hand to hunt down the birds
That come to my croft and crop my wheat."
Thoughtfully the knight then spoke these words:
"By my power, Piers, I pledge you my word
To uphold this obligation though I have to fight.
As long as I live I shall look after you."
"Yes, and yet another point," said Piers, "I pray you further:
See that you trouble no tenant unless Truth approves,
And though you may amerce him, let Mercy set the fine,
And Meekness be your master no matter what Meed does."
And treat no bondman badly—you'll be the better for it;
Though here he is your underling, it could happen in Heaven
That he'll be awarded a worthier place, one with more bliss:
"Friend, go up higher."
For in the charnelhouse at church churls are hard to distinguish,
Or a knight from a knave: know this in your heart.
And see that you're true of your tongue, and as for tales—hate them
Unless they have wisdom and wit for your workmen's instruction.
Avoid foul-mouthed fellows and don't be friendly to their stories,
And especially at your repasts shun people like them,
For they tell the Fiend's fables—be very sure of that."
"I assent, by Saint James," said the knight then,
"To work by your word while my life lasts."
"And I shall apparel myself," said Perkin, "in pilgrims' fashion
And walk along the way with you till we find Truth."
He donned his working-dress, some darned, some whole,
His gaiters and his gloves to guard his limbs from cold,
And hung his seed-holder behind his back instead of a knapsack:
"Bring a bushel of bread-wheat for me to put in it,
For I shall sow it myself and set out afterwards
On a pilgrimage as palmers do to procure pardon.
And whoever helps me plow or work in any way
Shall have leave, by our Lord, to glean my land in harvest-time,
And make merry with what he gets, no matter who grumbles.
And all kinds of craftsmen that can live in truth,
I shall provide food for those that faithfully live,
Except for Jack the juggler and Jonette from the brothel,
And Daniel the dice-player and Denot the pimp,
And Friar Faker and folk of his order,
And Robin the ribald for his rotten speech.

5. A small enclosed field.
6. Punish with a fine the amount of which is at the discretion of the judge.
8. A crypt for dead bodies.
Truth told me once and bade me tell it abroad:

"Delentur de libro viventium." I should have no dealings with them,
For Holy Church is under orders to ask no tithes of them.
For let them not be written with the righteous.
Their good luck has left them, the Lord amend them now."

Dame-Work-When-It's-Time-To was Piers's wife's name;
His daughter was called Do-Just-So-Or-Your-Dame-Will-Beat-You;
His son was named Suffer-Your-Sovereigns-To-Have-Their-Will-Condemn-Them-Not-For-If-You-Do-You'II-Pay-A-Dear-Price-
Let-God-Have-His-Way-With-AJI-Things-For-So-His-Word-Teaches.
"For now I am old and hoary and have something of my own,
To penance and to pilgrimage I'll depart with these others;
Therefore I will, before I go away, have my will written:

In Dei nomine, amen, I make this myself.
He shall have my soul that has deserved it best,
And defend it from the Fiend—for so I believe—
Till I come to his accounting, as my Creed teaches me—
To have release and remission I trust in his rent book.
The kirk shall have my corpse and keep my bones,
For of my corn and cattle it craved the tithie:
I paid it promptly for peril of my soul;
It is obligated, I hope, to have me in mind
And commemorate me in its prayers among all Christians.
My wife shall have what I won with truth, and nothing else,
And parcel it out among my friends and my dear children.
For though I die today, my debts are paid;
I took back what I borrowed before I went to bed.'

As for the residue and the remnant, by the Rood of Lucca,
I will worship Truth with it all my lifetime,
And be his pilgrim at the plow for poor men's sake.
My plowstaff shall be my pikestaff and push at the roots
And help my coulter to cut and cleanse the furrows."

Now Perkin and the pilgrims have put themselves to plowing.
Many there helped him to plow his half-acre.
Ditchers and diggers dug up the ridges;
Perkin was pleased by this and praised them warmly.
There were other workmen who worked very hard:
Each man in his manner made himself a laborer,
And some to please Perkin pulled up the weeds.
At high prime Piers let the plow stand
To oversee them himself; whoever worked best
Should be hired afterward, when harvest-time came.

Then some sat down and sang over ale
And helped plow the half-acre with "Ho! trolly-lolly!"
"Now by the peril of my soul!" said Piers in pure wrath,
"Unless you get up again and begin working now,
No grain that grows here will gladden you at need,
And though once off the dole you die let the Devil care!"

Then fakers were afraid and feigned to be blind;
Some set their legs askew as such loafers can
And made their moan to Piers, how they might not work:
"We have no limbs to labor with, Lord, we thank you;
But we pray for you, Piers, and for your plow as well,
That God of his grace make your grain multiply,
And reward you for whatever alms you will give us here,
For we can't strain and sweat, such sickness afflicts us."

"If what you say is so," said Piers, "I'll soon find out.
I know you're ne'er-do-wells, and Truth knows what's right,
And I'm his sworn servant and so should warn him
Which ones they are in this world that do his workmen harm.
You waste what men win with toil and trouble.
But Truth shall teach you how his team should be driven,
Or you'll eat barley bread and use the brook for drink;
Unless you're blind or broken-legged, or bolted with iron—braced
Those shall eat as well as I do, so God help me,
Till God of his goodness gives them strength to arise.
But you could work as Truth wants you to and earn wages and bread
By keeping cows in the field, the corn from the cattle,
Making ditches or dikes or dinging on sheaves,
Or helping make mortar, or spreading muck afield.
You live in lies and lechery and in sloth too,
And it's only for suffrance that vengeance has not fallen on you.
But anchorites and hermits that eat only at noon
And nothing more before the morrow, they shall have my alms,
And buy copes at my cost—those that have cloisters and churches.
But Robert Runabout shall have no rag from me,
Nor 'Apostles' unless they can preach and have the bishop's permission.

They shall have bread and boiled greens and a bit extra besides,
For it's an unreasonable religious life that has no regular meals."

Then Waster waxed angry and wanted to fight;
To Piers the Plowman he proffered his glove.
A Breton, a braggart, he bullied Piers too,
"Whether you're willing or unwilling, we will have our will
With your flour and your flesh, fetch it when we please,
And make merry with it, no matter what you do."

Then Piers the Plowman complained to the knight
To keep him safe, as their covenant was, from cursed rogues,
"And from these wolfish wasters that lay waste the world,
For they waste and win nothing, and there will never be Plenty among the people while my plow stands idle."
Because he was born a courteous man the knight spoke kindly to Waster
And warned him he would have to behave himself better:
'Or you'll pay the penalty at law, I promise, by my order!'
"It's not my way to work," said Waster, "I won't begin now!"
And made light of the law and lighter of the knight,
And said Piers wasn’t worth a pea or his plow either,

170 And menaced him and his men if they met again.

“Now by the peril of my soul!” said Piers, ‘I’ll punish you all.’
And he whooped after Hunger who heard him at once.
“Avenge me on these vagabonds,” said he, “that vex the whole world.”
Then Hunger in haste took hold of Waster by the belly

175 And gripped him so about the guts that his eyes gushed water.
He buffeted the Breton about the cheeks
That he looked like a lantern all his life after.
He beat them both so that he almost broke their guts.
Had not Piers with a pease loaf7 prayed him to leave off

180 They’d have been dead and buried deep, have no doubt about it.
“Let them live,” he said, “and let them feed with hogs,
Or else on beans and bran baked together.”
Fakers for fear fled into barns
And flogged sheaves with flails from morning till evening,

185 So that Hunger wouldn’t be eager to cast his eye on them.
For a potful of peas that Piers had cooked
A heap of hermits laid hands on spades
And cut off their copes and made short coats of them
And went like workmen to weed and to mow,

190 And dug dirt and dung to drive off Hunger.
Blind and bedridden got better by the thousand;
Those who sat to beg silver were soon healed,
For what had been baked for Bayard8 was boon to many hungry,
And many a beggar for beans obediently labored,

195 And every poor man was well pleased to have peas for his wages,
And what Piers prayed them to do they did as sprightly as sparrowhawks.
And Piers was proud of this and put them to work,
And gave them meals and money as they might deserve.

200 Off to his own home and hold there forever.
“I’m well avenged on vagabonds by virtue of you.
But I pray you, before you part,” said Piers to Hunger,
“With beggars and street-beadsmen9 what’s best to be done?
For well I know that once you’re away, they will work badly;

205 Misfortune makes them so meek now,
And it’s for lack of food that these folk obey me.
And they’re my blood brothers, for God bought10 us all.
Truth taught me once to love them every one
And help them with everything after their needs.

210 Now I’d like to learn, if you know, what line I should take
And how I might overmaster them and make them work.”
“Hear now,” said Hunger, “and hold it for wisdom:
Big bold beggars that can earn their bread,
With hounds’ bread and horses’ bread hold up their hearts,

215 And keep their bellies from swelling by stuffing them with beans—

7. The cheapest and coarsest grade of bread, the food of those who cannot get better.
8. Generic name for a horse; a bread made of beans and bran, the coarsest category of bread, was used to feed horses and hounds, but was eaten by people when need was great.
And if they begin to grumble, tell them to get to work,
And they'll have sweeter suppers once they've deserved them.
And if you find any fellow-man that fortune has harmed
Through fire or through false men, befriend him if you can.

And if you find any fellow-man that fortune has harmed
Through fire or through false men, befriend him if you can.

Nature
Bear ye one another's burdens.
And all manner of men that you may find
That are needy or naked and have nothing to spend,
With meals or with money make them the better.
Love them and don't malign them; let God take vengeance.
Though they behave ill, leave it all up to God
Vengeance is mine and I will repay.
And if you want to gratify God, do as the Gospel teaches,
And get yourself loved by lowly men: so you'll unloosen his grace.
Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness.
"I would not grieve God," said Piers, "for all the goods on earth!
Might I do as you say without sin?" said Piers then.
"Yes, I give you my oath," said Hunger, "or else the Bible lies:
Go to Genesis the giant, engenderer of us all!
In sudore and slaving you shall bring forth your food
And labor for your livelihood, and so our Lord commanded.
And Sapience says the same—I saw it in the Bible.
Piger propter frigus would plow no field;
He shall be a beggar and none abate his hunger.
Matthew with man's face mouths these words:
'Entrusted with a talent, servus nequant didn't try to use it,
And earned his master's ill-will for evermore after,
And he took away his talent who was too lazy to work,
And gave it to him in haste that had ten already;
And after he said so that his servants heard it,
He that has shall have, and help when he needs it,
And what he trusts he's entitled to I shall take away.'
Kind Wit wants each one to work,
Either in teaching or tallying or toiling with his hands,
Contemplative life or active life; Christ wants it too.
The Psalter says in the Psalm of Beati omnes,
The fellow that feeds himself with his faithful labor,
He is blessed by the Book in body and in soul.
Yet I pray you," said Piers, "pour charite, if you know for charity
Any modicum of medicine, teach me it, dear sir.

2. Romans 12.19.
4. This puzzling epithet has been explained on the grounds that Genesis is the longest book (except for Psalms) in the Bible and that it recounts the creation of humankind.
5. In the sweat [of thy face shalt thou eat bread] (Genesis 3.19).
6. The sluggard [will not plow] by reason of the cold (Proverbs 20.4).
7. Each of the four Evangelists had his traditional pictorial image, derived partly from the faces of the four creatures in Ezekiel's vision (Ezekiel 1:5—12) and partly from those of the four beasts of the Apocalypse (Revelation 4:7): Matthew was represented as a winged man; Mark, a lion; Luke, a winged ox; and John, an eagle.
8. The wicked servant (Luke 19.22; see 17—27).
9. Blessed are all [who] (Psalms 128.1).
1. Psalms 128.2.
For some of my servants and myself as well
For a whole week do no work, we've such aches in our stomachs."
'I'm certain,' said Hunger, 'what sickness ails you.
You've munched down too much: that's what makes you groan,
But I assure you,' said Hunger, 'if you'd preserve your health,
You must not drink any day before you've dined on something.
Never eat, I urge you, ere Hunger comes upon you
And sends you some of his sauce to add savor to the food;
And keep some till suppertime, and don't sit too long:
Arise up ere Appetite has eaten his fill.
Let not Sir Surfeit sit at your table;
Love him not for he's a lecher whose delight is his tongue,
And for all sorts of seasoned stuff his stomach yearns.
And if you adopt this diet, I dare bet my arms
That Physic for his food will sell his furred hood
And be content, by my troth, to retire from medicine
And learn to labor on the land lest livelihood fail him.
There are fewer physicians than frauds—reform them, Lord!—
Their drinks make men die before destiny ordains.'"
'By Saint Parnel,' said Piers, 'these are profitable words.
This is a lovely lesson; the Lord reward you for it!
Take your way when you will—may things be well with you always!'
'My oath to God!' said Hunger, 'I will not go away
Till I've dined this day and drunk as well.'
'I've no penny,' said Piers, 'to purchase pullets,
And I can't get goose or pork; but I've got two green cheeses,
A few curds and cream and a cake of oatmeal,
A loaf of beans and bran baked for my children.
And yet I say, by my soul, I have no salt bacon
Nor any hen's egg, by Christ, to make ham and eggs,
But scallions aren't scarce, nor parsley, and I've scores of cabbages,
And also a cow and a calf, and a cart-mare
To draw dung to the field while the dry weather lasts.
By this livelihood I must live till Lammass time
When I hope to have harvest in my garden.
Then I can manage a meal that will make you happy.'
All the poor people fetched peasepods;
Beans and baked apples they brought in their skirts,
Chives and chervils and ripe cherries aplenty,
And offered Piers this present to please Hunger with.
Hunger ate this in haste and asked for more.
Then poor folk for fear fed Hunger fast,
Proffering leeks and peas, thinking to appease him.
And now harvest drew near and new grain came to market.
Then poor people were pleased and plied Hunger with the best;
With good ale as Glutton taught they got him to sleep.

2. Of gray fur (a special imported squirrel fur).
3. Who St. Pernelle was is obscure; other manuscripts and editions read "By Saint Paul."
4. The harvest festival, August 1 (the name derived from Old English hlaf, "loaf"), when a loaf made from the first wheat of the season was offered at Mass.
5. Peas in the pod. These, like most foods in the next lines, are early crops.
6. Presumably as the new harvest approaches, merchants who have been holding grain for the highest prices release it for sale, because prices are about to tumble.
Then Waster wouldn't work but wandered about,
And no beggar would eat bread that had beans in it,
But the best bread or the next best, or baked from pure wheat,
Nor drink any half-penny ale in any circumstances,
But of the best and the brownest that barmaids sell.
Laborers that have no land to live on but their hands
Deign not to dine today on last night's cabbage.
No penny-ale can please them, nor any piece of bacon,
But it must be fresh flesh or else fried fish,
And that chaud or plus chaud so it won't chill their bellies.
Unless he's hired at high wages he will otherwise complain;
That he was born to be a workman he'll blame the time.
Against Cato's counsel he commences to murmur:

Remember to bear your burden of poverty patiently. 9
He grows angry at God and grumbles against Reason,
And then curses the king and all the council after Because they legislate laws that punish laboring men. 1
But while Hunger was their master there would none of them complain

Or strive against the statute, 2 so sternly he looked.
But I warn you workmen, earn wages while you may,
For Hunger is hurrying hitherward fast.
With waters he'll awaken Waster's chastisement;
Before five years are fulfilled such famine shall arise.
Through flood and foul weather fruits shall fail,
And so Saturn 3 says and has sent to warn you:
When you see the moon amiss and two monks' heads,
And a maid have the mastery, and multiply by eight,
Then shall Death withdraw and Dearth be justice,

And Daw the diker 5 die for hunger,
Unless God of his goodness grants us a truce.

Passus 7

[PIERS TEARS TRUTH'S PARDON]

Truth heard tell of this and sent word to Piers To take his team and till the earth, And procured him a pardon a poena et a culpa,  6 For him and for his heirs for evermore after;

7. Weak ale diluted with water; in line 309, laborers are too fussy and will no longer accept even penny ale.
8. ‘Hot’ or ‘very hot.’
9. From Cato’s Distichs, a collection of pithy phrases used to teach Latin to beginning students.
1. Like so many governments, late-14th-century England responded to inflation and the bargaining power of the relatively scarce laborers with wage and price freezes, which had their usual lack of effect. One way landowners, desperate to obtain enough laborers, tried to get around the wage laws was by offering food as well as cash.
2. I.e., anti-inflationary legislation.
3. Planet thought to influence the weather, generally perceived as hostile.
4. This cryptic prophecy has never been satisfactorily explained; the basic point is that it is Apocalyptic.
5. A laborer who digs dikes and ditches.
6. This pardon has remained one of the most controversial elements of the poem. ‘From punishment and from guilt’ is a formula indicating an absolute pardon. Strictly speaking, remissions obtained by pilgrimages (and pardons dispensed by pardoners in return for donations) could remit only the punishment for sin; note that even Truth’s pardon does both only for some people. Christ alone, through the Atonement, had the power to absolve repentant sinners from the guilt and delegated it to St. Peter and to the Church through the apostolic succession to be dispensed in the sacrament of confession and in penance. (This pardon also covers, according to another legal formula in the next line, Piers’s heirs, which ordinary pardons could not.) The belief, however, that indulgences (especially those obtained from the Pope himself) absolved guilt as well as punishment was widespread.
And bade him hold at home and plow his land,
And any one who helped him plow or sow,
Or any kind of craft that could help Piers,
Pardon with Piers Plowman Truth has granted.

"Piers," said a priest then, "your pardon must I read,
For I'll explain each paragraph to you and put it in English."
And Piers unfolds the pardon at the priest's prayer,
And I behind them both beheld all the bull.
In two lines it lay, and not a letter more,
And was worded this way in witness of truth:
They that have done good shall go into life everlasting;
And they that have done evil into everlasting fire.

"Peter!" said the priest then, "I can find no pardon here—
Only 'Do well, and have well,' and God will have your soul,
And 'Do evil, and have evil,' and hope nothing else
But that after your death-day the Devil will have your soul."
And Piers for pure wrath pulled it in two
And said, "Though I walk in the midst of the shadow of death
I will fear no evil; for thou art with me."
I shall cease my sowing and not work so hard,
Nor be henceforth so busy about my livelihood.
My plow shall be of penance and of prayers hereafter,
And I'll weep when I should work, though wheat bread fails me.
The prophet ate his portion in penance and sorrow
As the Psalter says, and so did many others.
Who loves God loyally, his livelihood comes easy.
My tears have been my bread day and night.

And unless Luke lies, he finds another lesson for us
In birds that are not busy about their belly-joy:
'Ne solici sitis, he says in the Gospel,
And shows us examples by which to school ourselves.
The fowls in the firmament, who feeds them in winter?
When the frost freezes they forage for food,
"What!" said the priest to Perkin. "Peter, it would seem
You are lettered a little. Who lessoned you in books?"
"Abstinence the abbess taught me my a b c,
And Conscience came after and counseled me better."

"If you were a priest, Piers," said he, "you might preach when you pleased As a doctor of divinity, with Dixit insipiens, as your text."
"Unlearned lout!" said Piers, "you know little of the Bible;
Solomon's sayings are seldom your reading."

The priest and Perkin opposed each other,

7. A document issued by the pope and sealed with his bull, or seal.
8. From the Athanasian Creed, based on Matthew 25.31-46.
9. Psalms 42.3.
11. David, whose Psalm is quoted below:
12. Psalms 42.3.
15. Proverbs 22.10.
And through their words I awoke and looked everywhere about,
And saw the sun set due south at that time.
Meatless and moneyless on Malvern Hills,
Musing on my dream, I walked a mile-way.

From The C-Text

THE DREAMER MEETS CONSCIENCE AND REASON

Thus I awoke, as God's my witness, when I lived in Cornhill, Kit and I in a cottage, clothed like a loller, And little beloved, believe you me, Among lollers of London and illiterate hermits.

For as I came by Conscience I met with Reason, In a hot harvest time when I had my health, And limbs to labor with, and loved good living, And to do no deed but to drink and sleep.

My body sound, my mind sane, a certain one accosted me;
Roaming in remembrance, thus Reason upbraided me:

"Can you serve," he said, "or sing in a church?"
Or cock hay with my hay-makers, or heap it on the cart, Mow it or stack what's mown or make binding for sheaves?

Or have a horn and be a hedge-guard and lie outdoors at night, And keep my corn in my field from cattle and thieves?
Or cut cloth or shoe-leather, or keep sheep and cattle, Mend hedges, or harrow, or herd pigs or geese, Or any other kind of craft that the commons needs.

"So that you might be of benefit to your bread-providers?"
"Certainly!" I said, "and so God help me, I am too weak to work with sickle or with scythe, And too long," believe me, for any low stooping, Or laboring as a laborer to last any while."

"Then have you lands to live by," said Reason, "or relations with money
To provide you with food? For you seem an idle man,
A spendthrift who thrives on spending, and throws time away,
Or else you get what food men give you going door to door, Or beg like a fraud on Fridays' and feastdays in churches.

And that's a loller's life that earns little praise
Where Rightfulness rewards men as they really deserve.

He shall reward every man according to his worlzs.

6. In the C-text, the last of the three versions of Piers Plowman, Langland prefixed to the "Confession of the Seven Deadly Sins" (Passus 5 of the B-text) an apology by the Dreamer, "Long Will," who is at once long (or tall) and long on willing (or, arguably, willful). Although there is no conclusive historical evidence for doing so, readers of Piers Plowman have generally regarded this passage as a source of information about the real author, about whom we otherwise know so little.

7. An area of London associated with vagabonds, seedy clerics, and people at loose ends.

8. Idler, vagabond. The term was eventually applied to the proto-Protestant followers of John Wycliffe. "Kit": refers to "Kit my wife and Calote [i.e. Colette] my daughter." (B-text, 18.426). The Dreamer seems to be someone with clerical training who has received consecration into minor clerical orders (such as that of deacon) but who is not a priest. Lesser clerics could marry, although marriage blocked their further advancement in the church.

9. I.e., tall, perhaps a pun on "willfulness." The Dreamer is called "Long Will" in B-text, 15.152.

10. Fast days, because Christ was crucified on a Friday.

Or are you perhaps lame in your legs or other limbs of your body, or maimed through some misadventure, so that you might be excused?"

"When I was young, many years ago,
35  My father and my friends provided me with schooling,
Till I understood surely what Holy Scripture meant,
And what is best for the body as the Book tells,
And most certain for the soul, if so I may continue.
And, in faith, I never found, since my friends died,
Life that I liked save in these long clothes.
And if I must live by labor and earn my livelihood,
The labor I should live by is the one I learned best.
[Abide] in the same calling wherein you were called.
And so I live in London and upland as well.
The tools that I toil with to sustain myself
45  Are Paternoster and my primer, Placebo and Dirige,
And sometimes my Psalter and my seven Psalms.
These I say for the souls of such as help me.
And those who provide my food vouchsafe, I think,
To welcome me when I come, once a month or so,
Now with him, now with her, and in this way I beg
Without bag or bottle but my belly alone.
And also, moreover, it seems to me, sir Reason,
No clerk should be constrained to do lower-class work.
For by the law of Leviticus that our Lord ordained Clerks with tonsured crowns should, by common understanding,
Neither strain nor sweat nor swear at inquests,
Nor fight in a vanguard and defeat an enemy:
Do not render evil for evil.
For they are heirs of Heaven, all that have the tonsure,
And in choir and in churches they are Christ's ministers.
The Lord is the portion of my inheritance. And elsewhere,
Mercy does not constrain.
60  It is becoming for clerks to perform Christ's service,
And untonsured boys be burdened with bodily labor.
For none should acquire clerk's tonsure unless he claims descent
From franklins and free men and folk properly wedded.
Bondmen and bastards and beggars' children—
These belong to labor; and lords' kin should serve
God and good men as their degree requires,
Some to sing Masses or sit and write,
Read and receive what Reason ought to spend.

3. The long dress of a cleric, not limited to actual priests.
4. 1 Corinthians 7.20, with variations.
6. "I will please [the Lord]" and "Make straight [my way]" (Psalm 116.9 and 5.8, respectively). Placebo and Dirige are the first words of hymns based on two of the seven "penitential" Psalms that were part of the regular order of personal prayer. Paternoster: the Lord's Prayer ("Our father"). The primer was the basic collection of private prayers for laypeople.
7. Leviticus 21 sets restrictions on members of the priesthood.
8. 1 Thessalonians 5.15, with variations.
9. I.e., "mercy is not restricted," source unknown. The quotation above is from Psalm 16.5.
1. Freemen. By this date, the term did not just mean nonserfs but designated landowners who were becoming members of the gentry class yet were not knights. The distinction Langland seems to make in this line between franklins and freemen may reflect the rising status of certain families of "freedmen," the original meaning of the word franklins.
But since bondmen's boys have been made bishops,
And bastards' boys have been archdeacons,
And shoemakers and their sons have through silver become knights,
And lords' sons their laborers whose lands are mortgaged to them—
And thus for the right of this realm they ride against our enemies
To the comfort of the commons and to the king's honor—
And monks and nuns on whom mendicants must depend
Have had their kin named knights and bought knight's-fees,\(^2\)
And popes and patrons have shunned poor gentle blood
And taken the sons of Simon Magus\(^3\) to keep the sanctuary, Life-holiness and love have gone a long way hence,
And will be so till this is all worn out or otherwise changed.
Therefore proffer me no reproach, Reason, I pray you,
For in my conscience I conceive what Christ wants me to do.
Prayers of a perfect man and appropriate penance
Are the labor that our Lord loves most of all.

"Non de solo," I said, "forsooth vivit homo,
Nec in pane et in pahulo;\(^4\) the Paternoster witnesses
Fiat voluntas Dei—\(^5\) that provides us with everything."
Said Conscience, "By Christ, I can't see that this lies;\(^6\) is pertinent
But it seems no serious perfectness to be a city-beggar, Unless you're licensed to collect for prior or monastery."
"That is so," I said, "and so I admit
That at times I've lost time and at times misspent it;
And yet I hope, like him who has often bargained
And always lost and lost, and at the last it happened
He bought such a bargain he was the better ever,
That all his loss looked paltry in the long run,
Such a winning was his through what grace decreed.

\(\text{The kingdom of Heaven is like unto treasure hidden in a field.}\)
\(\text{The woman who found the piece of silver, etc.}\)\(^6\)
So I hope to have of him that is almighty
A gobbet of his grace, and begin a time
That all times of my time shall turn into profit."
"And I counsel you," said Reason, "quickly to begin
The life that is laudable and reliable for the soul."
"Yes, and continue," said Conscience, and I came to the church.\(^7\)

2. The estate a knight held from his overlord in return for military service was called his "fee."
3. Priests who obtained office through bribery or "simony," a term derived from Simon Magus, a magician who offered the apostles money for their power to perform miracles through the Holy Spirit (see Acts 8).
4. "Not solely [by bread] doth man live, neither by breed nor by food"; the verse continues, "but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God": Matthew 4.4, with variations; cf. Deuteronomy 8.3.
5. "God's will be done." The Lord's Prayer reads, "Thy will be done" (Matthew 6.10).
6. Matthew 13.44, Luke 15.9-10. Both passages come from parables that compare finding the kingdom of heaven to risking everything you have to get the one thing that matters most.
7. The four lines that follow this passage connect it to the beginning of the second dream (B-text, 5):
   "And to the church I set off, to honor God; before the Cross, on my knees, I beat my breast, sighing for my sins, saying my Paternoster, weeping and wailing until I fell asleep."
CHRIST'S HUMANITY

The literary and visual representation of the godhead is necessarily, in any religion, a powerful index of religious culture. In some religions, indeed, visual representation of God is such a sensitive issue that it is forbidden altogether. Christian culture has experienced moments of severe hostility to visual representation (for example, in the Reformation period of the sixteenth century), but has, in general, permitted images of God (and especially of God-become-man, Christ). In the later Middle Ages in Europe the bodily representation of Christ became a central preoccupation for writers, readers, and visual artists.

In the late eleventh century St. Anselm of Canterbury (1033—1099) developed a new conception of the Atonement ("at-one-ment"), the act whereby humans are reconciled with God after the separation caused by Original Sin. An earlier theory had posited that the Atonement was the solution to a dispute between God and the Devil concerning property rights over Mankind. In his tract Why Did Christ Become Man? Anselm argued instead that the real center of the Atonement was Mankind's moral responsibility to pay God back. Humanity needed to repay God for the sin committed, but was unable to do so. Faced with this impasse, God could either simply abolish the debt, or else become human, in order to repay Himself, as it were. God chose this latter route, allowing Christ to suffer and die as a human in order to clear the debt.

Earlier representations of the Crucifixion had tended to place the accent on Christ as impassive King, standing erect on the Cross, come to claim His property of mankind. In the Dream of the Rood (see pp. 27—29), for example, Christ's suffering is for the most part absorbed by the Cross itself, while Christ is represented as a conquering, royal hero. Later medieval representations of Christ, by contrast, accentuate the suffering, sagging, lacerated body of a very human God. In this newly conceived theology, Christ's suffering humanity takes center stage. The artistic significance of this massively influential development was itself massive. Certainly the older tradition survived in vital form: compare, for example, the triumphalist lyric "What is He, this Lordling, that Cometh from the Fight?" with the quiet suffering of "Ye that Pasen by the Weye." Langland's Christ, too, comes to claim his property as a conquering hero. It was, nonetheless, the tradition of Christ suffering in His humanity that dominated literary and visual art from the thirteenth century until the Reformation initiated in 1517.

These theological developments had forceful artistic and stylistic consequences. Because the theology was best expressed through visual or verbal images, it fed readily into both painting and a highly pictorial literature. In both painting and literature, a humble style, focusing on the particularities of bodily pain and grief, became the bearer of high theological significance. The painting of Giotto (1266?—1337), for example, broke with a prior tradition of painting that represented an elegant Christ against a splendid gold background; Giotto's inelegant and crucified Christ suffers under the pull of his own weight. Spiritual experience was, in the first instance, something seen more than something thought. It was also a spirituality rooted in the dramatic present: as one saw Christ, one saw Him in the here and now. Thus works in this almost cinematic mode foreshorten historical and geographical distance: such texts encourage readers, that is, to imagine that they are physically and emotionally present at the crucial scenes of Christ's life. In some examples of the tradition, viewers are encouraged to imagine those around Christ (especially Romans and Jews) as wholly responsible for the infliction of pain; in others, viewers are made to realize that they are themselves responsible for the continued suffering of Christ.

As deployed by the Church, this movement discouraged abstract thought. It did nevertheless have the effect of widening access to spiritual experience, and, in ways unforeseen by official sponsors of such piety, could be the springboard for very sophisticated theology. As the Church attempted to deepen the spiritual literacy of its members from the late twelfth century, emphasis on Christ's humanity in art and literature opened powerful spiritual experience to a much wider audience of readers and viewers. To engage in this spirituality, a public did not need to be versed in detailed matters of doctrine. Instead, a reader or viewer had to develop the capacity for sympathetic response to physical suffering. Such spirituality gained official impetus through the foundation of the Franciscan order of friars (1223), who promoted earthly poverty in imitation of, and emotional response to, Christ's sufferings. The centrality of Christ's living presence in the liturgy was, furthermore, reaffirmed and extended with the establishment, throughout Christendom, of the Feast of Corpus Christi (the Feast of the Body of Christ), first proclaimed by the pope in 1264 and again in 1311. This feast celebrated the Eucharistic host, or wafer, as Christ's body. It grew steadily in popularity and came to involve outdoor processions depicting the biblical foreshadowings of the Eucharist, as a prelude to display of the Eucharist itself. In some medieval English cities this was the day also chosen for the performance of cycle plays, sometimes known as the plays of Corpus Christi.

Female readers in particular, who had been excluded from the Latin-based, textual traditions of theology, discovered fertile ground in this tradition of so-called "affective," or emotional, piety. Through such emotive imagining, one gained an apparently unmediated, and potentially authoritative, relation with Christ. Women working in this tradition did not necessarily remain, however, within its visual, imaginative terms: Julian of Norwich is, for example, capable of developing very subtle and abstract thought, holding the incarnate image in view all the while.

This powerfully emotional piety also provoked wider social applications of the Christian narrative. Whereas "The Parable of the Christ Knight" in the Ancrene Riwle (see pp. 161—62) presents a suffering Christ as an aristocratic lover for a very select spiritual elite of women, the Christ of Margery Kempe is very much the 'homely' husband of a bourgeois woman (see in particular Book I, Chapter 36). On a much larger scale, the mystery plays mark the moment in which urban institutions represent Christ for themselves. In this drama, both Old and New Testament narrative is inflected by the trials of domestic and urban experience (on the origins, civic sponsorship, and production of these plays, see the introduction to "Mystery Plays," p. 406).

WILLIAM LANGLAND

For full information about William Langland, see the headnote on pages 331—33. The following passage (Passus 18 of Piers Plowman) both completes the selections from Langland and serves as the first text of "Christ's Humanity."

Passus 18 describes the central event of Christianity, the Crucifixion, followed by an account of Christ's descent into hell, traditionally called the 'Harrowing of Hell.' The Dreamer has come a long way in his personal search for truth, and this vision is the most immediate and fulfilling answer to the questions he addressed to Holy Church, although not a final answer, for in Langland's poem the search has no end in this life. Piers, who had assumed aspects of Adam, Moses, and the Good Samaritan (while never ceasing to be the ideal plowman), is now partially identified with Christ. The terms of this identification are rooted in material necessity of food: Christ has come to fetch the 'fruit' of Piers Plowman (lines 31 and 34). The 'food' that Christ seeks has now become the souls of the patriarchs and prophets, and of all mankind, which must be redeemed from the devil's power. And just as the earthly Piers becomes Christ-like, so too does Christ, in His bodily manifestation, become intensely human. He jousts in the arms (i.e., no arms at all, but the unprotected flesh) of Piers Plowman.
(line 24); He comes to earth precisely in order to know what being human is like (lines 229—32); and He does so precisely because of his co-natural, sympathetic kinship with suffering humanity (lines 408—10).

For all that, Langland does not focus here for long on the grievous suffering of Christ. On the contrary, he addresses the terms of the Atonement through intellectual debate, first through the Four Daughters of God (personifications taken from Psalm 85.10), and then through Christ's direct encounter with Lucifer. Against powerful legal and written evidence to the contrary, first Mercy and Peace and then Christ Himself reveal a divine curiosity and sympathy with imprisoned humanity. This mercy is anterior to, and more powerful than, the law of strict Truthe or justice, by which mankind appears to have been irredeemably damned. So far from being a wounded, suffering Christ, Langland's Christ is at once spiritually triumphant and a delighted trickster, by whose divine guile the devil has been fooled.

The Vision of Piers Plowman
Passus 18

[THE CRUCIFIXION AND HARROWING OF HELL]

Wool-chafed1 and wet-shoed I went forth after
Like a careless creature unconscious of woe,
And trudged forth like a tramp, all the time of my life,
Till I grew weary of the world and wished to sleep again,

And lay down till Lent, and slept a long time.

Rested there, snoring roundly, till Ramis-Palmarum.2

I dreamed chiefly of children and cheers of "Gloria, laus!"
And how old folk to an organ sang "Hosanna!"

One resembling the Samaritan3 and somewhat Piers the Plowman
Barefoot on an ass's back bootless came riding
Without spurs or spear: sprightly was his look,
As is the nature of a knight that draws near to be dubbed,

To get himself gilt spurs and engraved jousting shoes.

Then was Faith watching from a window and cried, "A, fili David!"

As does a herald of arms when armed men come to joust.

Old Jews of Jerusalem joyfully sang,

"Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."
And I asked Faith to reveal what all this affair meant,
And who was to joust in Jerusalem. "Jesus," he said,

"And fetch what the Fiend claims, the fruit of Piers the Plowman."

"Is Piers in this place?" said I; and he pierced me with his look:

This Jesus for his gentleness will joust in Piers's arms,
In his helmet and in his hauberk, humana natura,4

So that Christ be not disclosed here as consummatus Deus.5

1. Scratchy wool was worn next to the body as an act of penance.
2. Palm Sunday (literally, "branches of palms"): the background of this part of the poem is the biblical account of Christ's entry into Jerusalem on this day, when the crowds greeted him crying, "Hosanna (line 8) to the son of David (line 15): Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord (line 17a); Hosanna in the highest" (see Matthew 21.9). "Gloria, laus" (line 7) are the first words of an anthem, "Glory, praise, and honor," that was sung by children in medieval religious processions on Palm Sunday.
3. In the previous vision, the Dreamer has encountered Abraham, or Faith (mentioned in lines 15, 18, 28, and 92); Moses, or Hope; and the Good Samaritan, or Charity, who was riding toward a 'jousting in Jerusalem' and who now appears as an aspect of Christ.
4. Human nature, which Christ assumed in order to redeem humanity. "Hauberk": coat of mail.
5. The perfect (three-personed) God.
25 In the plate armor of Piers the Plowman this jouster will ride, For no dint will do him injury as in deitate Patris.
"Who shall joust with Jesus," said I, "Jews or Scribes?"
"No," said Faith, "but the Fiend and False-Doom°-To-Die.
Death says he will undo and drag down low
All that live or look upon land or water.
Life says that he lies, and lays his life in pledge
That for all that Death can do, within three days he'll walk
And fetch from the Fiend the fruit of Piers the Plowman,
And place it where he pleases, and put Lucifer in bonds,
And beat and bring down burning death forever.
O death, I will be thy death.
Then Pilate came with many people, sedens pro trihunali,
To see how doughtily Death should do, and judge the rights of both.
The Jews and the justice were joined against Jesus,
And all the court cried upon him, "Crucifigel!" loud.
Then a plaintiff appeared before Pilate and said,
"This Jesus made jokes about Jerusalem's temple,
To have it down in one day and in three days after Put it up again all new—here he stands who said it—
And yet build it every bit as big in all dimensions,
As long and as broad both, above and below."
"CruciJige!" said a sergeant, 'he knows sorcerer's tricks."
"Tolle! tolle!" said another, and took sharp thorns
And began to make a garland out of green thorn,
And set it sorely on his head and spoke in hatred.
"Ave, Rabbi," said that wretch, and shot reeds° at him;
They nailed him with three nails naked on a Cross,
And with a pole put a potion up to his lips
And bade him drink to delay his death and lengthen his days,
And said, 'If you're subtle, let's see you help yourself.
If you are Christ and a king's son, come down from the Cross!
Then we'll believe that Life loves you and will not let you die.'
"Consummatum est,"° said Christ and started to swoon, Piteously and pale like a prisoner dying.
The Lord of Life and of Light then laid his eyelids together.
The day withdrew for dread and darkness covered the sun;
And spoke of why that storm lasted so long:
"For a bitter battle,' the dead body said;
-Life and Death in this darkness, one destroys the other.
No one will surely know which shall have the victory
Before Sunday about sunrise"; and sank with that to earth.
Some said that he was God's son that died so fairly:
Truly this was the Son of God.
And some said he was a sorcerer: "We should see first

6. In the godhead of the Father: as God, Christ could not suffer but as man, he could.
7. People who made a very strict, literal interpretation of the Old Law and hence rejected Christ's teaching of the New.
3. Arrows, probably small ones intended to hurt rather than to kill. "Ave, Rabbi": "Hail, master" (Matthew 26.49): these are actually Judas's words when he kissed Christ in order to identify him to the arresting officers.
4. It is finished (John 19.30).
5. Matthew 27.54.
Whether he's dead or not dead before we dare take him down.'
Two thieves were there that suffered death that time
Upon crosses beside Christ; such was the common law.
A constable came forth and cracked both their legs
And the arms afterward of each of those thieves.

But no bastard was so bold as to touch God's body there;
Because he was a knight and a king's son, Nature decreed that time
That no knave should have the hardiness to lay hand on him.
Named Longeus as the legend tells, who had long since lost his sight;
Before Pilate and the other people in that place he waited on his horse.
For all that he might demur, he was made that time
To joust with Jesus, that blind Jew Longeus.
For all who watched there were unwilling, whether mounted or afoot,
To touch him or tamper with him or take him down from the Cross,
Except this blind bachelor that bore him through the heart.
The blood sprang down the spear and unsparred his eyes.
The knight knelt down on his knees and begged Jesus for mercy.
"It was against my will, Lord, to wound you so sorely."
He sighed and said, "Sorely I repent it.
For what I here have done, I ask only your grace.
Have mercy on me, rightful Jesu!" and thus lamenting wept.

Then Faith began fiercely to scorn the false Jews,
Called them cowards, accursed forever.
"For this foul villainy, may vengeance fall on you!
To make the blind beat the dead, it was a bully's thought.
Cursed cowards, no kind of knighthood was it
To beat a dead body with any bright weapon.
Yet he's won the victory in the fight for all his vast wound,
For your champion jouster, the chief knight of you all,
Weeping admits himself worsted and at the will of Jesus.
For when this darkness is done, Death will be vanquished,
And you louts have lost, for Life shall have the victory;
And your unfettered freedom has fallen into servitude;
And you churls and your children shall achieve no prosperity,
Nor have lordship over land or have land to till,
But be all barren and live by usury,
Which is a life that every law of our Lord curses.
Now your good days are done as Daniel prophesied;
When Christ came their kingdom's crown should be lost:
When the Holy of Holies comes your anointing shall cease."
I withdrew in that darkness to Descendit-ad-Inferna.

6. Longeus (usually Longinus) appears in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, which provided Langland with the material for much of his account of Christ's despoiling of hell.
7. Opened; in the original there is a play on words with "spear." "Bachelor" knight.
8. The references in this passage (lines 92—110) and in lines 258—60 appear to reflect a blind anti-Semitism all too prevalent in late-medieval art and literature, brought out especially in portrayals of the Passion. Elsewhere Langland exhibits a more enlightened attitude—for instance, in a passage in which he holds up Jewish charity as an example to Christians. In the present passage he may intend a distinction between those who betrayed and condemned Jesus and the "old Jews of Jerusalem" who welcomed him in the Palm Sunday procession (lines 7-17).
1. He descended into hell (from the Apostles' Creed).
And there I saw surely Secundum Scripturas\textsuperscript{2}
Where out of the west a wench,\textsuperscript{3} as I thought, Came walking on the way—she looked toward hell.
i5 Mercy was that maid's name, a meek thing withal,
A most gracious girl, and goodly of speech.
Her sister as it seemed came softly walking
Out of the east, opposite, and she looked westward,
A comely creature and cleanly: Truth was her name.

Because of the virtue that followed her, she was afraid of nothing.
When these maidens met, Mercy and Truth,
Each of them asked the other about this great wonder,
And of the din and of the darkness, and how the day lowered,
And what a gleam and a glint glowed before hell.

"I marvel at this matter, by my faith," said Truth,
"And am coming to discover what this queer affair means."
"Do not marvel," said Mercy, "it means only mirth.
A maiden named Mary, and mother without touching
By any kind of creature, conceived through speech
With no blemish to her woman's body brought him into this world.
And that my tale is true, I take God to witness,
Since this baby was born it has been thirty winters,
Who died and suffered death this day about midday.

And that is the cause of this eclipse that is closing off the sun,
In meaning that man shall be removed from darkness
While this gleam and this glow go to blind Lucifer.
For patriarchs and prophets have preached of this often
That man shall save man through a maiden's help,
And what a tree took away a tree shall restore,\textsuperscript{4}
And what Death brought down a death shall raise up."
"What you're telling," said Truth, "is just a tale of nonsense.
For Adam and Eve and Abraham and the rest,
Patriarchs and prophets imprisoned in pain,
Never believe that yonder light will lift them up,
Or have them out of hell—hold your tongue, Mercy!
Your talk is mere trifling. I, Truth, know the truth,
For whatever is once in hell, it comes out never.
Job the perfect patriarch disproves what you say:
\textit{Since in hell there is no redemption.}\textsuperscript{5}

Then Mercy most mildly uttered these words:
'From observation,' she said, "I suppose they shall be saved,
Because venom destroys venom, and in that I find evidence
That Adam and Eve shall have relief.
For of all venoms the foulest is the scorpion's:
No medicine may amend the place where it stings
Till it's dead and placed upon it—the poison is destroyed,
The first effect of the venom, through the virtue it possesses.
So shall this death destroy—I dare bet my life—

\textsuperscript{2} According to the Scriptures.
\textsuperscript{3} The word is Langland's and had much the same connotations in his time as it has in ours.
\textsuperscript{4} The first tree bore the fruit that Adam and Eve ate, thereby damning humankind; the second tree is the cross on which Christ was crucified, thereby redeeming humankind.
\textsuperscript{5} Cf. Job 7.9.
All that Death did first through the Devil’s tempting.

And just as the beguiler with guile beguiled man first,
So shall grace that began everything make a good end
And beguile the beguiler—and that’s a good trick:

“A trick by which to trick trickery.”

“Now let’s be silent,” said Truth. “It seems to me I see
Out of the nip of the north, not far from here,

Righteousness come running—let’s wait right here,
For she knows far more than we—she was here before us both.’

“That is so,” said Mercy, ‘and I see here to the south
Where Peace clothed in patience comes sportively this way.
Love has desired her long: I believe surely

That Love has sent her some letter, what this light means
That hangs over hell thus: she will tell us what it means.”
When Peace clothed in patience approached near them both, Righteousness did her reverence for her rich clothing
And prayed Peace to tell her to what place she was going,

And whom she was going to greet in her gay garments.

“My wish is to take my way,” said she, “and welcome them all Whom many a day I might not see for murk of sin.
Adam and Eve and the many others in hell,
Moses and many more will merrily sing,

And I shall dance to their song: sister, do the same.

Because Jesus jousted well, joy begins to dawn.

Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.”

Love who is my lover sent letters to tell me
That my sister Mercy and I shall save mankind,
And that God has forgiven and granted me, Peace, and Mercy

To make bail for mankind for evermore after.
Look, here’s the patent,” said Peace: “In pace in idipsum:
And that this deed shall endure, dormiam et requiescam.

Do you believe that yonder light might unlock hell
And save man’s soul? Sister, don’t suppose it.
At the beginning God gave the judgment himself
That Adam and Eve and all that followed them Should die downright and dwell in torment after
If they touched a tree and ate the tree’s fruit.

Adam afterwards against his forbidding Fed on that fruit and forsook as it were
The love of our Lord and his lore too,
And followed what the Fiend taught and his flesh’s will Against Reason. I, Righteousness, record this with Truth,

That their pain should be perpetual and no prayer should help them,
Therefore let them chew as they chose, and let us not chide, sisters,

6. From a medieval Latin hymn.
7. The word is Langland’s and the sense obscure; it probably meant “coldness” to him, although an Old English word similar to nip meant “gloom.”
8. What Langland envisioned clothes of patience to look like, aside from their “richness” (line 173), it is impossible to say; to him any abstraction could become a concrete allegory without visual identification.
1.
For it's misery without amendment, the morsel they ate."
"And I shall prove," said Peace, "that their pain must end,
And in time trouble must turn into well-being;

"For had they known no woe, they'd not have known well-being:
For no one knows what well-being is who was never in woe,
Nor what is hot hunger who has never lacked food.
If there were no night, no man, I believe,
Could be really well aware of what day means.

Never should a really rich man who lives in rest and ease
Know what woe is if it weren't for natural death.
So God, who began everything, of his good will Became man by a maid for mankind's salvation
And allowed himself to be sold to see the sorrow of dying.

And that cures all care and is the first cause of rest,
For until we meet "modicum," may well avow it,
No man knows, I suppose, what 'enough' means.
Therefore God of his goodness gave the first man Adam
A place of supreme ease and of perfect joy,

And then he suffered him to sin so that he might know sorrow,
And thus know what well-being is—to be aware of it naturally.
And afterward God offered himself, and took Adam's nature,
To see what he had suffered in three separate places,
Both in Heaven and on earth, and now he heads for hell,

To learn what all woe is like who has learned of all joy.
So it shall fare with these folk: their folly and their sin
Shall show them what sickness is—and succor from all pain.
No one knows what war is where peace prevails,
Nor what is true well-being till 'Woe, alas!' teaches him."

Then was there a wight with two broad eyes:
Book was that beaupere's name, a bold man of speech.
"By God's body," said this Book, "I will bear witness
That when this baby was born there blazed a star
So that all the wise men in the world agreed with one opinion.

That such a baby was born in Bethlehem city
Who should save man's soul and destroy sin.
And all the elements," said the Book, "hereof bore witness.
The sky first revealed that he was God who formed all things:
The hosts in Heaven took Stella comata 3
And tended her like a torch to reverence his birth.
The light followed the Lord into the low earth.
The water witnessed that he was God when he walked on it;
Peter the Apostle perceived his walking
And as he went on the water knew him well and said,
'Bid me come unto thee on the water."

And lo, how the sun locked her light in herself
When she saw him suffer that made sun and sea.
The earth for heavy heart because he would suffer
Quaked like a quick 0 thing and the rock cracked all to pieces.

3. Hairy star, i.e., comet.
Lo, hell might not hold, but opened when God suffered,
And let out Simeon’s sons⁵ to see him hang on Cross.
And now shall Lucifer believe it, loath though he is,
For Jesus like a giant with an engine⁶ comes yonder
To break and beat down all that may be against him,
And to have out of hell every one he pleases.
And I, Book, will be burnt unless Jesus rises to life
In all the mights of a man and brings his mother joy,
And comforts all his kin, and takes their cares away,
And all the joy of the Jews disjoins and disperses;
And unless they reverence his Rood and his resurrection
And believe on a new law be lost body and soul."
"Let’s be silent," said Truth, "I hear and see both
A spirit speaks to hell and bids the portals be opened."
Lift up your gates.⁷
A voice loud in that light cried to Lucifer,
"Princes of this place, unpin and unlock,
For he comes here with crown who is King of Glory."
Then Satan⁸ sighed and said to hell,
"Without our leave such a light fetched Lazarus away:⁹
Care and calamity have come upon us all.
If this King comes in he will carry off mankind
Patriarchs and prophets have long prated of this,
That such a lord and a light should lead them all hence."
"Listen," said Lucifer, "for this lord is one I know;
Both this lord and this light, it’s long ago I knew him.
No death may do this lord harm, nor any devil’s trickery,
And his way is where he wishes—but let him beware of the perils.
If he bereaves me of my right he robs me by force.
For by right and by reason the race that is here
Body and soul belongs to me, both good and evil.
For he himself said it who is Sire of Heaven,
If Adam ate the apple, all should die
And dwell with us devils: the Lord laid down that threat.
And since who is Truth himself said these words,
And since I’ve possessed them seven thousand winters,
I don’t believe law will allow him the least of them."
"That is so," said Satan, "but I’m sore afraid
Because you took them by trickery and trespassed in his garden,
And in the semblance of a serpent sat upon the apple tree
5. Simeon, who was present at the presentation of the infant Jesus in the temple, had been told by the Holy Ghost that "he should not see death" before he had seen 'the Lord’s Christ' (Luke 2.26).
The Apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus echoes the incident in reporting that Simeon’s sons were raised from death at the time of Jesus’s crucifixion.
6. A device, probably thought of as a gigantic sling-shot, although, of course, Christ needs nothing to break down his enemies but his own authority.
7. The first words of Psalm 24.9, which reads in the Latin version, "Lift up your gates, O princes, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in."
8. Langland, following a tradition also reflected in Milton’s Paradise Lost, pictures hell as populated by a number of devils: Satan; Lucifer (line 273 ff.), who began the war in heaven and tempted Eve;
Goblin (line 293); Belial (line 321); and Asztoreth (line 404). Lucifer the rebel angel naturally became identified with Satan, a word that in the Old Testament had originally meant an evil adversary; many of the other devils are displaced gods of pagan religions.
9. For Christ’s raising of Lazarus from the dead,
cf. John 11.
And egged them to eat, Eve by herself,
And told her a tale with treasonous words;
And so you had them out, and hither at the last."
"It's an ill-gotten gain where guile is at the root,
For God will not be beguiled," said Goblin, "nor tricked.
We have no true title to them, for it was by treason they were damned."

"Certainly I fear," said the Fiend, 1 "lest Truth fetch them out.
These thirty winters, as I think, he's gone here and there and preached.
I've assailed him with sin, and sometimes asked Whether he was God or God's son: he gave me short answer.
And thus he's traveled about like a true man these two and thirty winters.

And when I saw it was so, while she slept I went
To warn Pilate's wife what sort of man was Jesus, 2
For some hated him and have put him to death.
I would have lengthened his life, for I believed if he died
That his soul would suffer no sin in his sight.

For the body, while it walked on its bones, was busy always
To save men from sin if they themselves wished.
And now I see where a soul comes descending hitherward
With glory and with great light; God it is, I'm sure.
My advice is we all flee," said the Fiend, "fast away from here.

For we had better not be at all than abide in his sight.
For your lies, Lucifer, we've lost all our prey.
Through you we fell first from Heaven so high:
Because we believed your lies we all leapt out.
And now for your latest lie we have lost Adam,

And all our lordship, I believe, on land and in hell."

Now shall the prince of this world he cast out.

Again the light bade them unlock, and Lucifer answered,
"Who is that?"
What lord are you?" said Lucifer. The light at once replied,
"The King of Glory.
The Lord of might and of main and all manner of powers:
The Lord of Powers.
Dukes of this dim place, at once undo these gates
That Christ may come in, the Heaven-King's son.

And with that breath hell broke along with Belial's bars;
For any warrior or watchman the gates wide opened.

Sang Saint John's song, Ecce agnus Dei." 6

1. Here and in line 309 "the Fiend" is presumably Lucifer's most articulate critic, Satan, whom Christ names as his tempter in Matthew 4.10.
2. In Matthew 27.19 Pilate's wife warns Pilate to "have nothing to do with that just man [Jesus]," for she has been troubled by a dream about him. Langland has the Fiend admit to having caused the dream so that Pilate's wife should persuade her husband not to harm Jesus and thus keep him safe on earth and not come to visit hell and despoil it.
3. John 12.31. "Prince of this world" is a title for the devil.
4. This and the next two phrases translated from the Latin are from Psalm 24.8, following immediately on the words quoted in line 262a.
5. "People in darkness," the phrase is from Matthew 4.16, citing Isaiah 9.2, "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light."
Lucifer could not look, the light so blinded him.
And those that the Lord loved his light caught away,
And he said to Satan, "Lo, here's my soul in payment
For all sinful souls, to save those that are worthy.
Mine they are and of me—I may the better claim them.

Although Reason records, and right of myself,
That if they ate the apple all should die,
I did not hold out to them hell here forever.
For the deed that they did, your deceit caused it;
You got them with guile against all reason.

For in my palace Paradise, in the person of an adder,
You stole by stealth something I loved.
Thus like a lizard with a lady's face
Falsey you filched from me; the Old Law confirms That guilers be beguiled, and that is good logic:
A tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye.

Ergo soul shall requite soul and sin revert to sin,
And all that man has done amiss, I, man, will amend.
Member for member was amends in the Old Law,
And life for life also, and by that law I claim
Adam and all his issue at my will hereafter.

And what Death destroyed in them, my death shall restore
And both quicken and requite what was quenched through sin.
And that grace destroy guile is what good faith requires.
So don't believe it, Lucifer, against the law I fetch them,
But by right and by reason here ransom my liegemen.
I have not come to destroy the law but to fulfill it.

You fetched mine in my place unmindful of all reason
Falsely and feloniously; good faith taught me
To recover them by reason and rely on nothing else.
So what you got with guile through grace is won back.
You, Lucifer, in likeness of a loathsome adder
Got by guile those whom God loved;
And I, in likeness of a mortal man, who am master of Heaven,
Have graciously requited your guile: let guile go against guile!
And as Adam and all died through a tree
Adam and all through a tree return to life,

And guile is beguiled and grief has come to his guile:
And he is fallen into the ditch which he made.
And now your guile begins to turn against you,
And my grace to grow ever greater and wider.
The bitterness that you have brewed, imbibe it yourself
Who are doctor of death, the drink you made.

For I who am Lord of Life, love is my drink
And for that drink today I died upon earth.

7. In medieval art the devil tempting Eve was sometimes represented as a snake (see the "serpent" of line 240) and sometimes as a lizard with a female human face and standing upright.
9. Therefore. The Latin conjunction was used in formal debate to introduce the conclusion derived from a number of propositions.
I struggled so I’m thirsty still for man’s soul’s sake.
No drink may moisten me or slake my thirst
Till vintage time befall in the Vale of Jehoshaphat,
When I shall drink really ripe wine, Resurrectio mortuorum.
And then I shall come as a king crowned with angels
And have out of hell all men’s souls.
Fiends and fiendkins shall stand before me
And be at my bidding, where best it pleases me.

But to be merciful to man then, my nature requires it.
For we are brothers of one blood, but not in baptism all.
And all that are both in blood and in baptism my whole brothers
Shall not be damned to the death that endures without end.

It is not the custom on earth to hang a felon
Oftener than once, even though he were a traitor.
And if the king of the kingdom comes at that time
When a felon should suffer death or other such punishment,
Law would he give him life if he looks upon him.
And I who am King of Kings shall come in such a time
Where doom to death damns all wicked,
And if law wills I look on them, it lies in my grace
Whether they die or do not die because they did evil.
And if it be any bit paid for, the boldness of their sins,
I may grant mercy through my righteousness and all my true words;
And though Holy Writ wills that I wreak vengeance on those that wrought evil,
No evil unpunished, etc.
They shall be cleansed and made clear and cured of their sins,
In my prison purgatory till Parce! says ‘Stop!’
And my mercy shall be shown to many of my half-brothers,
For blood-kin may see blood-kin both hungry and cold,
But blood-kin may not see blood-kin bleed without his pity:
I heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter.
But my righteousness and right shall rule all hell
And mercy rule all mankind before me in Heaven.
For I’d be an unkind king unless I gave my kin help,
And particularly at such a time when help was truly needed.

Thus by law,” said our Lord, “I will lead from here
Those I looked on with love who believed in my coming;
And for your lie, Lucifer, that you lied to Eve,

5. The resurrection of the dead (from the Nicene Creed).
6. Psalm 51.4. The psalm is understood to assign the sole power of judging the sinner to God, because it is only against God that the sinner has sinned.
7. I.e., “Law dictates that the king pardon the felon if the king sees him.”
8. [He is a just judge who leaves] no evil unpunished [and no good unrewarded]. Not from the Bible but from Pope Innocent III’s tract Of Contempt for the World (1195).
9. In 2 Corinthians 12.4, St. Paul tells how in a vision he was snatched up to heaven where he heard things that may not be repeated among men. Langland is apparently invoking a similar mystic experience when he puts into Christ’s mouth a promise to spare many of his half-brothers, the unbaptized. The orthodox theology of the time taught that all the unbaptized were irredeemably damned, a proposition Langland refused to accept: in his vision he has heard words to the contrary that might not be repeated among men, because they would be held heretical.
1. Psalm 143.2.
You shall buy it back in bitterness”—and bind him with chains.
Ashtoreth and all the gang hid themselves in corners;
They dared not look at our Lord, the least of them all,
But let him lead away what he liked and leave what he wished.
Many hundreds of angels harped and sang,
Flesh sins, flesh redeems, flesh reigns as God of God.
Then Peace piped a note of poetry:
As a rule the sun is brighter after the biggest clouds; After hostilities love is brighter:
"After sharp showers," said Peace, "the sun shines brightest;
No weather is warmer than after watery clouds;
Nor any love lovelier, or more loving friends,
Than after war and woe when Love and peace are masters.
There was never war in this world nor wickedness so sharp
That Love, if he liked, might not make a laughing matter.
And peace through patience puts an end to all perils."
"Truce!" said Truth, "you tell the truth, by Jesus!
Let’s kiss in covenant, and each of us clasp other."
"And let no people," said Peace, "perceive that we argued;
For nothing is impossible to him that is almighty."
"You speak the truth," said Righteousness, and reverently kissed her,
Peace, and Peace her, per saecula saeculorum:
Mercy and Truth have met together; Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other."
Truth sounded a trumpet then and sang Te Deum Laudamus
And then Love strummed a lute with a loud note:
Behold how good and how pleasant, etc.
Till the day dawned these damsels caroled.
When bells rang for the Resurrection, and right then I awoke
And called Kit my wife and Calote my daughter:
"Arise and go reverence God’s resurrection,
And creep to the Cross on knees, and kiss it as a jewel,
For God’s blessed body it bore for our good,
And it frightens the Fiend, for such is its power
That no grisly ghost may glide in its shadow."
compared in a famous image from Isaiah 63.2 to one who treads grapes in a winepress, a passage that is also the source of Julia Ward Howe’s “grapes of wrath” in “The Battle Hymn of the Republic.”

The religious lyrics are for the most part devotional poems that depend on the Latin Bible and liturgy of the church. The passage from Isaiah adapted by Herebert was part of a lesson in a mass performed during Holy Week. But the diction of that poem, though there are a few French loan words, is predominantly of English origin. Many of the poems, like Herebert’s, contain an element of drama: “Ye that Pasen by the Weye” is spoken by Christ from the Cross to all wayfarers; similar verses are spoken by the crucified Christ to the crowd (as well as to the audience) in the mystery plays of the Crucifixion.

Among the most beautiful and tender lyrics are those about the Virgin Mary, who is the greatest of all queens and ladies. They celebrate Mary’s joys, sorrows, and the mystery of her virgin motherhood. “Sunset on Calvary,” a tableau of Mary at the foot of the Cross, contains an implicit play upon English “sun,” which is setting, and the “son,” who is dying but, like the sun, will rise again. Like love songs the Marian lyrics often celebrate the mysteries of the natural world and thus defy any simple division of medieval lyric into “secular” or “religious” poetry. “I Sing of a Maiden” visualizes the conception of Jesus in terms of the falling dew, and he steals silently to her bower like a lover. “Adam Lay Bound” cheerfully treats the original sin as though it were a child’s theft of an apple, which had the happy result of making Mary the Queen of Heaven. “The Corpus Christi Carol” has the form of a lullaby but penetrates by stages to the heart of a mystery similar to the Holy Grail, the chalice that contained Christ’s blood, which continues to flow, as it does in this carol, for humanity’s salvation.

The "Showings," or 'Revelations' as they are also called, were sixteen mystical visions received by the woman known as Julian of Norwich. The name may be one that she adopted when she became an anchoress in a cell attached to the church of St. Julian that still stands in that city in East Anglia, then one of the most important English cities. An anchorite (m.) or anchoress (f.) is a religious recluse confined to an enclosure, which he or she has vowed never to leave. At the time of such an enclosing the burial service was performed, signifying that the enclosed person was dead to the world and that the enclosure corresponded to a grave. The point of this confinement was, of course, to pursue more actively the contemplative or spiritual life.

Julian may well have belonged to a religious order at the time that her visions led her to choose the life of an anchoress. We know little about her except what she tells us in her writings. She is, however, very precise about the date of her visions. They occurred, she tells us, at the age of thirty and a half on May 13, 1373. Four extant wills bequeath sums for Julian's maintenance in her anchorage. The most important document witnessing her life is The Book of Margery Kempe. Kempe asked Julian whether there might be any deception in Kempe's own visions, "for the anchoress," she says, "was expert in such things." Kempe's description of Julian's conversation accords well with the doctrines and personality that emerge from Julian's own book.

A Book of Showings survives in a short and a long version. The longer text, from which the following excerpts are taken, was the product of fifteen and more years of meditation on the meaning of the visions in which much had been obscure to Julian. Apparently the mystical experiences were never repeated, but through constant study and contemplation the showings acquired a greater clarity, richness, and profundity as they continued to be turned over in a mind both gifted with spiritual insight and learned in theology. Her editors document her extensive use of the Bible and her familiarity with medieval religious writings in both English and Latin.

Julian's sixteen revelations are each treated in uneven numbers of Chapters; these groupings of chapters form an extended meditation on a given vision. Each vision is treated with an unpredictable combination of visual description of what Julian saw, the words she was offered, and the meanings she "saw." Her visions are, in her words, "ghostly" (that is, spiritual), "bodily," and subtle combinations of the two. They embrace powerful visual phenomena such as blood drops running from the crown of thorns and revelations that take place in pure mind. All are, nevertheless, "seen"; the spiritualized meanings do not render bodily sights redundant.

Of the selections here, Chapters 3 and 86 are from the opening and closing sequences of the work; Chapters 4, 5, and 7 are from the First Vision; Chapter 27 from the Thirteenth Vision; and Chapters 58, 59, 60, and 61 from the great Fourteenth Vision.

Julian's First Vision is rooted in, but moves beyond, the tradition of affective piety described in the headnote to this section. The vision is provoked by Julian's own bodily approximation to the bodily pains of Christ, as she thinks she is dying. The crucifix offered for her comfort provokes a kinetic, fresh response, as it seems to move into life, bleeding and persuading Julian that the vision is God's unmediated gift to her. Julian moves well beyond this initial sight, however; she sees a sequence of created things: the Virgin Mary as the best creature that God made, and, lower down the scale, the entire world in her palm, "the quantity of an hazelnut." Such a vision might lead away from created things altogether, into a realm of pure essence; significantly, it does not, precisely because Julian never leaves the sight of the wounded, bodily Christ, whose very physical suffering is somehow simultaneous with these almost immaterial visions. Julian strains the tradition of affective piety to its limits, but ends by transforming rather than rejecting it.
The serene optimism Julian’s visions express for the material, created world and for fallen creatures extends into the most daring and surprising realms of speculation. “Sin is behovely”: these are (Julian’s) Christ’s own words. They are expressed in the Thirteenth Vision for the first time (Chapter 27), but only in the extended, daring meditation of the Fourteenth Vision (not included in the Shorter Version) are they given their deepest sense. At the heart of Julian’s profoundly optimistic theology is a transformative understanding of Christ’s Humanity. She develops, without ever mentioning it explicitly, the idea of the felix culpa, the notion that, given its happy consequence in Christ’s redemption of mankind, Adam’s sin, or culpa, was somehow “happy” (félix). Christ is so much a part of us, by Julian’s account, that He is “the ground of our kind [natural/kind] making” (Chapter 59). He is our Mother, who strains and suffers as He gives birth to our salvation. Julian’s concept of Jesus as mother has antecedents in both Old and New Testaments, in medieval theology, and in the writings of medieval mystics (both men and women), but nowhere else in Middle English writing is the concept so subtly and resonantly explored.

Julian was clearly aware of the dangers of expressing such high mysteries as a woman writer. She participates, it is true, in a late medieval tradition of visionary writing, often by women, such as the Dialogue of Catherine of Siena (translated into Middle English as the Orchard of Syon) and the Revelations of St. Bridget of Sweden (also translated into Middle English). Julian, however, does not refer to these figures; instead, she negotiates the difficulties and dangers of writing as a woman with enormous tact and shrewdness, both disclaiming and creating exceptional authority. Part of her strategy is to write with calm lucidity; part is to claim that the vision is not particular to her alone. Precisely by virtue of a common humanity, the visions are common property: “We are all one, and I am sure I saw it for the profit of many other.”

Chapter 3

[JULIAN’S BODILY SICKNESS AND THE WOUNDS OF CHRIST]

And when I was thirty year old and a half, God sent me a bodily sickness in the which I lay three days and three nights; and on the fourth night I took all my rites of holy church, and went not to have liven till day. And after this I lay two days and two nights; and on the third night I weened oftentimes to have passed, and so weened they that were with me. And yet in this I felt a great loathsomeness to die, but for nothing that was on earth that me liketh to live for, ne for no pain that I was afraid of, for I trusted in God of his mercy. But it was for I would have lived to have loved God better and longer time, that I might by the grace of that living have the more knowing and loving of God in the bliss of heaven. For me thought all that time that I had lived here so little and so short in regard of that endless bliss, I thought: Good Lord, may my living no longer be to thy worship? And I understood by my reason and by the feeling of my pains that I should die; and I assented fully with all the will of my heart to be at God’s will.

Thus I endured till day, and by then was my body dead from the midst downward, as to my feeling. Then was I holpen to be set upright, underset with help, for to have the more freedom of my heart to be at God’s will, and thinking on God while my life lasted. My curate was sent for to be at my ending, and before he came I had set up my eyen and might not speak. He set the cross before my face and said: ‘I have brought the image of thy savior; look thereupon and comfort thee therewith.’ Me thought I was well, for my eyen was set upright into heaven, where I trusted to come by the mercy of God; but nevertheless I assented to set my eyen in the face of the crucifix, if I might, and so I did, for me thought I might longer dure to look even forth than right up. After this my sight began to fail. It waxed as dark about me in the chamber as if it had been night, save in the image of the cross, wherein held a common light; and I wist not how. All that was beside the cross was ugly and fearful to me as if it had been much occupied with fiends.

After this the over part of my body began to die so farforth that unneth I had any feeling. My most pain was shortness of breath and failing of life. Then went I verily to have passed. And in this suddenly all my pain was taken from me, and I was as whole, and namely in the over part of my body, as ever I was before. I marvelled of this sudden change, for me thought that it was a privy working of God, and not of kind; and yet by feeling of this ease I trusted never more to have lived, ne the feeling of this ease was no full ease to me, for me thought I had liever have been delivered of this world, for my heart was willfully set thereto.

Then came suddenly to my mind that I should desire the second wound of our Lord’s gift and of his grace, that my body might be fulfilled with mind and feeling of his blessed passion, as I had before prayed, for I would that his pains were my pains, with compassion and afterward longing to God. Thus thought me that I might with his grace have the wounds that I had before desired; but in this I desired never no bodily sight ne no manner showing of God, but compassion as me thought that a kind soul might have with our Lord Jesu, that for love would become a deadly man. With him I desired to suffer, living in my deadly body, as God would give me grace.

Chapter 4

[CHRIST’S PASSION AND INCARNATION]

And in this suddenly I saw the red blood running down from under the garland, hot and freshly, plenteously and lively, right as it was in the time that the garland of thorns was pressed on his blessed head. Right so, both God and man, the same that suffered for me, I conceived truly and mightily that it was himself that shewed it me without any mean.

13. Julian had prayed for three gifts: direct experience of Christ’s passion, mortal sickness, and the wounds of true contrition, loving compassion, and a willed desire for God.
15. Intermediary.
And in the same showing suddenly the Trinity fulfilled my heart most of joy, and so I understood it shall be in heaven without end to all that shall come there. For the Trinity is God, God is the Trinity. The Trinity is our maker, the Trinity is our keeper, the Trinity is our everlasting lover, the Trinity is endless joy and our bliss, by our Lord Jesu Christ, and in our Lord Jesu Christ. And this was showed in the first sight and in all, for where Jesu appeareth, the blessed Trinity is understand, as to my sight.7 And I said, "Benedicite dominus." This I said for reverence in my meaning,8 with a mighty voice, and full greatly was I astoned for wonder and marvel that I had, that he that is so reverend and so dreadful will be so homely8 with a sinful creature living in this wretched flesh.

Thus I took it for that time that our Lord Jesu of his courteous love would show me comfort before the time of my temptation; for me thought it might well be that I should by the sufferance of God and with his keeping be tempted of fiends before I should die. With this sight of his blessed passion, with the godhead that I saw in my understanding, I knew well that it was strength enough to me, yea, and to all creatures living that should be saved, against all the fiends of hell, and against all ghostly enemies.

In this he brought our Lady Saint Mary to my understanding; I saw her ghostly in bodily likeness, a simple maiden and a meek, young of age, a little waxen above a child,6 in the stature as she was when she conceived. Also God showed me in part the wisdom and the truth of her soul, wherein I understood the reverend beholding, that she beheld her God, that is her maker, marvelling with great reverence that he would be born of her that was a simple creature of his making. And this wisdom and truth, knowing the greatness of her maker and the littlehead7 of herself that is made, made her to say full meekly to Gabriel: "Lo me here, God's handmaiden."8 In this sight I did understand verily that she is more than all that God made beneath her in worthiness and in fullhead;9 for above her is nothing that is made but the blessed manhood of Christ, as to my sight.

Chapter 5

[ALL CREATION AS A HAZELNUT]

In this same time that I saw this sight of the head bleeding, our good Lord showed a ghostly sight of his homely loving. I saw that he is to us all thing that is good and comfortable to our help. He is our clothing that for love wrappeth us and windeth us, halseth us and all becloses us, hangeth about us for tender love that he may never leave us. And so in this sight I saw that he is all thing that is good, as to my understanding.

And in this he showed a little thing, the quantity of an hazelnut, lying in the palm of my hand, as me seemed, and it was as round as a ball. I looked thereon with the eye of my understanding, and thought: What may this be?

7. Is understood, as I see it.
8. Blessed be the Lord.
9. Intention.
1. Astonished.
2. Awe-inspiring.
3. Familiar, intimate (the quality of being home).
4. By.
5. Spiritual.
6. Grown a little older than a child.
7. Littleness.
1. Envelops us and embraces us.
2. So that.
And it was answered generally thus: It is all that is made. I marvelled how it might last, for me thought it might suddenly have fallen to nought for littleness. And I was answered in my understanding: It lasteth and ever shall, for God loveth it; and so hath all thing being by the love of God.

In this little thing I saw three properties. The first is that God made it, the second that God loveth it, the third that God keepeth it. But what beheld I therein? Verily, the maker, the keeper, the lover. For till I am substantially united to him I may never have full rest nor very bliss; that is to say that I be so fastened to him that there be right nought that is made between my God and me.

This little thing that is made, me thought it might have fallen to nought for littleness. Of this needeth us to have knowledge, that us liketh nought all thing that is made, for to love and have God that is unmade. For this is the cause why we be not all in ease of heart and of soul, for we seek here rest in this thing that is so little, where no rest is in, and we know not our God, that is almighty, all wise and all good, for he is very rest. God will be known, and him liketh that we rest us in him; for all that is beneath him suffiseth not to us. And this is the cause why that no soul is in rest till it is noughted of all things that is made. When she is wilfully noughted for love, to have him that is all, then is she able to receive ghostly rest.

And also our good Lord showed that it is full great pleasance to him that a sely soul come to him naked, plainly and homely. For this is the kind yearning of the soul by the touching of the Holy Ghost, as by the understanding that I have in this showing: God of thy goodness gave me thyself, for thou art enough to me, and I may ask nothing that is less that may be full worship to thee. And if I ask any thing that is less, ever me wanteth; but only in thee I have all.

And these words of the goodness of God be full lovesome to the soul and full near touching the will of our Lord, for his goodness fulfilleth all his creatures and all his blessed works and overpasseth without end. For he is the endlesshead and he made us only to himself and restored us by his precious passion, and ever keepeth us in his blessed love; and all this is of his goodness.

Chapter 7

[CHRIST AS HOMELY AND COURTEOUS]

And in all that time that he showed this that I have now said in ghostly sight, I saw the bodily sight lasting of the plenteous bleeding of the head. The great drops of blood fell down fro under the garland like pellets, seeming as it had come out of the veins. And in the coming out they were brown red, for the blood was full thick; and in the spreading abroad they were bright red. And when it came at the brows, there they vanished; and not withstandin bleeding continued till many things were seen and understood. Nevertheless the fairhead and livelihead continued in the same beauty and liveliness.

The plenteoushead is like to the drops of water that fall of the evesing of an house after a great shower of rain, that fall so thick that no man may number them with no bodily wit. And for the roundness they were like to the scale of herring in the spreading of the forehead.

These three things came to my mind in the time: pellets for the roundhead in the coming out of the blood, the scale of the herring for the roundhead in the spreading, the drops of the evesing of a house for the plenteoushead unnumerable. This showing was quick and lively and hideous and dreadful and sweet and lovely; and of all the sight that I saw this was most comfort to me, that our good Lord, that is so reverend and dreadful, is so homely and so courteous, and this most fulfilled me with liking and sickerness in soule.

And to the understanding of this he showed this open example. It is the most worship that a solemn king or a great lord may do to a poor servant if he will be homely with him; and namely if he show it himself of a full true meaning and with a glad cheer both in private and openly. Then thinketh this poor creature thus: "Lo, what might this noble lord do more worship and joy to me than to show to me that am so little this marvelous homeliness? Verily, it is more joy and liking to me than if he gave me great gifts and were himself strange in manner." This bodily example was showed so high that this man's heart might be ravished and almost forget himself for joy of this great homeliness.

Thus it fareth by our Lord Jesu and by us, for verily it is the most joy that may be, as to my sight, that he that is highest and mightiest, noblest and worthiest, is lowest and meekest, homeliest and courteousest. And truly and verily this marvelous joy shall be show us all when we shall see him. And this will our good Lord that we believe and trust, joy and like, comfort us and make solace as we may with his grace and with his help, into the time that we see it verily. For the most fullhead of joy that we shall have, as to my sight, is this marvelous courtesy and homeliness of our fader, that is our maker, in our Lord Jesu Christ, that is our brother and our saviour. But this marvelous homeliness may no man know in this life, but if he have it by special showing of our Lord, or of great plenty of grace inwardly given of the Holy Ghost. But faith and belief with charity deserve the meed, and so it is had by grace. For in faith with hope and charity our life is grounded. The showing is made to whom that God will, plainly teacheth the same opened and declared, with many privy points belonging to our faith and belief which be worshipful to be known. And when the showing which is given for a time is passed and hid, then faith keepeth it by grace of the Holy Ghost into our life's end. And thus by the showing it is none other than the faith, ne less ne more, as it may be seen by our Lord's meaning in the same matter, by then it come to the last end.

Chapter 27

[SIN IS FITTING]

And after this our Lord brought to my mind the longing that I had to him before; and I saw nothing setted me but sin, and so I beheld generally in us all, and me thought that if sin had not been, we should all have been clean and like to our Lord as he made us. And thus in my folly before this time often I wondered why, by the great foreseeing wisdom of God, the beginning of sin was not setted. For then thought me that all should have been well.

This sterning was much to be forsaken; and nevertheless mourning and sorrow I made therefore without reason and discretion. But Jesu that in this vision informed me of all that me needed answered by this word and said: 'Sin is behovely,' but all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well. In this naked word 'Sin,' our Lord brought to my mind generally all that is not good, and the shameful despite and the uttermost tribulation that he bore for us in this life, and his dying and all his pains, and passion of all his creatures ghostly and bodily. For we be all in part troubled, and we shall be troubled, following our master Jesu, till we be fully purged of our deadly flesh which be not very good.

And with the beholding of this, with all the pains that ever were or ever shall be, I understood the passion of Christ for the most pain and overpassing. And with all, this was showed in a touch, readily passed over into comfort. For our good Lord would not that the soul were afeared of this ugly sight. But I saw not sin, for I believe it had no manner of substance, ne no part of being, ne it might not be known but by the pain that is caused thereof. And this pain is something, as to my sight, for a time, for it purgeth and maketh us to know ourself and ask mercy; for the passion of our Lord is comfort to us against all this, and so is his blessed will. And for the tender love that our good Lord hath to all that shall be saved, he comforteth readily and sweetly, meaning thus: It is true that sin is cause of all this pain, but all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well.

These words were showed full tenderly, showing no manner of blame to me ne to none that shall be safe. Then were it great unkindness of me to blame or wonder on God of my sin, sithen he blameth not me for sin. And in these same words I saw an high marvelous privity hid in God, which privity he shall openly make and shall be known to us in heaven. In which knowing we shall verily see the cause why he suffered sin to come, in which sight we shall endlessly have joy.

God the blessedful Trinity, which is everlasting being, right as he is endless fro without beginning, right so it was in his purpose endless to make mankind, which fair kind first was dight to for his own son, the second person; and when he would, by full accord of all the Trinity he made us all at once. And in making he knit us and oned us to himself, by which oneing we be kept as clean and as noble as we were made. By the virtue of that ilke precious oneing we love our maker and like him, praise and thank him, and endlessly enjoy in him. And this is the working which is wrought continually in each soul that shall be saved, which is the godly will before said.

And thus in our making God almighty is our kindly father, and god all wisdom is our kindly mother, with the love and the goodness of the Holy Ghost, which is all one God, one Lord. And in the knitting and in the oneing he is our very true spouse and we his loved wife and his fair maiden, with which wife he was never displeased. For he sayeth: "I love thee and thou lovest me, and our love shall never part in two."

I beheld the working of all the blessed Trinity, in which beholding I saw and understood these three properties: The property of the fatherhood, and the property of the motherhood, and the property of the lordship in one God. In our father almighty we have our keeping and our bliss as anemptis our kindly substance which is to us by our making fro without beginning. And in the second person in wit and wisdom we have our keeping as anemptis our sensuality our restoring and our saving, for he is our mother, brother and savior And in our good lord the Holy Ghost we have our rewarding and our yielding for our living and our travail, and endlessly overpassing all that we desire in his marvelous courtesy of his high plenteous grace. For all our life is in three: in the first we have our being, and in the second we have our increasing, and in the third we have our fulfilling. The first is kind, the second is mercy, the third is grace.

For the first I saw and understood that the high might of the Trinity is our father, and the deep wisdom of the Trinity is our mother, and the great love of the Trinity is our lord; and all these have we in kind and in our substantial making. And furthermore I saw that the second person, which is our mother, substantially the same dearworthy person, is now become our mother sensual, for we be double of God's making, that is to say substantial and sensual. Our substance is the higher part, which we have in our father God almighty;
and the second person of the Trinity is our mother in kind in our substantial making, in whom we be grounded and rooted, and he is our mother of mercy in our sensual taking.9

And thus is Jesu our very mother in kind of our first making, and he is our very mother in grace by taking of our kind made. All the fair working and all the sweet kindly offices of dearworthy motherhood is improperly to the second person, for in him we have this goodly will, whole and safe without end, both in kind and in grace, of his own proper goodness.

I understood three manner of beholdings of motherhood in God. The first is ground of our kind making, the second is taking of our kind, and there beginneth the motherhood of grace, the third is motherhood in working.3 And therein is a forthspreading by the same grace of length and breadth, of high and of deepness without end. And all is one love.

But now me behooveth to say a little more of this forthspreading, as I understood, in the meaning of our Lord: how that we be brought again by the motherhood of mercy and grace into our kindly stead, where that we were in,5 made by the motherhood of kind love, which kind love never leaveth us.

Our kind mother, our gracious mother (for he would6 all wholly become our mother in all thing) he took the ground of his work full low7 and full mildly in the maiden's womb. And that showed he first, where he brought that meek maiden before the eye of my understanding, in the simple stature as she was when she conceived;9 that is to say our high god, the sovereign wisdom of all, in this low place he arrayed him and dight him9 all ready in our poor flesh, himself to do the service, he and the office of motherhood in all thing. The mother's service is nearest, readiest, and surest: nearest for it is most of kind, readiest for it is most of love, and sikerest1 for it is most of truth. This office he might nor could never done to the full but he alone. We wit2 that all our mothers bear us to pain and to dying. Ah, what is that? But our very Mother Jesu, he alone beareth us to joy and to endless living, blessed moot3 he be.

Thus he sustaineth us within him in love and travail, into the full time that he would suffer the sharpest thorns and grievous pains that ever were or ever shall be, and died at the last. And when he had done, and so borne us to bliss, yet might not all this make aseeth4 to his marvelous love. And that showed he in these high overpassing words of love: 'If I might suffer more I would suffer more.'5 He might no more die, but he would not stint6 working.

8. The appearance of the Virgin in Julian’s first vision. See chapter 4, p. 378.
Wherefore him behooveth to find us, for the dearworthy love of motherhood hath made him debtor to us. The mother may give her child sucken her milk, but our precious mother Jesu, he may feed us with himself, and doth full courteously and full tenderly with the blessed sacrament, that is precious food of very life; and with all the sweet sacraments he sustaineth us full mercifully and graciously, and so meant he in these blessed words, where he said: "I it am that holy church preacheth thee and teacheth thee." That is to say: All the health and the life of sacraments, all the virtue and the grace of my word, all the goodness that is ordained in holy church to thee, I it am.

The mother may lay her child tenderly to her breast, but our tender mother Jesu, he may homely lead us into his blessed breast by his sweet open side, and show us therein in party of the godhead and the joys of heaven with ghostly sureness of endless bliss. And that showed he in the tenth revelation, giving the same understanding in this sweet word where he sayeth: "Lo, how I love thee." This fair lovely word "Mother," it is so sweet and so kind in itself that it may not verily be said of none ne to none but of him and to him that is very mother of life and of all. To the property of motherhood longeth kind love, wisdom, and knowing, and it is God. For though it be so that our bodily forthbringing be but little, low, and simple in regard of our ghostly forthbringing, yet it is he that doth it in the creatures by whom that it is done. The kind loving mother that woot and knoweth the need of her child, she keepeth it full tenderly as the kind and condition of motherhood will. And ever as it waxeth in age and in stature, she changeth her works but not her love. And when it is waxed of more age, she suffereth it that it be chastised in breaking down of vices to make the child receive virtues and grace. This working with all that be fair and good, our Lord doth it in hem by whom it is done. Thus he is our mother in kind by the working of grace in the lower party for love of the higher. And he will that we know it, for he will have all our love fastened to him; and in this I saw that all debt that we owe by God's bidding to fatherhood and motherhood is fulfilled in true loving of God, which blessed love Christ worketh in us. And this was showed in all, and namely in the words where he sayeth: "I it am that thou lovest."

Chapter 61

And in our ghostly forthbringing he useth more tenderness in keeping without any comparison, by as much as our soul is of more price in his sight. He kindleth our understanding, he prepareth our ways, he easeth our conscience, he comforteth our soul, he lighteth our heart and giveth us in party knowing and loving in his blessedful godhead, with gracious mind in his sweet manhood and his blessed passion, with courteous marveling in his high overpassing goodness, and maketh us to love all that he loveth for his love, and to be well apaid with him and with all his works. And when we fall, hastily he raiseth us by his lovely becleping and his gracious touching. And when we be strengthened by his sweet working, then we wilfully choose him by his grace to be his servants and his lovers, lastingly without end.

And yet after this he suffereth some of us to fall more hard and more grievously than ever we did before, as us thinketh. And then ween we (that be not all wise) that all were nought that we have begun. But it is not so, for it needeth us to fall, and it needeth us to see it; for if we fell not, we should not know how feeble and how wretched we be of ourself, nor also we should not so fulsomely know the marvelous love of our maker.

For we shall verily see in heaven without end that we have grievously sinned in this life; and notwithstanding this we shall verily see that we were never hurt in his love, nor we were never the less of price in his sight. And by the assay of this falling we shall have an high and a marvelous knowing of love in God without an end. For hard and marvellous is that love which may not nor will not be broken for trespass.

And this was one understanding of profit; and other is the lowness and meekness that we shall get by the sight of our falling, for thereby we shall highly be raised in heaven, to which rising we might never have come without that meekness. And therefore it needed us to see it; and if we see it not, though we fell it should not profit us. And commonly first we fall and sithen we see it; and both is of the mercy of God.

The mother may suffer the child to fall sometime and be diseased in diverse manner of peril come to her child for love. And though our earthly mother may suffer her child to perish, our heavenly mother Jesu may never suffer us that be his children to perish, for he is all mighty, all wisdom, and all love, and so is none but he, blessed mote he be.

But oft times when our falling and our wretchedness is showed to us, we be so sore adread and so greatly ashamed of ourself that unnethes we wit where that we may hold us. But then will not our courteous mother that we flee away, for him were nothing loather; for then he will that we use the condition of a child. For when it is diseased and afeared, it runneth hastily to the mother; and if it may do no more, it crieth on the mother for help with all the might. So will he that we do as the meek child, saying thus: "My kind mother, my gracious mother, my dearworthy mother, have mercy on me. I have made myself foul and unlike to thee, and I may not nor can amend it but with thine help and grace."

And if we feel us not then eased, as soon be we sure that he useth the condition of a wise mother. For if he see that it be for profit to us to mourn and to weep, he suffereth with ruth and pity, into the best time, for love.

And he will then that we use the property of a child that ever more kindly trusteth to the love of the mother in weal and in woe. And he will that we take us mightily to the faith of holy church and find there our dearworthy mother in solace and true understanding with all the blessed common. For one singular person may oftentimes be broken, as it seemeth to the self, but the whole body of holy church was never broken, nor never shall be without end. And therefore a sure thing it is, a good and a gracious, to willen meekly and mightily been fastened and oned to our mother holy church, that is Christ Jesu. For the flood of his mercy that is his dearworthy blood and precious water is plenteous to make us fair and clean. The blessed wounds of our savior be open and enjoy' to heal us. The sweet gracious hands of our mother be ready and diligent about us; for he in all this working useth the very office of a kind nurse that hath not else to do but to entend6 the salvation of her child.

It is his office to save us, it is his worship to do it, and it is his will we know it; for he will we love him sweetly and trust in him meekly and mightily. And this showed he in these gracious words: "I keep thee full surely.'

Chapter 86
[CHRIST'S MEANING]

This book is begun by God's gift and his grace, but it is not yet performed,7 as to my sight. For charity, pray we all together with God's working, thanking, trusting, enjoying, for thus will our good Lord be prayed, but the understanding that I took in all his own meaning, and in the sweet words where he sayeth full merrily: "I am ground of thy beseeching." For truly I saw and understood in our Lord's meaning that he showed it for he will have it known more than it is. In which knowing he will give us grace to love him and cleave to him, for he beheld his heavenly treasure with so great love on earth that he will give us more light, and solace in heavenly joy, in drawing of our hearts fro sorrow and darkness which we are in.

And fro the time that it was showed, I desired oftentimes to wit 8 in what was our Lord's meaning. And fifteen year after and more, I was answered in ghostly understanding, saying thus: "What, wouldst thou wit thy Lord's meaning in this thing? Wit it well, love was his meaning. Who showed he thee? Love.
What showed he thee? Love. Wherefore showeth he it thee? For love.
Hold thee therein, thou shalt wit more in the same. But thou shalt never wit therein other withouten end.'

Thus was I learned,9 that love is our Lord's meaning. And I saw full surely in this and in all, that ere God made us he loved us, which love was never slaked1 ne never shall. And in this love he hath done all his works, and in this love he hath made all things profitable to us, and in this love our life is everlasting. In our making we had beginning, but the love wherein he made us was in him fro without beginning. In which love we have our beginning, and all this shall we see in God withouten end.

MARGERY KEMPE
ca. 1373-1438

The Book of Margery Kempe is the spiritual autobiography of a medieval laywoman, telling of her struggles to carry out instructions for a holy life that she claimed to have received in personal visions from Christ and the Virgin Mary. The assertion of such a mission by a married woman, the mother of fourteen children, was in itself sufficient grounds for controversy; in addition, Kempe's outspoken defense of her visions as well as her highly emotional style of religious expression embroiled her with fellow citizens and pilgrims and with the Church, although she also won both lay and clerical supporters. Ordered by the archbishop of York to swear not to teach in his diocese, she courageously stood up for her freedom to speak her conscience.

Margery Kempe was the daughter of John Burnham, five-time mayor of King's Lynn, a thriving commercial town in Norfolk. At about the age of twenty she married John Kempe, a well-to-do fellow townsman. After the traumatic delivery of her first child—the rate of maternal mortality in childbirth was high—she sought to confess to a priest whose harsh, censorious response precipitated a mental breakdown, from which she eventually recovered through the first of her visions. Her subsequent conversion and strict religious observances generated a good deal of domestic strife, but she continued to share her husband's bed until, around the age of forty, she negotiated a vow of celibacy with him, which was confirmed before the bishop and left her free to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. There she experienced visions of Christ's passion and of the sufferings of the Virgin. These visions recurred during the rest of her life, and her noisy weeping at such times made her the object of much scorn and hostility. Her orthodoxy was several times examined, but her unquestioning acceptance of the Church's doctrines and authority, and perhaps also her status as a former mayor's daughter, shielded her against charges of heresy.

Kempe was unable to read or write, but acquired her command of Scripture and theology from sermons and other oral sources. Late in her life, she dictated her story in two parts to two different scribes; the latter of these was a priest who revised the whole text. Nevertheless, it seems likely that the work retains much of the characteristic form and expression of its author.

Kempe's text offers a perspective on the tradition of "affective piety" unlike any other: here that visionary tradition comes to life in the context of vividly realized, often painful psychological and bodily experience. Kempe's own marriage, and her often troubled worldly relations, inform and are informed by her "homely" and sometimes erotic spiritual relations. Her imitation of Christ moves her to travel vast distances to be present at the scenes of Christ's suffering, just as she sees Christ present in male babies or good-looking young men. She sees the living divine presence in the Eucharistic host. "Sir," she says to a skeptic, "His death is as fresh to me as He had died this same day." This form of intensely sympathetic vision has, however, its negative obverse. As in Chaucer's Prioress's Tale, where tender feeling for the Blessed Virgin is complemented by hatred for the "cursed Jewes," Christian pathos produces an anti-Semitic reflex (Book 1.79).

When this creature was twenty year of age or somedeal more, she was married to a worshipful burgess and was with child within short time, as kind would. And after that she had conceived, she was labored with great accesses till the child was born, and then, what for labor she had in childing and for sickness going before, she despaired of her life, weening she might not live. And then she sent for her ghostly father, for she had a thing in conscience which she had never showed before that time in all her life. For she was ever letted by her enemy, the Devil, evermore saying to her while she was in good heal her needed no confession but [to] do penance by herself alone, and all should be forgiven, for God is merciful enow. And therefore this creature oftentimes did great penance in fasting bread and water and other deeds of alms with devout prayers, save she would not show it in confession. And when she was any time sick or diseased, the Devil said in her mind that she should be damned for she was not shriven of that default. Wherefore after that her child was born she, not trusting her life, sent for her ghostly father, as said before, in full will to be shriven of all her lifetime as near as she could. And, when she came to the point for to say that thing which she had so long concealed, her confessor was a little too hasty and gan sharply to undernim her ere that she had fully said her intent, and so she would no more say for nought he might do.

And anon for dread she had of damnation on that one side and his sharp reproving on that other side, this creature went out of her mind and was wonderly vexed and labored with spirits half year eight weeks and odd days. And in this time she saw, as her thought, devils open their mouths all inflamed with burning lows of fire as they should have swallowed her in, sometime ramping at her, sometime threating her, sometime pulling her and hauling her both night and day during the foresaid time. And also the devils cried upon her with great threatenings and bade her she should forsake her Christendom, her faith, and deny her God, his Mother, and all the saints in Heaven, her good works and all good virtues, her father, her mother, and all her friends. And so she did. She slandered her husband, her friends, and her own self; she spoke many a reprouse word and many a shrewd word; she knew no virtue nor goodness; she desired all wickedness; like as the spirits tempted her to say and do so she said and did. She would have fordone herself many a time at their steering and have been damned with them in Hell, and into witness thereof she bit her own hand so violently that it was seen all her life after. And also she rived her skin on her body again her heart with her nails spiteously, for she had none other instruments, and worse she would have done save she was bound and kept with strength both day and night that she might not have her will.

And when she had long been labored in this and many other temptations that men weened she should never have scaped or lived, then on a time as she lay alone and her keepers were from her, our merciful Lord Christ Jesu, ever to be trusted (worshiped be his name) never forsaking his servant in time of need, appeared to his creature, which had forsaken him, in likeness of a man, most seemly, most beauteous, and most amiable that ever might be seen with man’s eye, clad in a mantle of purple silk, sitting upon her bed’s side, looking upon her with so blessed a cheer that she was strengthened in all her spirits, said to her these words: “Daughter, why hast thou forsaken me, and I forsook never thee?” And anon as he had said these words she saw verily how the air opened as bright as any levin, and he sty’ed up into the air, not right hastily and quickly, but fair and easily that she might well behold him in the air till it was closed again. And anon the creature was stabled in her wits and in her reason as well as ever she was before, and prayed her husband as so soon as he came to her that she might have the keys of the buttery to take her meat and drink as she had done before.

[MARGERY AND HER HUSBAND REACH A SETTLEMENT]

It befell upon a Friday on Midsummer Even in right hot weather, as this creature was coming from Yorkward bearing a bottle with beer in her hand and her husband a cake in his bosom, he asked his wife this question: “Margery, if there came a man with a sword and would smite off my head unless that I should commune kindly with you as I have done before, say me truth of your conscience—for ye say ye will not lie—whether would ye suffer my head to be smit off or else suffer me to meddle with you again as I did sometime?” “Alas, sir,” she said, “why move ye this matter and have we been chaste this eight weeks?” “For I will wit the truth of your heart.” And then she said with great sorrow, “Forsooth, I had liefer see you be slain than we should turn again to our uncleanness.” And he said again, “Ye are no good wife.”

And then she asked her husband what was the cause that he had not meddled with her eight weeks before, sithen she lay with him every night in his bed. And he said he was so made afeared when he would have touched her that he durst no more do. “Now, good sir, amend you and ask God mercy, for I told you near three years sithen that ye should be slain suddenly, and now is this the third year, and yet I hope I shall have my desire. Good sir, I pray you grant me that I shall ask, and I shall pray for that ye shall be saved through the mercy of our Lord Jesu Christ, and ye shall have more meed in Heaven than if ye wore a hair or a habergeon. I pray you, suffer me to make a vow of chastity in what bishop’s hand that God will.” “Nay,” he said, “that will I not grant you, for now I may use you without deadly sin and then might I not so.”

Then she said again, "If it be the will of the Holy Ghost to fulfill that I have said, I pray God ye might consent thereto; and if it be not the will of the Holy Ghost, I pray God ye never consent thereto."

Then went they forth to Bridlingtonward in right hot weather, the foresaid creature having great sorrow and great dread for her chastity. And as they came by a cross, her husband set him down under the cross, cieping his wife unto him and saying these words unto her, "Margery, grant me my desire, and I shall grant you your desire. My first desire is that we shall lie still together in one bed as we have done before; the second that ye shall pay my debts ere ye go to Jerusalem; and the third that ye shall eat and drink with me on the Friday as ye were wont to do."

"Nay, sir," she said, "to break the Friday I will never grant you while I live." "Well," he said, "then shall I meddle with you again."

She prayed him that he would give her leave to make her prayers, and he granted it goodly. Then she knelt down beside a cross in the field and prayed in this manner with great abundance of tears, "Lord God, thou knowest all thing; thou knowest what sorrow I have had to be chaste in my body to thee all this three year, and now might I have my will and I dare not for love of thee. For if I would break that manner of fasting which thou commandest me to keep on the Friday without meat or drink, I should now have my desire. But, blessed Lord, thou knowest I will not contrary thy will, and mickle now is my sorrow unless that I find comfort in thee. Now, blessed Jesu, make thy will known to me unworthy that I may follow thereafter and fulfil it with all my might." And then our Lord Jesu Christ with great sweetness spoke to this creature, commanding her to go again to her husband and pray him to grant her that she desired, "And he shall have that he desireth. For, my dearworthy daughter, this was the cause that I bade thee fast for thou shouldest the sooner obtain and get thy desire, and now it is granted thee. I will no longer thou fast, therefore I bid thee in the name of Jesu eat and drink as thy husband doth."

Then this creature thanked our Lord Jesu Christ of his grace and his goodness, sithen rose up and went to her husband, saying unto him, "Sir, if it like you, ye shall grant me my desire and ye shall have your desire. Granteth me that ye shall not come in my bed, and I grant you to quit your debts ere I go to Jerusalem. And maketh my body free to God so that ye never make no challenging in me to ask no debt of matrimony after this day while ye live, and I shall eat and drink on the Friday at your bidding." Then said her husband again to her, "As free may your body be to God as it hath been to me." This creature thanked God greatly, enjoying that she had her desire, praying her husband that they should say three Pater Noster in the worship of the Trinity for the great grace that he had granted them. And so they did, kneeling under a cross, and sithen they ate and drank together in great gladness of spirit. This was on a Friday on Midsummer Even.

[MARGERY SEES THE HOST* FLUTTER AT MASS]

On a day as this creature was hearing her mass, a young man and a good priest holding up the sacrament7 in his hands over his head, the sacrament shook and flickered to and fro as a dove flickers with her wings. And, when he held up the chalice with the precious sacrament, the chalice moved to and fro as it should have fallen out of his hands. When the sacre was done, this creature had great marvel of the stirring and moving of the blessed sacrament, desiring to see more sacres and looking if it would so again. Then said our Lord Jesu Christ to the creature, "Thou shalt no more see it in this manner, therefore thank God that thou hast seen. My daughter, Bridget, saw me never in this way."

Then said this creature in her thought, "Lord, what betokeneth this?" "It betokeneth vengeance." "A, good Lord, what vengeance?" Then said our Lord again3 to her, "There shall be an erdene,4 tell it whom thou wilt in the name of Jesu. For I tell thee forsooth right as I spoke to Saint Bridget right so I speak to thee, daughter, and I tell thee truly it is true every word that is written in Bridget’s book, and by thee it shall be known for very truth. And thou shalt fare well, daughter, in spite of all thy enemies; the more envy5 they have to thee for my grace, the better shall I love thee. I were not rightful God but I proved thee, for I know thee better than thou dost thyself, what that ever men say of thee. Thou sayst I have great patience in the sin of the people, and thou sayst soth, but, if thou saw the sin of the people as I do, thou shouldst have much more marvel in my patience and much more sorrow in the sin of the people than thou hast."

Then the creature said, "Alas, dearworthy Lord, what shall I do for the people?" Our Lord answered, 'It is enough to thee to do as thou dost.' Then she prayed, "Merciful Lord Christ Jesu, in thee is all mercy and grace and goodness. Have mercy, pity and compassion of them. Show thy mercy and thy goodness upon them, help them, send them very contrition, and let them never die in their sin." Our merciful Lord said, "I may no more, daughter, of my rightfulness do for them than I do. I send them preaching and teaching, pestilence and battles, hunger and famine, loss of their goods with great sickness, and many other tribulations, and they will not believe my words nor they will not know my visitation. And therefore I shall say to them that I made my servants to pray for you,8 and ye despised their works and their living."

And so they went forth into the Holy Land till they might see Jerusalem. And when this creature saw Jerusalem, riding on an ass, she thanked God with all her heart, praying him for his mercy that like as he had brought her to see this earthly city Jerusalem, he would grant her grace to see the blissful city Jerusalem above, the city of Heaven. Our Lord Jesu Christ, answering to her thought, granted her to have her desire. Then for joy that she had and the sweetness that she felt in the dalliance of our Lord, she was in point to have fallen off her ass, for she might not bear the sweetness and grace that God wrought in her soul. Then twain pilgrims of Dutchmen went to her and kept her from falling, of which the one was a priest. And he put spices in her mouth to comfort her, weening she had been sick. And so they helped her forth to Jerusalem. And when she came there, she said, "Sirs, I pray you be not displeased though I weep sore in this holy place where our Lord Jesu Christ was quick and dead."

Then went they to the Temple in Jerusalem, and they were let in on one day at evensong time and they abide there till the next day at evensong time. Then the friars lifted up a cross and led the pilgrims about from one place to another where our Lord had suffered his pains and his passions, every man and woman bearing a wax candle in their hand. And the friars always as they went about told them what our Lord suffered in every place. And the foreshaid creature wept and sobbed so plentifully as though she had seen our Lord with her bodily eye suffering his Passion at that time. Before her in her soul she saw him verily by contemplation, and that caused her to have compassion. And when they came up onto the Mount of Calvary she fell down that she might not stand nor kneel but wallowed and wrested with her body, spreading her arms abroad, and cried with a loud voice as though her heart should have burst asunder, for in the city of her soul she saw verily and freshly how our Lord was crucified. Before her face she heard and saw in her ghostly sight the mourning of our Lady, of St. John and of Mary Magdalene, and of many other that loved our Lord. And she had so great compassion and so great pain to see our Lord's pain that she might not keep herself from crying and roaring though she should have been dead therefore.

And this was the first cry that ever she cried in any contemplation. And this manner of crying endured many years after this time for aught that any man might do, and therefore suffered she much despite and much reproof. The crying was so loud and so wonderful that it made the people astoned unless that they had heard it before or else that they knew the cause of the crying. And she had them so oftentimes that they made her right weak in her bodily mights, and namely if she heard of our Lord's Passion. And sometime when she saw the Crucifix, or if she saw a man had a wound or a beast, whether it were, or if a man beat a child before her or smote a horse or another beast.

with a whip, if she might see it or hear it, her thought she saw our Lord be beaten or wounded like as she saw in the man or in the beast, as well in the field as in the town, and by herself alone as well as among the people. First when she had her cryings at Jerusalem, she had them oftentimes, and in Rome also. And when she came home into England, first at her coming home it came but seldom as it were once in a month, sithen once in the week, afterward quotidianly, and once she had fourteen on one day, and another day she had seven, and so as God would visit her, sometime in the church, sometime in the street, sometime in the chamber, sometime in the field when God would send them, for she knew never time nor hour when they should come. And they came never without passing great sweetness of devotion and high contemplation. And as soon as she perceived that she should cry, she would keep it in as much as she might that the people should not have heard it for noying of them. For some said it was a wicked spirit vexed her; some said it was a sickness; some said she had drunken too much wine; some banned her; some wished she had been in the haven; some would she had been in the sea in a bottomless boat; and so each man as him thought. Other ghostly men loved her and favored her the more. Some great clerks said our Lady cried never so, nor no saint in Heaven, but they knew full little what she felt, nor they would not believe but that she might have abstained her from crying if she had wished.

[MARGERY'S MARRIAGE TO AND INTIMACY WITH CHRIST]

35. As this creature was in the Apostles' Church at Rome on Saint Lateran's Day, the Father of Heaven said to her, 'Daughter, I am well pleased with thee inasmuch as thou believest in all the sacraments of Holy Church and in all faith that longeth thereto, and especially for that thou believest in manhood of my Son and for the great compassion that thou hast of His bitter Passion.' Also the Father said to this creature, 'Daughter, I will have thee wedded to my Godhead, for I shall show thee my privities and my counsels, for thou shall women with me without end.'

Then the creature kept silence in her soul and answered not thereto, for she was sore afraid of the Godhead and she could no skill of the dalliance of the Godhead, for all her love and all her affection was set in the manhood of Christ, and thereof could she good skill and she would for no thing have parted therefrom. She was so much affected to the manhood of Christ that when she saw women in Rome bear children in their arms, if she might witen that they were any menchildren, she should then cry, roar, and weep as though she had seen Christ in His childhood. And, if she might have had her will, oftimes she would have taken the children out of the mothers' arms and have kissed them in the stead of Christ. And, if she saw a seemly man, she had great pain to look on Him less than she might have seen Him that was both God and Man. And therefore she cried many times and often when she met a seemly man and wept and sobbed full sore in the manhood of Christ as she went in the streets at Rome, that they that saw her wondered full much on her, for they knew not the cause.

And therefore it was no wonder if she were still and answered not the Father of Heaven when He told her that she should be wedded to His Godhead. Then said the Second Person, Christ Jesu, whose manhood she loved so much, to her, "What sayst thou, Margery, daughter, to my Father of these words that He speaketh to thee? Art thou well pleased that it be so?" And then she would not answer the Second Person but wept wonder sore, desiring to have still Himself and in no wise to be departed from Him. Then the Second Person in Trinity answered to His Father for her and said, "Father, have her excused, for she is yet but young and not fully learned how she should answer."

And then the Father took her by the hand in her soul before the Son and the Holy Ghost and the Mother of Jesu, and all the twelve apostles and Saint Katherine and Saint Margaret, and many other saints and holy virgins with great multitude of angels, saying to her soul, "I take thee, Margery, for my wedded wife, for fairer, for fouler, for richer, for poorer, so that thou be buxom and bony to do what I bid thee do. For, daughter, there was never child so buxom to the mother as I shall be to thee both in well and in woe, to help thee and comfort thee. And thereto I make thee surety."

And then the creature with high devotion, with great plenty of tears, thanked God of this ghostly comfort holding herself in her own feeling right unworthy to any such grace as she felt, for she felt many great comforts, both ghostly comforts and bodily comforts. Sometimes she felt sweet smells with her nose; it were sweeter, her thought, than ever was any sweet earthly thing that she smelled before, nor she might never tell how sweet it were, for her thought she might have lived thereby if they would have lasted. Sometimes she heard with her bodily ears such sounds and melodies that she might not well hear what a man said to her in that time less he spoke the louder. These sounds and melodies had she heard every day the term of twenty-five years when this book was written, and especially when she was in devout prayer, also many times while she was at Rome and in England both.

She saw with her bodily eyes many white things flying all about her on every side as thick in a manner as motes in the sun; it were right subtle and comfortable, and the brighter that the sun shined, the better she might see them. She saw them diverse times and in many diverse places, both in church and in her chamber, at her meat and in her prayers, in field and in town, both going and sitting. And many times she was afraid what they might be, for she saw them as well on nights in darkness as on daylight. Then, when she was afraid of them, our Lord said unto her, "By this token, daughter, believe it is God that speaketh in thee, for whereso God is Heaven is, and where that God is there be many angels, and God is in thee and thou art in Him. And therefore be not afraid, daughter, for these betoken that thou hast many angels about thee to keep thee both day and night that no devil shall have power over thee nor none evil man to dere thee. Then from that time forward she used to say when she saw them come, "Benedictus qui venit in nomine domini." Also our Lord gave her another token, the which endured about sixteen year and it increased ever more and more, and that was a flame of fire wonder hot and delectable and right comfortable, not wasting but ever increasing, of lowe, for though the weather were never so cold, she felt the heat burning in her breast and at her heart, as verily as a man should feel the material fire if he put his hand or his finger therein.

When she felt first the fire of love burning in her breast, she was afraid thereof, and then our Lord answered to her mind and said, "Daughter, be not afraid, for this heat is the heat of the Holy Ghost, the which shall burn away all thy sins, for the fire of love quencheth all sins. And thou shalt understand by this token the Holy Ghost is in thee, and thou wost well wherethatever the Holy Ghost is there is the Father, and where the Father is there is the Son, and so thou hast fully in thy soul all the Holy Trinity. Therefore thou hast great cause to love me right well, and yet thou shalt have greater cause than ever thou haddest to love me, for thou shalt hear that thou never heardest, and thou shalt see that thou never saw, and thou shalt feel that thou never feltest. For, daughter, thou art as sekyr of the love of God as God is God. Thy soul is more sekyr of the love of God than of thine own body, for thy soul shall part from thy body but God shall never part from thy soul, for they be together without end. Therefore, daughter, thou hast as great cause to be merry as any lady in this world, and, if thou knew, daughter, how much thou pleasest me when thou suffrest me wilfully to speak in thee, thou shuldest never do otherwise, for in this is an holy life and the time is right well spent. For, daughter, this life pleaseth me more than wearing of habergeon or of the hair or fasting of bread and water, for if thou seydest every day a thousand Pater Noster, thou shouldest not please me so well as thou dost when thou art in silence and sufferest me to speak in thy soul.

36. "Fasting, daughter, is good for young beginners and discrete penance, namely that their ghostly father giveth them or enjoineth them for to do. And for to bid many beads it is good to them that can no better do, and yet it is not perfect. But it is a good way to perfectionward. For I tell thee, daughter, they that are great fasters and great doers of penance they wold that it should be held the best life; also they that give themselves to say many devotions they wold have that the best life, and they that give much alms they wold that that were held the best life. And I have oftentimes, daughter, told thee that thinking, weeping, and high contemplation is the best life in earth. And thou shall have more merit in heaven for one year of thinking in thy mind than for an hundred year of praying with thy mouth, and yet thou wilt not believe me, for thou wilt bid many beads whether I will or not.

"And yet, daughter, I will not be displeased with thee whether thou think, say, or speak, for I am always pleased with thee. And, if I were in earth as bodily as I was ere I died on the cross, I should not be ashamed of thee as many other men be, for I should take thee by the hand among the people and make thee great cheer that they should well know that I loved thee right well. For it is convenient the wife to be homely with her husband. Be he never so great a lord and she so poor a woman when he weddeth her, yet they must lie together and rest together in joy and peace. Right so must it be between thee and me, for I take no heed what thou hast been but what thou woldest be. And oftentimes have I told thee that I have clean forgiven thee all thy sins. Therefore must I needs be homely with thee and lie in thy bed with thee.

"Daughter, thou desirest greatly to see me, and thou maist boldly, when thou art in thy bed, take me to thee as for thy wedded husband, as thy dear-worthy darling, and as for thy sweet Son, for I will be loved as a son should be loved with the mother and will that thou love me, daughter, as a good wife ought to love her husband. And therefore thou maist boldly take me in the arms of thy soul and kiss my mouth, my head, and my feet as sweetly as thou wilt. And, as oftentimes as thou thinkest on me ere thou woldest do any good deed to me, thou shalt have the same meed in heaven as if thou didst it to mine own precious body which is in heaven, for I ask no more of thee but thine heart for to love, that loveth thee, for my love is ever ready to thee." Then gave she thanking and praising to our Lord Jesu Christ for the high grace and mercy that He showed unto her unworthy wretch.

This creature had diverse tokens in her bodily hearing. One was a manner of sound as it had been a pair of bellows blowing in her ear. She, being abashed thereof, was warned in her soul no fear to have for it was the sound of the Holy Ghost. And then our Lord turned that sound into the voice of a dove, and sithen He turned it into the voice of a little bird which is called a redbreast that sang full merrily oftentimes in her right ear. And then should she evermore have great grace after that she heard such a token. And she had been used to such tokens about twenty-five year at the writing of this book.

Then said our Lord Jesu Christ to His creature, "By these tokens mayst thou well witen that I love thee, for thou art to me a very mother and to all the world, for that great charity that is in thee, and yet I am cause of that charity myself, and thou shalt have a great mede therefore in heaven."

And, when she failed\(^9\) such as was needful for him, she went about to good men and good women and got such thing as was necessary unto him. He was so sick that men trusted no thing to his life, and his sickness was long continuing. Then on a time, as she was in the church hearing her mass and prayed for the same priest, our Lord said to her that he should live and fare right well.

Then was she stirred to go to Norwich to Saint Stephen's Church where is buried the good vicar,\(^1\) which died but little before that time, for whom God showed high mercy to His people, and thank Him for recuring\(^2\) of this priest.

She took leave of her confessor, going forth to Norwich. When she came in the church yard of Saint Stephen, she cried, she roared, she wept, she fell down to the ground, so fervently the fire of love burnt in her heart. Sithen she rose up again and went forth weeping into the church to the high altar, and there she fell down with boistous\(^3\) sobbings, weepings, and loud cries beside the grave of the good vicar, all ravished with ghostly\(^4\) comfort in the goodness of our Lord that wrought so great grace for His servant which had been her confessor and many times heard her confession of all her living,\(^5\) and ministered to her the precious sacrament of the altar diverse times.

And in so much was her devotion the more increased that she saw our Lord work so special grace for such a creature as she had been conversant with\(^6\) in his lifetime. She had so holy thoughts and so holy mendys\(^7\) that she might not measure\(^8\) her weeping nor her crying. And therefore the people had greatly marvel of her, supposing that she had wept for some fleshly or earthly affection, and said unto her, "What aileth thee woman? Why farest thus with thyself? We knew him as well as thou." Then were priests in the same place which knew her manner of working, and they charitefully led her to a tavern and made her full high and goodly cheer. Also there was a lady desired to have the said creature to mete.\(^1\) And therefore, as honesty wold,\(^2\) she went to the church there the lady heard her service, where this creature saw a fair image of our Lady cleped\(^3\) a Pieta. And through the beholding of that Pieta her mind was all wholly occupied in the Passion of our Lord Jesu Christ and in the compassion of our Lady, Saint Mary, by which she was compelled to cry full loud and weep full sore, as though she should have died.

Then came to her the lady's priest saying, "Damsel, Jesu is dead long sithen."\(^4\) When her crying was ceased, she said to the priest, "Sir, His death is as fresh to me as He had died this same day, and so me thinketh it ought to be to you and to all Christian people. We ought ever to have mind of His kindness and ever think of the doleful death that He died for us." Then the good lady, hearing her communication, said, "Sir, it is a good example to me, and to other men also, the grace that God worketh in her soul." And so the good lady was her advocate and answered for her. Sithen she had her home with her to mete and showed her full glad and goodly cheer as long as she would abide there. And soon after she cam home again to Lynn, and the foresaid priest, for whom she went most specially to Norwich, which had read her about seven year.\(^5\)

[MARGERY NURSES HER HUSBAND IN HIS OLD AGE]

It happed on a time that the husband of the said creature, a man in great age passing three score year, as he would have come down of his chamber barefoot and barelegged, he sledged or else failed of his footing and fell down to the ground fro the greses, and his head under him grievously broken and bruised, in so much that he had in his head five tents many days while his head was in healing. And, as God would, it was known to some of his neighbors how he was fallen down of the greses, peradventure through the din and the lushing of his falling. And so they came to him and found him lying with his head under him, half alive, all rowed with blood, never like to have spoken with priest ne with clerk but through high grace and miracle.

Then the said creature, his wife, was sent for, and so she came to him. Then was he taken up and his head was sewed, and he was sick a long time after that men weened that he should be dead. And then the people said, if he died, his wife was worthy to be hanged for his death, forasmuch as she might have kept him and did not. They dwelled not together, ne they lay not together, for, as is written before, the both with one assent and with free will of their either had made a vow to live chaste. And therefore to enchewen all perils they dwelled and sojourned in diverse places where no suspicion should be had of their incontinence, for first they dwelled together after that they had made their vow, and then the people slandered them and said they used their lust and their liking as they did before their vow-making. And when they went out on pilgrimage or to see and speak with other ghostly creatures, many evil folk whose tongues were their own hurt, failing the dread and love of our Lord Jesu Christ, deemed and said that they went rather to woods, groves, orvaleys to use the lust of their bodies that the people should not aspie it ne wit it. They, having knowledge of how prone the people was to deem evil of them, desiring to avoid all occasion, in as much as they might goody, by their good will and their both consenting, they parted asunder touching to their board and their chambers, and weened to board in diverse places. And this was the cause that she was not with him and also that she should not be letted fro her contemplation. And therefore when he had fallen and grievously was hurt, as is said before, the people said if he died, it was worthy that she should answer for his death.

Then she prayed to our Lord that her husband might live a year and she to be delivered out [of] slander if it were His pleasance. Our Lord said to her mind, 'Daughter, thou shalt have thy boon, for he shall live, and I have it pleased him.'
wrought a great miracle for thee that he was not dead. And I bid thee take him home and keep him for my love."

She said, "Nay, good Lord, for I shall then not tend to thee as I do now."

"Yes, daughter," said our Lord, "thou shalt have as much meed to keep him and help him in his need at home as if thou were in church to make thy prayers. And thou hast said many times that thou wouldst fain keep me. I pray thee now keep him for the love of me, for he hath sometime fulfilled thy will and my will both, and he hath made thy body free to me that thou shouldst serve me and live chaste and clean, and therefore I will that thou be free to help him at his need in my name."

"A, Lord," said she, "for thy mercy grant me grace to obey Thy will and fulfill Thy will and let never my ghostly enemies have no power to let me fro fulfilling of Thy will." Then she took home her husband to her and kept him years after as long as he lived and had full much labor with him, for in his last days he turned childish again and lacked reason, that he could not do his own easement to go to a sege or else he would not, but as a child voided his natural digestion in his linen clothes there he sat by the fire or at the table, whether it were, he would spare no place. And therefore was her labor much the more in washing and wringing and her costage in firing and letted her full much fro her contemplation that many times she should have irked her labor save she bethought her how she in her young age had full many delectable thoughts, fleshly lusts, and inordinate loves to his person. And therefore she was glad to be punished with the same person and took it much the more easily and served him and helped him, as her thought, as she would have done Christ himself.

[MARGERY'S VISION OF THE PASSION SEQUENCE]

Then she beheld in the sight of her soul our blissful Lord Christ Jesu coming to His passionward, and, ere He went, He kneeled down and took His mother's blessing. Then she saw His mother falling down in swooning before her Son, saying unto him, "Alas, my dear Son, how shall I suffer this sorrow and have no joy in all this world but thee alone."

"A, dear Son, if thou wilt algates die, let me die before thee and let me never suffer this day of sorrow, for I may never bear this sorrow that I shall have for thy death. I wolde, Son, that I might suffer death for thee so that thou shouldst not die, if man's soul might be so saved. Now, dear Son, if thou have no ruth of thyself, have ruth of thy mother, for thou wost full well there can no man in all this world comfort me but thou alone."

Then our Lord took up His mother in His arms and kissed her full sweetly and said to her, "A, blessed mother, be of a good cheer and of a good comfort, for I have told you full often that I must needs suffer death and elles should no man be saved ne never come in bliss. And mother, it is my Father's will that it be so, and therefore I pray you let it be your will also, for my death shall turn me to great worship and you and all mankind to great joy and profit which that trust in my Passion and work thereafter. And therefore, blessed mother, ye must abide here after me, for in you shall rest all the faith of Holy Church, and by your faith Holy Church shall increase in her faith. And therefore I pray you, dearworthy mother, ceaseth of your sorrowing, for I shall not leave you comfortless. I shall leave here with you John, my cousin, to comfort you in stead of me; I shall send my holy angels to comfort you in earth; and I shall comfort you in your soul mine own self, for, mother, ye wote well I have behyte you the bliss of heaven and that ye are sekir thereof. A dearworthy mother, what would ye better than there I am king ye for to be queen, and all angels and saints shall be buxom to your will. And what grace ye ask me I shall not deny your desire. I shall give you power over the devils that they shall be afraid of you and ye not of them. And also, my blessed mother, I have said to you before time that I shall come for you mine own self when ye shall pass out of this world with all mine angels and all mine saints that are in heaven and bring you before my Father with all manner of music, melody, and joy. And there shall I set you in great peace and rest without end. And there shall ye be crowned as for Queen of Heaven, as for lady of all the world, and as for Empress of Hell. And therefore, my dearworthy mother, I pray you blesseth me and let me go do my Father’s will, for therefore I came into this world and took flesh and blood of you.”

When the said creature beheld this glorious sight in her soul and saw how He blessed His mother and His mother him, and then His blessed mother might not speak one word more to Him but fell down to the ground, and so they parted asunder, His mother lying still as she had been dead, then the said creature thought she took our Lord Jesu Christ by the clothes and fell down at His feet, praying Him to bless her, and therewith she cried full loud and wept right sore, saying in her mind, “A, Lord, where shall I become? I had well lever that thou woldest slay me than let me abide in the world without thee, for without thee I may not abide here, Lord.” Then answered our Lord to her, “Be still, daughter, and rest you with my mother here and comfort thee in her, for she that is mine own mother must suffer this sorrow. But I shall come again, daughter, to my mother and comfort her and thee both and turn all your sorrow into joy.”

And then her thought our Lord went forth His way, and she went to our Lady and said, “A, blessed Lady, riseth up and let us follow your blessed son as long as we may see Him that I may look enough upon Him ere He die. A, dear Lady, how may your heart last and see your blissful son see all this woe? Lady, I may not dure it, and yit am I not His mother.” Then our Lady answered and said, “Daughter, thou hearest well it will none otherwise be, and therefore I must needs suffer it for my son’s love.”

And then her thought that they followed forth after our Lord and saw how He made His prayers to His Father in the Mount of Olives1 and heard the goodly answer that came from His Father and the goodly answer that He gave

His Father again. Then she saw how our Lord went to His disciples and bad them wake; His enemies were near.

And then came a great multitude of people with much light and many armed men with staves, swords, and poleaxes to seek our Lord Jesu Christ. Our merciful Lord as a meek lamb saying unto them, "Whom seek ye?" they answered with a sharp spirit, "Jesu of Nazareth." Our Lord again, "Ego sum." And then she saw the Jews fall down on the ground, they might not stand for dread, but anon they rose again and sought as they had done before. And our Lord asked, "Whom seek ye?" And they said again, "Jesu of Nazareth." Our Lord answered, 'I it am.'

And then anon she saw Judas come and kiss our Lord, and the Jews laid hands upon Him full violently. Then had our Lady and she much sorrow and great pain to see the Iamb of innocence so contemptibly be held and drawn with His own people that He was specially sent unto. And aswithe the said creature beheld with her ghostly eye the Jews putting a cloth before our Lord's eyes, beating Him and buffeting Him in the head and bobbing Him before His sweet mouth, crying full cruelly unto him, "Tell us now who smote thee." They spared not to spit in His face in the most shameful wise that they could. And then our Lady and she her unworthy handmaiden for the time wept and sighed full sore for the Jews fared so foully and so venemously with their blissful Lord. And they would not spare to tug his blissful ears and draw the hair of his beard.

And anon after she saw them draw off His clothes and make Him all naked and sithen drew Him forth afore them as it had been the most malefactor in all the world. And He went forth meekly afore them, all mother-naked as He was born, to a pillar of stone and spake no word again but let them do and say what they wolde. And there they bound Him to the pillar as straitly as they could and beat Him on His fair white body with baleys, th whips, and with scourges. And then her thought our Lady wept wonder sore. And therefore the said creature must needs weep and cry when she saw such ghostly sights in her soul as freshly and as verily as if it had been done in deed in her bodily sight, and her thought that our Lady and she were always together to see our Lord's pains.

Such ghostly sights had she every Palm Sunday and every Good Friday, and in many other ways both many years together. And therefore cried she and wept full sore and suffered full much despite and reproof in many a country. And then our Lord said to her soul, "Daughter, these sorrows and many more suffered I for thy love, and diverse pains, more than any man can tell in earth. Therefore, daughter, thou hast great cause to love me right well, for I have bought thy love full dear."

THE YORK PLAY OF THE CRUCIFIXION

ca. 1425

The climax of the mystery cycles (on the cycles see the introduction to "Mystery Plays") is reached with a sequence of plays about the passion, or suffering, of Christ. Everything in each cycle leads up to the Crucifixion, the turning point in human history, when the original sin of Adam and Eve is paid for by Christ's suffering and death. No cycle has a more dramatic series of passion plays than that performed at York, the longest of the four extant English cycles. Records of the York mystery plays begin to appear in the last quarter of the fourteenth century when York was, next to London, England's most populous and prosperous city. Richard II came to see the cycle in 1397. Sometime after 1415 the plays of the passion sequence were extensively revised by a gifted playwright referred to by scholars as the York Realist. The Crucifixion, although not written in that author's distinctive alliterative style, has sometimes been attributed to him, and is, in any case, a powerful example of late medieval dramatic art. It is also an especially powerful example of the representation of Christ in his suffering humanity that was characteristic of late medieval spirituality.

The York plays leading up to the Crucifixion are especially cruel: a silent Jesus is vilified, scourged, crowned with thorns, and battered and mocked in a sadistic game of blind man's bluff. Much of the York Crucifixion revolves around the mechanical difficulties the soldiers encounter in nailing Jesus to the Cross. The play focuses on the soldiers; they are villains, to be sure, but ordinary men engaged in what they see as ordinary work. They are not monsters.

The gory details, part of the play's "realism," create a shudder, but the play has larger designs on its audience. While the soldiers are hard at work, the audience see only them, complaining of bad workmanship in those who bored the nail holes too far apart, necessitating the stretching of Christ's arms. Only when Christ is raised does the audience recognize the full extent to which both soldiers and audience have been immune from the pain inflicted by the soldiers' work. When the Cross is finally raised, the actor-Christ speaks to "All men that walk by way or street" (cf. the lyric 'Ye that Pasen by the Weye,' derived from Lamentations 1.12). He thereby addresses the spectators in the streets of York as though they were representing the crowd around the Cross on Calvary, directly involving and implicating them in the drama and its theme of salvation. The soldiers may concentrate on their 'work' of nailing Christ to the Cross, but the audience is prompted to reflect on the relation between daily labor and the "works" of mercy incumbent upon each Christian. The meaning of Christ's words is, however, lost on the soldiers, who truly "know not what they do" and proceed to quarrel about possession of Christ's cloak.

CAST OF CHARACTERS

JESUS  FOUR SOLDIERS

[Calvary]

IST SOLDIER. Sir knights, take heed hither in hie,° haste
This deed on dergh we may not draw.¹

1. We may not delay the time of this deed.
Ye woot° yourself as well as I
How lords and leaders of our law
Has given doom that this dote° shall die.

2ND SOLDIER. Sir, all their counsel well we know.
Sen° we are comen to Calvary,
Let ilk° man help now as him awe."°

3RD SOLDIER. We are all ready, lo,
This forward° to fulfill.

4TH SOLDIER. Let hear how we shall do,
And go we tite theretill.²

1ST SOLDIER. It may not help here for to hone,"
If we shall any worship° win.

2ND SOLDIER. He must be dead needlings° by noon.

3RD SOLDIER. Then is good time that we begin.

4TH SOLDIER. Let ding° him down, then is he done:

1ST SOLDIER. He shall be set and learned soon³
With care° to him and all his kin.

2ND SOLDIER. The foulest dead° of all Shall he die for his deeds.

3RD SOLDIER. That means cross° him we shall.

4TH SOLDIER. Behold, so right he reads.°

1ST SOLDIER. Then to this work us must take heed,
So that our working be not wrang."°

2ND SOLDIER. None other note to neven is need,"
But let us haste him for to hang.

3RD SOLDIER. And I have gone for gear good speed," Both hammers and nails large and long."°

4TH SOLDIER. Then may we boldly do this deed.
Come on, let kill this traitor strong.

1ST SOLDIER. Fair might ye fall in fere⁶
That has wrought on this wise.

2ND SOLDIER. US needs not for to learm°
Such faitours° to chastise.

3RD SOLDIER. Sen ilk a thing is right arrayed,
The wiselier° now work may we.

4TH SOLDIER. The cross on ground is goodly graid,"
And bored° even as it ought to be.

1ST SOLDIER. Look that the lad on length be laid,
And made be fest° unto this tree."°

2ND SOLDIER. For all his fare he shall be flayed."°
That on assay° soon shall ye see.

3RD SOLDIER. Come forth, thou cursed knave,

2. And let's get to it quickly.
3. He'll be put in his place and taught quickly.
4. There is no need to mention any other business.
5. Quickly.
6. May you all have good luck together.
7. I.e., bored with holes for the nails, which were probably wooden.
8. I.e., the cross. "Fare": behavior.
9. I.e., in actual experience.
Thy comfort soon shall keel,
Thine hire here shall thou have.
Almighty God, my Father free,
Noble
Let these matters be made in mind:
Thou bade that I should buxom be,
For Adam plight for to be pined.
Here to dead I oblige me
Fro' that sin for to save mankind,
And sovereignly beseek I thee,
That they for me may favor find.
And from the Fiend them fend,
So that their souls be safe,
In wealth withouten end.
I keep nought else to crave.

We, hark, sir knights, for Mahound's blood.
Of Adam-kind is all his thought!
The warlock waxes worse than wood.
This doleful dead ne dreadeth he nought.
Thou should have mind, with main and mood.
I hope that he had been as good
Have ceased of sayings that he up sought.
Those saws shall rue him sore
For all his sauntering soon.
I'll speed them that him spare
Till he to dead be done.

Have done belive, boy, and make thee boun' at once / ready
And bend thy back unto this tree.
Behold, himself has laid him down,
In length and breadth as he should be.
This traitor here tainted of treason,
Go fast and fetch him then, ye three.
And sen he claimeth kingdom with crown,
Even as a king here hang shall he.

NOW certes I shall not fine
Ere his right hand be fest.
The left hand then is mine:
Let see who bears him best.

His limbs on length then shall I lead/ stretch
1. Render myself liable.
2. And above all I beseech thee.
3. 'We': an exclamation of surprise or displeasure.
'Mahound's': Muhammad's; the sacred figures of other religions were considered devils by Christians in the Middle Ages; the soldier is swearing by the Devil.
4. This devil grows worse than crazy.
5. You should think, with all your strength and wits.
6. I.e., to have ceased of the sayings that he thought up.
7. Behaving like a saint.
8. Bad luck to them that spare him.
And even unto the bore° them bring.

1ST SOLDIER. Unto his head I shall take heed,
And with my hand help him to hing.°

2ND SOLDIER. Now sen we four shall do this deed,
And meddle° with this unthrifty° thing,
Let no man spare for special speed,¹
Till that we have made ending.

3RD SOLDIER. This forward° may not fail,
Now are we right arrayed.²

4TH SOLDIER. This boy here in our bail³
Shall bide° full bitter braid.⁴

1ST SOLDIER. Sir knights, say, how work we now?

2ND SOLDIER. Yes, certes, I hope° I hold this hand.
And to the bore I have it brought.

Full buxomly° withouten band.⁵

1ST SOLDIER. Strike on then hard, for him thee bought.²

2ND SOLDIER. Yes, here is a stub° will safely stand:
Through bones and sinews it shall be sought,⁰
This work is well, I will warrant.⁶

1ST SOLDIER. Say, sir, how do we thore?⁰

3RD SOLDIER. It fails° a foot and more,
The sinews are so gone in.⁹

1ST SOLDIER. Why carp° ye so? Fast° on a cord
And tug him to, by top and tail.³

3RD SOLDIER. Yea, thou commands lightly° as a lord:
Come help to haul, with ill hail.⁶

1ST SOLDIER. Now certes° that shall I do certainly

3RD SOLDIER. And I shall tach° him to

4TH SOLDIER. I hope that mark° amiss be bored.

2ND SOLDIER. Then must he bide° in bitter bale.⁰

3RD SOLDIER. In faith, it was over-scantly scored,⁴
That makes it fouilly° for to fail.

1ST SOLDIER. Why carp° ye so? Fast° on a cord
And complain / fasten

1ST SOLDIER. Now certes° that shall I do certainly

3RD SOLDIER. And I shall tach° him to

4TH SOLDIER. Go we all four then to his feet:
So shall our space° be speedly° spend.

2ND SOLDIER. Let see, what bourd his bale might beet.

4TH SOLDIER. Ow! this work is all unmeet;°
This boring must be all amend.

1. Let nobody slacken because of his own welfare.
2. Drive the nail in hard, for him who redeemed thee: a splendidly anachronistic oath.
3. This arrangement may not fail: the arrangement is of the four soldiers at the four ends of the cross.
4. It was overcarelessly bored.
5. And stretch him to it, head and toe.
6. With bad luck to you.
7. Let's see, what trick could increase his suffering.
Ah, peace, man, for Mahound,
Let no man woot that wonder,
A rope shall rug him down,
If all his sinews go asunder.

That cord full kindly can I knit,
The comfort of this carl to keel.
Fest on then fast that all be fit.
It is no force how fell he feel.
I shall not cease, as I have seel.
And I shall fond him for to hit.
Ow, hail!
Have done, drive in that nail
So that no fault be found.

These cords have evil increased his pains
Ere he were till the borings brought.
Yea, asunder are both sinews and veins
On ilk a side, so have we sought.
Now all his gauds nothing him gains:
His sauntering shall with bale be bought.

Nay, sirs, another thing
Falls first to you and me:
They bade we should him hing
On height that men might see.

We woot well so their words were,
But sir, that deed will do us dere.
This harlot must be hanged here.
The mortise is made fit therefore.
We four raise it not right to-year.

Say, man, why carps thou so?
Thy lifting was but light.
He means there must be mo
To heave him up on height.

As I may have good luck.
His acting like a saint (?) shall be paid for with pain.
You and I must do first.
2. A hole in the ground shaped to receive the cross.
3. Fasten your fingers on it, all together.
Methink we four should do this deed,
And bear him to yon hill on high.

1ST SOLDIER.  It must be done withouten dread:
No more, but look ye be ready,
And this part shall I lift and lead.
On length he shall no longer lie.
Therefore now make you boun:°
Let bear him to yon hill.

4TH SOLDIER.  Then will I bear here down,
And tent his toes untill.

2ND SOLDIER.  We two shall see till either side,
For else this work will wry° all wrang."
3RD SOLDIER.  We are ready.
4TH SOLDIER.  Good sirs, abide,
And let me first his feet up fang."
2ND SOLDIER.  Why tent ye so to tales this tide?°
1ST SOLDIER.  Lift up!
[All lift the cross together.]

4TH SOLDIER.  Let see!
2ND SOLDIER.  Ow! Lift along!
3RD SOLDIER.  From all this harm he should him hide°
And° he were God.
4TH SOLDIER.  The Devil him hang!
1ST SOLDIER.  For great harm° I have hent:"
My shoulder is in sunder.
2ND SOLDIER.  And certes I am near shent," So long have I borne under.°

3RD SOLDIER.  This cross and I in two must twin°— Else breaks my back in sunder soon.
4TH SOLDIER.  Lay down again and leave° your din.
This deed for us will never be done.
[They lay it down.

1ST SOLDIER.  Assay," sirs, let see if any gin°
May help him up, withouten hone.°
For here should wight° men worship win,
And not with gauds° all day to gone.

2ND SOLDIER.  More wight° men than we Full few I hope° ye find.
3RD SOLDIER.  This bargain° will not be,"
For certes me wants wind.

4TH SOLDIER.  So will° of work never we wore.°
I hope this carl some cautels cast."
2ND SOLDIER.  My burden sat° me wonder sore:
Unto the hill I might not last.

4. Then I’ll carry the part down here and attend to his toes.
5. Why are you so intent on talking at a time like this?
6. So long have I borne it up.
7. I think this knave cast some spells.
404 / CHRIST'S HUMANITY

1ST SOLDIER. Lift up and soon he shall be thore. Therefore fasten your fingers fast. There 3RD SOLDIER. We, lo!
1ST SOLDIER. A little more!
4TH SOLDIER. Hold then!
2ND SOLDIER. How now?
3RD SOLDIER. The worst is past.
2ND SOLDIER. He weighs a wicked weight.
4TH SOLDIER. So may we all four say, Ere he was heaved on height And raised on this array.
1ST SOLDIER. He made us stand as any stones, So boistous was he for to bear.
3RD SOLDIER. Let down, so all his bones Are asunder now on sides sere.
4TH SOLDIER. The falling was more fell Than all the harms he had.
225 1ST SOLDIER. That falling was more fell Than all the harms he had. Now may a man well tell The least lirth of this lad.
3RD SOLDIER. Methinketh this cross will not abide Nor stand still in this mortise yit. At the first was it made overwide: That makes it wave, thou may well wit.
4TH SOLDIER. Here are wedges arrayed For that, both great and small. Where are our hammers laid That we should work withal?
1ST SOLDIER. We have them here even at our hand. Give me this wedge, I shall it in drive. Here is another yet ordand. Do take it me hither believe.
2ND SOLDIER. Lay on then fast. Yes. I warrand. I thring them sam, so mote I thrive.

8. For the purpose. 9. I press them together, so may I thrive.
9. Are pulled apart on every side.
Now will this cross fulfill stably stand:
All if he rave they will not rive. 2

1ST SOLDIER. Say, sir, how likes thou now
The work that we have wrought?

4-TH SOLDIER. We pray you, say us how Ye feel, or faint ye aught? 3

JESUS
All men that walk by way or street,
Take tent—ye shall no travail tine—
Behold mine head, mine hands, my feet,
And fully feel now ere ye fine
If any mourning may be meet
Or mischief measured unto mine.
My Father, that all bales may bete, 4
Forgive these men that do me pine. 5
What they work woot they nought:
Therefore my Father I crave
Let never their sins be sought, 6
But see their souls to save.

265 1ST SOLDIER. We, hark! he jangles like a jay.
2ND SOLDIER. Methink he patters like a pie. 7
3RD SOLDIER. He has been doand all this day,
And made great mening of mercy.
4TH SOLDIER. Is this the same that gun us say
That he was God's son almighty? 8

270 1ST SOLDIER. Therefore he feels full fell affray,
And doomed this day was for to die.

2ND SOLDIER. Yath! qui destruis templum? 9
3RD SOLDIER. His saws were so, certain.

275 4TH SOLDIER. And, sirs, he said to some
He might raise it again.

1ST SOLDIER. To muster that he had no might,
For all the cautels that he could cast;
All if he were in word so wight, 10
For all his force now is he fast.

2ND SOLDIER. This race must be rehearsed right 1
Through the world both east and west.

285 2ND SOLDIER. Yea, let him hang here still
And make mows on the moon. 12

4TH SOLDIER. Then may we wend at will.

1ST SOLDIER. Nay, good sirs, not so soon.

2. Even if he struggles, they will not budge.
3. Or do you feel somewhat faint?
4. Take heed, you shall not lose your labor.
5. My father, who may remedy all evils.
6. That he was the son of almighty God.
7. For that he suffers a full cruel assault.
9. Even though he was so clever in words.
10. This course of action must be repeated correctly.
For certes us needs another note:
This kirtle would I of you crave.

2ND SOLDIER. Nay, nay, sir, we will look by lot Which of us four falls it to have.

3RD SOLDIER. I read we draw cut for this coat.
Lo, see now soon, all sides to save.

4TH SOLDIER. The short cut shall win, that well ye woot,
Whether it fall to knight or knave.

1ST SOLDIER. Fellows, ye thar not flite,
For this mantle is mine.

2ND SOLDIER. Go we then hence tite,
This travail here we tine.

3. For surely we have another piece of business to settle.
4. See now straightway, to protect all parties.
5. Fellows, you don’t need to quarrel,
6. We’re wasting our time here.

Mystery Plays

The increasing prosperity and importance of the towns was shown by performances of the mystery plays—a sequence or ‘cycle’ of plays based on the Bible and produced by the city guilds, the organizations representing the various trades and crafts. The cycles of several towns are lost. Those of York and Chester have been preserved, the latter in a post-Reformation form. The Towneley plays, sometimes connected with Wakefield (Yorkshire), and those that constitute the so-called N-town plays from East Anglia treat comparable material, as do fragmentary survivals from elsewhere.

Medieval mystery plays had an immensely confident reach in both space and time. In York, for example, the theatrical space and time of this urban, amateur drama was that of the entire city, lasting from sunrise throughout the entire long summer holiday. The time represented ran from the Fall of the Angels and the Creation of the World right through to the end of time, in the Last Judgment. Between these extremities of the beginning and end of time, each cycle presents key episodes of Old Testament narrative, such as the Fall and the Flood, before presenting a concentrated sequence of freely interpreted New Testament plays focused on the life and Passion of Christ.

The church had its own drama in Latin, dating back to the tenth century, which developed through the dramatization and elaboration of the liturgy—the regular service—for certain holidays, the Easter morning service in particular. The vernacular drama was once thought to have evolved from the liturgical, passing by stages from the church into the streets of the town. However, even though the vernacular plays at times echo their Latin counterparts and although their authors may have been clerics, the mysteries represent an old and largely independent tradition of vernacular religious drama. As early as the twelfth century a Play of Adam in Anglo-Norman French was performed in England, a dramatization of the Fall with highly sophisticated dialogue, characterization, and stagecraft.

During the late fourteenth and the fifteenth centuries, the great English mystery cycles were formed in provincial, yet increasingly powerful and independent cities. They were the production of the city itself, with particular responsibility for staging and performance devolving onto the city guilds. A guild was also known as a ‘mystery,’ from Latin ministerium, whence the phrase ‘mystery plays.’ A guild combined the functions of modern trade union, club, religious society, and political action group.
The performance and staging required significant investments of time and money from amateur performers, the status of whose mystery might be at stake in the quality of their performance. Often the subject of the play corresponded to the function of the guild (thus the Pinners, or nail-makers, performed the York Crucifixion, for example). Most of our knowledge of the plays, apart from the texts themselves, comes through municipal and guild records, which tell us a great deal about the evolution, staging and all aspects of the production of the cycles. In some of the cities each guild had a wagon that served as a stage. The wagon proceeded from one strategic point in the city to another, and the play would be performed a number of times on the same day. In other towns, plays were probably acted out in sequence on a platform erected at a single location such as the main city square.

The cycles were performed every year at the time of one of two great early summer festivals—Whitsuntide, the week following the seventh Sunday after Easter, or Corpus Christi, a week later (falling somewhere between May 21 and June 24). They served as both religious instruction and entertainment for wide audiences, including unlearned folk like the carpenter in The Miller’s Tale (lines 405—74), who recalls from them the trouble Noah had getting his wife aboard the ark, but also educated laypeople and clerics, who besides enjoying the sometimes boisterous comedy would find the plays acting out traditional interpretations of Scripture such as the ark as a type, or prefiguration, of the church.

Thus the cycles were public spectacles watched by every layer of society, and they paved the way for the professional theater in the age of Elizabeth I. The rainbow in Noah’s Flood (lines 356—71; for the text of Noah’s Flood, go to Norton Literature Online) and the Angel’s Gloria in the Shepherds’ Play, with their messages of mercy and hope, unite actors and audience in a common faith. Yet the first shepherd’s opening speech, complaining of taxation and the insolent exploitation of farmers by “gentlery-men,” shows how the plays also served as vehicles of social criticism and reveal many of the rifts and tensions in the late-medieval social fabric.

The particular intersection of religious and civic institutions that made the cycles possible was put under strain from the beginning of the Reformation in England from the 1530s. Given the strength of civic institutions, the cycles survived into the reign of Elizabeth, but partly because they were identified with the Catholic Church, were suppressed by local ecclesiastical pressures in each city in the late 1560s and 1570s. The last performance of the York Cycle in 1569 is very nearly coincident with the opening of the first professional theater in Whitechapel (London) in 1567.

On the morality play—the other major form of theater that flourished in England in the fifteenth century and continued on into the sixteenth—see the headnote to Everyman (p. 463).

The Wakefield Second Shepherds’ Play in putting on the stage biblical shepherds and soldiers, medieval playwrights inevitably and often quite deliberately gave them the appearance and characters of contemporary men and women. No play better illustrates this aspect of the drama than the Second Shepherds’ Play, included in the Towneley collection of mystery plays and imaginatively based on scriptural material typical of the cycles. As the play opens, the shepherds complain about the cold, the taxes, and the high-handed treatment they get from the gentry—evils closer to shepherds on the Yorkshire moors than to those keeping their flocks near Bethlehem. The sophisticated dramatic intelligence at work in this and several other of the Wakefield plays belonged undoubtedly to one individual, who probably revised older, more traditional plays some time during the last quarter of the fifteenth century. His identity is not known, but because of his achievement scholars refer to him as the Wakefield Master. He was probably a highly educated cleric stationed in the vicinity of Wakefield. The Wakefield Master had a genius for combining comedy, including broad farce, with religion in ways that make them enhance one another. In the Second Shepherds’ Play, by linking the comic subplot of Mak and Gill with the solemn story of Christ’s nativity, the Wakefield Master has produced a dramatic parable of what the Nativity means in Christian history and in Christian hearts. No one will fail to observe the parallelism between the stolen sheep, ludicrously disguised as Mak’s latest heir, lying in the cradle, and the real Lamb of God, born in the stable among beasts. A complex of relationships based on this relationship suggests itself. But perhaps the most important point is that the charity twice shown by the shepherds—in the first instance to the supposed son of Mak and in the second instance to Mak and Gill when they decide to let them off with only the mildest of punishments—is rewarded when they are invited to visit the Christ Child, the embodiment of charity. The bleak beginning of the play, with its series of individual complaints, is ultimately balanced by the optimistic ending, which sees the shepherds once again singing together in harmony.

The Second Shepherds’ Play is exceptional among the mystery plays in its development of plot and character. There is no parallel to its elaboration of the comic subplot and no character quite like Mak, who has doubtless been imported into religious drama from popular farce. Mak is perhaps the best humorous character outside of Chaucer’s works in this period. A braggart of the worst kind, he has something of Falstaff’s charm; and he resembles Falstaff also in his grotesque attempts to maintain the last shreds of his dignity when he is caught in a lie. Most readers will be glad that the shepherds do not carry out their threat to have the death penalty invoked for his crime.

Following the 1994 edition of the Early English Text Society, the stanza, traditionally printed as nine lines (with an opening quatrain of four long lines, the first halves of which rhyme with one another) is rendered here as “thirteeners,” rhyming ah ah ababcdddc.

COLL  Lord, what these weathers are cold,
And I am ill happed;0
I am nearhand dold,0
So long have I napped;
My legs they fold,9
My fingers are chapped.
It is not as I wold,9

1. The text is based on the (1994) edition by A. C. Cawley and Martin Stevens, but has been freely edited. Spelling has been normalized except where rhyme makes changes impossible. Because the original text has no indications of scenes and only four stage directions, written in Latin, appropriate scenes of action and additional stage directions have been added; the four original stage directions are identified in the notes.
For I am all lapped\(^0\) wrapped
In sorrow:
In storms and tempest,
Now in the east, now in the west,
Woe is him that has never rest
Midday nor morrow.

But we sely\(^1\) hapless husbands\(^2\)
That walks on the moor,
In faith we are nearhands\(^3\) nearly
Out of the door.\(^4\) homeless
No wonder, as it stands
If we be poor,
For the tilth of our lands
Lies fallow as the floor,\(^5\)
As ye ken.\(^6\) know
We are so hammed,
Fortaxed, and rammed,
We are made hand-tamed
With these gentlery-men.\(^4\)

Thus they reave\(^6\) rob us our rest—
Our Lady them wary!\(^7\) curse
These men that are lord-fest,\(^8\) attached to lords
They cause the plow tarry.\(^5\)
That, men say, is for the best—
We find it contrary.
Thus are husbands oppressed
In point to miscarry.
On live.\(^6\)
Thus hold they us under,
Thus they bring us in blunder.\(^6\) trouble
It were a great wonder
And\(^9\) ever should we thrive.

There shall come a swain\(^9\) fellow
As proud as a po: peacock
He must borrow my wain,\(^8\) wagon
My plow also;
Then I am full fain\(^9\) glad
To grant ere he go.
Thus live we in pain,
Anger, and woe,
By night and by day.
He must have if he lang\(^9\) it,

2. Farmers. The shepherds are also tenant farmers.
3. The arable part of our land lies fallow (as flat) as the floor. Landowners were converting farmland to pasture for sheep.
4. We are so hamstrung, overtaxed, and beaten down [that] we are made to obey these gentry folk.

Coll is here complaining about the peasants’ hard lot, at the mercy of retainers of the wealthy landowners.
5. Hold up the plow, i.e., interfere with the farm work.
6. In life. "In point to miscarry": to the point of ruin.
If I should forgang it,
I were better be hanged
Than once say him nay.

For may he get a paint-sleeve
Or brooch nowadays,
Woe is him that him grieve
Or once again-says.
Dare no man him reprieve,
What mastery he maes.
And yet may no man lieve
One word that he says,
No letter.
He can make purveyance
With boast and bragance,
And all is through maintenance
Of men that are greater.

It does me good, as I walk
Thus by mine one,
Of this world for to talk
In manner of moan.
To my sheep I will stalk,
And hearken anon,
There abide on a balk,
Or sit on a stone,
Full soon;
For I trow, pardie,
True men if they be,
We get more company
Ere it be noon.

| Enter GIB, who at first does not see COLL. |

GIB Benste and Dominus,
What may this bemean?
Why fares this world thus?
Such have we not seen.
Lord, these weathers are spiteous
And the winds full keen,
And the frosts so hideous
They water mine een,
No lie.
Now in dry, now in wet,
Now in snow, now in sleet,

7. Even if I have to do without it.
8. In the manuscript, this stanza follows the next.
9. An embroidered sleeve, part of the liver}' worn by the landlord's officers as a badge of authority.
1. No matter what force he uses.
2. Requisition (of private property).
3. Practice of retaining servants under a nobleman's protection with the power to lord it over his tenants.
4. A raised strip of grassland dividing parts of a field.
5. I.e., if the other shepherds keep their promise to meet Coll.
6. Bless us and Lord.
When my shoon freeze to my feet
It is not all easy.

But as far as I ken, see
Or yet as I go, walk
We sely wedmen, hapless / married, men
Dree mickle woe;
We have sorrow then and then— constantly
It falls oft so.
Sely Copple, our hen, see Both to and fro
She cackles;
But begin she to croak,
To groan or to cluck.
Woe is him is our cock.
For he is in the shackles.

These men that are wed
Have not all their will;
When they are full hard stead beset
They sigh full still, constantly God wot they are led Full hard and full ill;
In bower nor in bed
They say nought theretill.
This tide found, learned
I know my lesson:
Woe is him that is bun, bound (in wedlock)
For he must abide.

But now late in our lives—
A marvel to me,
That I think my heart rives splits
Such wonders to see;
What that destiny drives
It should so be—
Some men will have two wives,
And some men three
In store. miserable
Some are woe that has any,
But so far can I know
Woe is him that has many,
For he feels sore.

But young men a-wooing,
For God that you bought, redeemed
Be well ware of wedding

7. Silly Copple, our hen, i.e., Gib's wife, who hampers him.
8. What destiny causes must occur,
9. i.e., by remarrying after being widowed.
And think in thy thought:

"Had I wist" is a thing known
That serves of nought.

Mickle still mourning much / continual
Has wedding home brought,
And griefs,
With many a sharp shower, fight
For thou may catch in an hour
That shall sow thee full sour that which / vex / bitterly
As long as thou livest.

For as ever read I pistle, known
I have one to my fere
As sharp as a thistle,
As rough as a brere; briar
She is browed like a bristle,
With a sour-loten cheer;
Had she once wet her whistle
She could sing full clear
Her Pater Noster.

She is great as a whale;
She has a gallon of gall:
By him that died for us all,
I would I had run to till I lost her.

Coll God look over the raw!
[to Gib] Full deafly ye stand!

Gib Yea, the devil in thy maw* guts
So tariand!6
Saw thou awhere* of Daw? anywhere

Coll Yea, on a lea-land* pasture land
Heard I him blaw.5 blow (his horn)
He comes here at hand,
Not far.
Stand still.

Gib Why?

Coll For he comes, hope I. think
Gib He will make us both a lie
But iP we be ware. unless [Enter Daw, who does not see the others.

10 Daw Christ's cross me speed
And Saint Nicholas18

1. Epistle, i.e., part of the church service.
2. As my mate.
3. She has brows like pig's bristles and a sour-looking face.
4. "Our Father," or The Lord's Prayer.
5. I.e., God watch over the audience! Coll has been trying to get Gib's attention as the latter harangues the audience.
6. For being so late.
7. Daw (Davy) is a boy working for the older shepherds.
8. May Christ's cross and St. Nicholas help me.
Thereof had I need:
It is worse than it was.
Whoso could take heed
And let the world pass,
It is ever in dread
And brickie\(^0\) as glass,
And slithes.\(^0\)
This world foor\(^0\) never so,
With marvels mo\(^0\) and mo,
Now in weal, now in woe,
And all thing writhes.\(^9\)

Was never sin\(^*\) Noah’s flood
Such floods seen,
Winds and rains so rude
And storms so keen:
Some stammered, some stood
In doubt,\(^9\) as I ween.\(^9\)
Now God turn all to good!
I say as I mean.
For ponder:\(^9\)
These floods so they drown
Both in fields and in town,
And bears all down,
And that is a wonder.

We that walk on the nights
Our cattle to keep.\(^9\)
We see sudden\(^6\) sights
When other men sleep.
Yet methink my heart lights:
I see shrews peep.

[He sees the others, but does not hail them]
Ye are two tall wights.\(^8\)
I will give my sheep
A turn.
But full ill have I meant:\(^2\)
As I walk on this bent\(^*\) field
I may lightly\(^6\) repent,
My toes if I spurn.\(^9\)

Ah, sir, God you save,
And master mine!
A drink fain\(^*\) would I have,
And somewhat to dine.

\(^9\) Probably refers to people’s consternation at the time of Noah’s Flood.
\(^1\) I see rascals peeping. Daw is relieved to recognize the other shepherds aren’t monstrous apparitions.
\(^2\) But that’s a very poor idea (to give the sheep a turn).
COLL  Christ’s curse, my knave,
Thou art a lither ε hine!°

GIB  What, the boy list rave!
Abide unto sine.³

III  We have made it.⁴

Though the shrew⁵ came late
Yet is he in state
To dine—if he had it.

DAW  Such servants as I,
That ε sweats and swinks,⁰
Eats our bread full dry,
And that me forthinks,⁰
We are oft wet and weary
When master-men winks,⁰
Yet comes full lately⁹
Both dinners and drinks.
But nately⁶
Both our dame and our sire,⁴
When we have run in the mire,
They can nip at our hire,⁶
And pay us full lately.

But here my troth, master,
For the fare⁰ that ye make⁰
I shall do thereafter:
Work as I take.⁷

I shall do a little, sir,
And among⁰ ever lake,⁰
For yet lay my supper
Never on my stomach⁸
In fields.

Where to should I threap?⁰
With my staff can I leap,⁰
And men say, “Light cheap
Litherly foryields.”³⁹

COLL  Thou were an ill lad
To ride a-wooing
With a man that had
But little of spending.¹

GIB  Peace, boy, I bade—
No more jangling,
Or I shall make thee full rad," quickly (stop)

By the heaven’s King!

3. The boy must be crazy! Wait till later.
4. Bad luck on thy head!
5. I.e., mistress and master.
6. They can deduct from our wages.
7. I.e., work (as little) as I am paid.
8. I.e., a full stomach has never weighed me down.
9. A cheap bargain repays badly (a proverb).
1. You would be a bad servant to take wooing for a man with little money to spend.
With thy gauds—
Where are our sheep, boy?—we scorn.

DAW Sir, this same day at mom
I left them in the corn
When they rang Lauds.

They have pasture good,
They cannot go wrong.

COLL That is right. By the rood,
These nights are long!
Yet I would, ere we yode,
One gave us a song.

GIB So I thought as I stood,
To mirth US among.

DAW I grant.

COLL Let me sing the tenory.

GIB And I the treble so hee.

DAW Then the mean falls to me.

[Enter MAK with a cloak over his clothes.]

MAK Now, Lord, for thy names seven,
That made both moon and starns
Well mo than I can neven—
Thy will, Lord, of me tharns.
I am all uneven—
That moves oft my hams.
Now would God I were in heaven,
For there weep no barns.

So still.

COLL Who is that pipes so poor?

MAK [aside] Would God ye wist how I foor!
[aloud] Lo, a man that walks on the moor
And has not all his will.

GIB Mak, where has thou gane?
Tell us tiding.

DAW. Is he come? Then ilkane

MAK What! Ich be a yeoman,
I tell you, of the king,

2. We scorn (your tricks).
3. The first church service of the day (morn) but performed while it is still dark.
4. Stage direction in the original manuscript.
5. Thy will, Lord, falls short in regard to me.
6. That often disturbs my brains.
7. Each one look to his possessions (lest Mak steal them). The stage direction below is in the manuscript.
8. I (a southern dialect form in contrast with the northern dialect spoken by the Yorkshire shepherds). Mak pretends to be an important person from the south.
The self and the same,
Sond° from a great lording messenger
And sich° suchlike go
Fie on you! Goth° hence
Out of my presence:
I must have reverence.
Why, who be ich?

COLL. Why make ye it so quaint?°
Mak, ye do wrang.°
GIB. But, Mak, list ye saint?
I trow that ye Iang.¹
DAW. I trow the shrew can paint2—
The devil might him hang!
MAK. Ich shall make complaint be flogged
At a word,
And tell even° how ye doth.
COLL. But Mak, is that sooth?
Now take out that Southern tooth,¹
And set in a turd!°

GIB. Mak, the devil in your ee!°
A stroke would I lean° you!
DAW. Mak, know ye not me?
By God, I could teen° you.
GIB. Shrew, peep!°
Thus late as thou goes,
What will men suppose?
And thou has an ill nose?
Of stealing sheep.

MAK. And I am true as steel,
All men wate.°
But a sickness I feel
That holds me full hate:° hot, feverish
My belly fares not weel,
It is out of estate.
DAW. Seldom lies the de’el°
Dead by the gate.³
MAK. Therefore⁹
Full sore am I and ill

9. Why are you putting on such airs?
1. Do you want to play the saint? I guess you long (to do so).
2. I think the rascal knows how to put on false colors.
3. I.e., now stop pretending to speak like a southerner.
4. I.e., shut up!
5. Can you now remember (who you are)?
6. Rascal, watch out.
7. Noise, i.e., reputation.
8. Road, i.e., the devil is always on the move.
9. Mak ignores Daw and continues his speech from line 331.
If I stand stone-still,
I eat not a needill\(^1\)
This month and more.

COLL How fares thy wife? By my hood,
How fares sho?\(^2\)

MAK Lies waltering,\(^3\) by the rood,
By the fire, lo!
And a house full of brood.\(^4\)
She drinks well, too:
III speed other good
That she will do!\(^5\)

But sho
Eats as fast as she can;
And ilk° year that comes to man

And run in the mire.
Wake thou.\(^7\)
[Lies down.]
GIB Nay, I will lie down by,
For I must sleep, truly.
[Lies down beside him.]
DWW As good a man's son was I
As any of you.

[Lies down and motions to MAK to lie between them.]

1. As sure as I'm standing here as still as a stone,
I haven't eaten a needle (i.e., a tiny bit).
2. I.e., that (drinking) is the only good she does.
3. I.e., near the truth.
4. The penny paid to sing a mass for her soul; i.e.,
I wish she were dead.
5. Exhausted from lack of sleep.
6. I should take a cut in wages.
But Mak, come hither, between Shall thou lie down.
MAK. Then might I let you bedeen
Of that ye would rown.\(^8\)

Now were time for to reel:\(^0\)
But he needs good counseel\(^0\)
That fain would fare weel\(^1\)
And has but little spending.\(^0\)
[He draws a magic circle around the shepherds and recites a spell.]

But about you a circill,\(^0\)
As round as a moon,
To\(^\ast\) I have done that\(^0\) I will,
Till that it be noon,
That ye lie stone-still
To\(^\ast\) that I have done;
And I shall say there\(^\ast\)
Of good words a foon:\(^\ast\)
"On hight,
Over your heads my hand I lift.
Out go your eyes! Fordo your sight!"\(^2\)
But yet I must make better shift
And it be right.\(^3\)

Lord, what\(^4\) they sleep hard—
That may ye all hear.
Was I never a shephard,
But now will I lear.\(^4\)
If the flock be scar\(d\),

8. Then I might be in the way if you wanted to whisper together.
1. One of the original stage directions.
2. May your sight be rendered powerless.
3. If it is to turn out all right.
Yet shall I nip near.\(^4\)
How! Draws hitherward!\(^5\)
Now mends our cheer
From sorrow.
A fat sheep, I dare say!
A good fleece, dare I lay?\(^6\)
Eft-quite\(^7\) when I may,
But this will I borrow.

[He catches one.

[Moves with the sheep to his cottage and calls from outside.]

How, Gill, art thou in?
Get us some light.
GILL [inside] Who makes such a din
This time of the night?
I am set for to spin;
I hope not I might Rise a penny to win—
I shrew\(^6\) them on height!
So fares
A housewife that has been
To be raised thus between:
Here may no note be seen
For such small chares.\(^7\)

MAK Good wife, open the hek!\(^6\) door
Sees thou not what I bring?
GILL I may thole thee draw the sneck.\(^8\)
Ah, come in, my sweeting.\(^9\) sweetheart
MAK Yea, thou thar not reck
Of my long standing.\(^9\)

[She opens the door.]

GILL By the naked neck
Art thou like for to hing.\(^9\)
MAK Do way!\(^10\) let it be
I am worthy\(^9\) my meat,
For in a strait\(^8\) I can get
More than they that swink\(^9\) and sweat
All the long day.

Thus it fell to my lot,
Gill, I had such grace.\(^10\)

GILL It were a foul blot

---

4. Even if the flock is alarmed, yet shall I grip (a sheep) close.
5. Stop! come this way.
6. I don’t think I can earn a penny by getting up (from my work).
7. So it goes with anyone who has been a housewife—to be interrupted like this: no work gets done here because of such petty chores.
8. I’ll let you draw the latch.
9. Sure, you needn’t care about keeping me standing a long time.
To be hanged for the ease.

Mak I have ’scape, Jelot,
Of as hard a glase.

Gill But "So long goes the pot
To the water," men says,
"At last Comes it home broken."

Mak Well know I the token,
But let it never be spoken!
But come and help fast.

I would he were flain,
I list well eat:
This twelvemonth was I not so fain
Of one sheep-meat.

Gill Come they ere he be slain,
And hear the sheep bleat—
Mak Then might I be ta’en—
That were a cold sweat!
Go spar
The gate-door.

Gill A good bourd have I spied,
Sin’ thou can none.
Here shall we him hide
To they be gone,
In my cradle. Abide!
Let me alone,
And I shall lie beside
In childbed and groan.

Mak Thou red,
And I shall say thou was light
Of a knave-child this night.

Gill Now well is me day bright
That ever I was bred.

This is a good guise
And a far-cast:
Yet a woman’s advice
Helps at the last.
I wot never who spies:
Again go thou fast.

Mak But I come ere they rise,
Else blows a cold blast.

1. Then I might have to pay the devil the worse on account of the whole pack of them.
2. Now lucky for me the bright day I was born.

MAK  Ah, Gill, what cheer?
       It is I, Mak, your husband.
GILL  Then may we see here
       The devil in a band,
       Sir Guile!
       Lo, he comes with a lote
       As he were holden in' the throat:
       I may not sit at my note
       A hand-long' while.

MAK  Will ye hear what fare  she makes

       And clows her toes?
GILL  Why, who wanders? Who wakes?
       Who comes? Who goes?
       Who brews? Who bakes?
       What makes me thus hose?
       It is ruth to behold,
       Now in hot, now in cold,
       Full woeful is the household
       That wants a woman.

But what end has thou made
With the herds, Mak?
MAK  The last word that they said

Hear ye not how she groans?
Your hearts should melt.

Out, thieves, from my barn!!°
Nigh him not thore!!!°
Wist ye how she had farn,°
Your hearts would be sore.
You do wrong, I you warn,
That thus comes before°
To a woman that has farn°—
But I say no more.

Ah, my middill!!°
I pray to God so mild,
If ever I you beguiled,
That I eat this child
That lies in this cradill.

Peace, woman, for God's pain,
And cry not so!
Thou spills° thy brain
And makes me full woe.

I trow our sheep be slain.
What find ye two?

3. I.e., the sheep.
4. Either female or male.
5. As I hope to have salvation.
6. He learned early to steal who could not say no
7. You come for the purpose of robbing us.
8. Don't come close to him there.
9. If you knew how she had fared (in labor).
DAW All work we in vain;
As well may we go.
But hatters! I can find no flesh,
Hard nor nesh, soft
Salt nor fresh, em-pty
But two tome platters.
Quick cattle but this, Tame nor wild,
None, as I have bliss,
As loud as he smiled. [Approaches the cradle.]
GILL No, so God me bliss, bless
And give me joy of my child!
COLL We have marked aimed—
I hold consider us beguiled.
GIB Sir, don’t total! [to MAK] Sir—Our Lady him save!—
Is your child a knave?
MAK Any lord might him have, lie
This child, to his son.

When he wakens he kips, snatches, grabs
That joy is to see.
DAW In good time to his hips, in accord
And in sely.
But who were his gossips, quarrel
So soon ready?
MAK SO fair fall their lips— faith
COLL Hark, now, a Lee, lie
MAK So God them thank,
Perkin, and Gibbon Waller, I say,
And gentle John Home, in good fay—
He made all the garray
With the great shank.

GIB Mak, friends will we be, in accord
For we are all one.
MAK We? Now I hold for me, in accord
For mends get I none.
Farewell all three, quarrel
All glad were ye gone.
DAW Fair words may there be,
But love is there none
This year. [They go out the door.]

1. An expression of consternation.
2. Livestock other than this (the baby).
3. Smelled as strongly as he (the missing ram).
4. Boy (although Mak takes the alternate meaning of "rascal").
5. Good luck and happiness to him.
6. May good luck befall them.
7. An allusion to a dispute among the shepherds in the author’s First Shepherds’ Play.
8. I’ll look out for myself, for I’ll get no compensation.
9. I.e., I would be glad.
COLL  Gave ye the child anything?
GIB  I trow not one farthing.
Daw  Fast again will I fling.
Abide ye me there.
[He runs hack.]

Mak, take it no grief.
If I come to thy bam.°
Mak  Nay, thou does me great reprief,°
And foul has thou farn.°
Daw  The child it will not grief,
That little day-star.°
Mak, with your leaf,°
Let me give your barn
But sixpence.
Mak  Nay, do way! He sleeps.
Daw  Methinks he peeps.°
Mak  When he wakens he weeps.
I pray you go hence.

[The other shepherds reenter.]

Daw  Give me leave him to kiss,
And lift up the clout.°
[lifts the cover]
What the devil is this?
He has a long snout!
Coll  He is marked amiss.
We wot ill about.°
Gib  Ill-spun weft, ywis,
Ay comes foul out.°
Aye, so!
He is like to our sheep.
Daw  How, Gib, may I peep?
Coll  I trow kind will creep
Where it may not go.°

Gib  This was a quaint gaud
And a far-cast.°
It was high fraud.
Daw  Yea, sirs, was’t.°
Let bren° this bawd
And bind her fast.
A false scaud°
Hang at the last:°
So shall thou,
Will you see how they swaddle

1. He is deformed. We know something fishy is going on around here.
2. An ill-spun web, indeed, always comes out badly (proverbial), i.e., ill work always comes to a bad end.
3. Nature will creep where it can’t walk (proverbial), i.e., nature will reveal itself by hook or crook.
4. This was a cunning trick and a clever ruse.
5. Will hang in the end.
His four feet in the middle?
Saw I never in the cradle
A horned lad ere now.

MAK Peace bid I! What,
Let be your fare!°
I am he that him gat.°
And yond woman him bare.

COLL What devil shall he hat?°
Lo, God, Mak's heir!

GIB Let be all that!
Now God give him care°—
I sawgh°

GILL A pretty child is he
As sits on a woman's knee,
A dillydown,° pardie,°
To gar° a man laugh.

DAW I know him by the earmark—
That is a good token.
MAK I tell you, sirs, hark,
His nose was broken.
Sithen° told me a clerk
That he was forspoken.°

COLL This is a false wark.°
I would fain be broken.°
Get wapen.°

GILL He was taken with an elf°
I saw it myself—
When the clock struck twelf
Was he forshapen.°

GIB Ye two are well feft
Sam in a stead.°

DAW Sin° they maintain their theft,
Let do° them to dead.°
MAK If I trespass oft,°
Gird° off my head.
With you will I be left.°

COLL Sirs, do my read:°
For this trespass
We will neither ban° ne flite,° Fight nor chite,°
But have done as tite,°
And cast him in canvas.

[They toss MAK in a blanket.]

6. What the devil shall he be named?
7. He was stolen by a fairy, i.e., the baby is a changeling.
8. You two are well endowed in the same place, i.e., you are two of a kind.
9. I put myself at your mercy.
[The fields]

Coll. Lord, what\(^6\) I am sore, how
In point for to burst!\(^9\)
In faith, I may no more— rest
Therefore will I rest.\(^9\)

Gib. As a sheep of seven score\(^1\)
He weighed in my fist: anywhere
Methink that I list.\(^5\)

Daw. Now I pray you
Lie down on this green. think

Coll. On the thieves yet I mean.\(^6\)
Daw. Whereto should ye teen?\(^5\) be angry
Do as I say you. [They lie down.]

[An Angel sings Gloria in Excelsis and then speaks.]

Angel. Rise, herdmen hend,\(^9\) gracious
For now is he born devil
That shall take fro the fiend\(^0\)
That Adam had lorn;\(^3\)
That warlock\(^0\) to shend,\(^9\) devil / destroy
This night is he born.
God is made your friend
Now at this morn,
He behestys.\(^0\)
At Bedlem\(^0\) go see: promises
There lies that free,\(^0\)
In a crib full poorly,
Betwixt two bestys.\(^0\)

[The Angel withdraws.]

Coll. This was a quaint\(^6\) Steven\(^9\) marvelous / voice
That ever yet I hard.\(^0\)
It is a marvel to neven\(^0\)
Thus to be scar’d.\(^9\)

Gib. Of God’s Son of heaven
He spake upward.\(^9\) on high
All the wood on a leven
Methought that he gard
Appear.\(^4\)

Daw. He spake of a barn\(^9\)
In Bedlem, I you warn.\(^0\) child

Coll. That betokens yond starn.
Let us seek him there.

1. I.e., 140 pounds.
2. This is an original stage direction: "Glory [to God] in the highest" (see Luke 2.14).
3. That [which] Adam had brought to ruin.
4. I thought he made the whole woods appear in a flash of light.
5. That’s what yonder star means.
GIB Say, what was his song?
Heard ye not how he cracked it?
Three breves to a long?

DAW Yea, marry, he hacked it.
Was no crochet wrong,
Nor nothing that lacked it.

COLL For to sing us among,
Right as he knocked it,
I can.

GIB Let see how ye croon!
Can ye bark at the moon?

DAW Hold your tongues! Have done!

COLL Hark after, than!

GIB To Bedlem he bade
That we should gang:
I am full afraid
That we tarry too long.

DAW Be merry and not sad;
Of mirth is our sang:
Everlasting glad
To meed may we fang.

COLL Without noise
Hie we thither forth:
To that child and that lady;
If we be wet and weary, though
We have it not to lose.

GIB We find by the prophecy—
Let be your din!—
Of David and Isay,
And mo than I min.
That prophesied by clergy
That in a virgin
Should he light and lie,
To sloken our sin
And slake it,
Our kind, from woe,
For Isay said so:
Ecce virgo
Concipiet a child that is naked.

DAW Full glad may we be
And we abide that day
That lovely to see,
That all mights may.

6. Trilled it: a technical musical term, close in meaning to hacked and knocked: to break (notes), to sing in a lively or ornate manner (cf. lines 685 and 687).
7. That it lacked.
8. We must not neglect it.
9. Of David and Isaiah and more than I remember.
1. Behold, a virgin shall conceive (Isaiah 7.14).
2. I.e., when we see that lovely one who is all-powerful.
Lord, well were me
For once and for aye
Might I kneel on my knee,
Some word for to say
To that child.
But the angel said
In a crib was he laid,
He was poorly arrayed,
Both meaner and mild.

Patriarchs that has been,
And prophets before,
That desired to have seen
This child that is born,
They are gone full clean—
That have they lost.
We shall see him, I wot,
Ere it be morn,
To token.
When I see him and feel,
Then wot I full well
It is true as steel
That prophets have spoken:

To so poor as we are
That he would appear,
First find and declare
By his messenger.

Go we now, let us fare,
The place is us near.
I am ready and yare;
Go we in fere
To that bright.
Lord, if thy will be—
To comfort thy poor

[They go to Bethlehem and enter the stable.]

Hail, comely and clean!
Hail, young child!
Hail Maker, as I mean,
OP a maiden so mild!
Thou has waried, I wot
The warlock so wild.
The false guiler of teen,
Now goes he beguiled.
Lo, he merries!

3. That sight have they lost.
4. As a sign.
5. Find (us) first (of all), and make known (his birth).
6. Some kind of cheer.
7. The false grievous deceiver, i.e., the devil.
Lo, he laughs, my sweeting! A well fair meeting! I have holden my hating. Have a bob of cherries.

GIB Hail, sovereign Saviour, For thou has us sought! Hail freely food and flour, That all thing has wrought! Hail, full of favour, That made all of nought! Hail! I kneel and I cower. To my barn. Hail, little tiny mop! Of our creed thou art crop. I would drink on thy cup, Little day-star.

MIDDLE ENGLISH LYRICS

It was only late in the fourteenth century that English began to develop the kinds of aristocratic, formal, learned, and literary types of lyric that had long been cultivated on the Continent by the Troubadour poets in the south of France, the Minnesanger in Germany (German Minne corresponds to French fine amour—that is, refined or aristocratic love), or the Italian poets whose works Dante characterized as the dolce stil nuovo (the sweet new style). Chaucer, under the influence of French poets, wrote lovers’ complaints, homiletic poetry, and verse letters in the form of ballades, rondels, and other highly stylized lyric types (see pp. 316—18). In the fifteenth century, John Lydgate, Thomas Hoccleve, and others following Chaucer wrote lyrics of this sort, which were praised for embellishing the English language, and these along with Chaucer’s were collected in manuscript anthologies that were produced commercially for well-to-do buyers.

Chaucer, his courtly predecessors, and their followers were of course familiar with and influenced by an ancient tradition of popular song from which only a small fraction survives. With one exception, the Middle English lyrics included in this section are the work of anonymous poets and are difficult to date with any precision. Some of these survive in a single manuscript, especially in anthologies of religious poetry and prose. The topics and language in these poems are highly conventional, yet the lyrics often seem remarkably fresh and spontaneous. Many are marked by strong accentual rhythms with a good deal of alliteration. Their pleasure does not come from originality or lived experience but from variations of expected themes and images. Some were undoubtedly set to music, and in a few cases the music has survived. Perhaps the earliest of those printed here, “The Cuckoo Song,” is a canon or round in which the voices follow one another and join together echoing the joyous cry, “Cuckou.” (For a performance of this song, go to Norton Literature Online.) The rooster and hen in The Nun’s Priest’s Tale sing “My Lief Is Faren in Londe” in “sweet accord.” “I Am of Ireland” was undoubtedly accompanied by dancing as well as music.

A frequent topic that lyric shares with narrative is the itemization of the beloved’s beauties. The Alisoun of the lyric and Alisoun of The Miller’s Tale are both dark-eyed, a quality that suggests a sexuality suppressed in the conventional gray- or blue-eyed heroines of courtly romance. The lover in the lyric protests, as Nicholas does in The Miller’s Tale, that he will die if he cannot obtain her love.

The joyous return of spring (the reverdie, spring song, or, literally, “regreening”) is the subject of many lyrics. In love lyrics the mating of birds and animals in wild nature often contrasts with the melancholy of unrequited or forsaken lovers. These lovers are usually male. We know that some women wrote troubadour and court poetry, but we do not know whether women composed popular lyrics; women certainly sang popular songs, just as they are portrayed doing in narrative poetry.

SIR THOMAS MALORY
ca. 1405-1471

Morte Darthur (Death of Arthur) is the title that William Caxton, the first English printer, gave to Malory's volume, which Caxton described more accurately in his Preface as 'the noble histories of * * * King Arthur and of certain of his knights.' The volume begins with the mythical story of Arthur's birth. King Uther Pendragon falls in love with the wife of one of his barons. Merlin's magic transforms Uther into the likeness of her husband, and Arthur is born of this union. The volume ends with the destruction of the Round Table and the deaths of Arthur, Queen Guinevere, and Sir Lancelot, who is Arthur's best knight and the queen's lover. The bulk of the work is taken up with the separate adventures of the knights of the Round Table.

On the evolution of the Arthurian legend, see the headnote to "Legendary Histories of Britain," p. 117. During the thirteenth century the stories about Arthur and his knights had been turned into a series of enormously long prose romances in French, and it was these, as Caxton informed his readers, "Sir Thomas Malory did take out of certain books of French and reduced into English." For Caxton's Preface and excerpts from a modern translation of the French Prose Vulgate Cycle (Malory's "French books"), see "King Arthur" at Norton Literature Online.

Little was known about the author until the early twentieth century when scholars began to unearth the criminal record of a Sir Thomas Malory of Newbold Revell in Warwickshire. In 1451 he was arrested for the first time to prevent his doing injury—presumably further injury—to a priory in Lincolnshire, and shortly thereafter he was accused of a number of criminal acts. These included escaping from prison after his first arrest, twice breaking into and plundering the Abbey of Coombe, extorting money from various persons, and committing rape. Malory pleaded innocent of all charges. The Wars of the Roses—in which Malory, like the formidable earl of Warwick (the "kingmaker"), whom he seems to have followed, switched sides from Lancaster to York and back again—may account for some of his troubles with the law. After a failed Lancastrian revolt, the Yorkist king, Edward IV, specifically excluded Malory from four amnesties he granted to the Lancastrians.

The identification of this Sir Thomas Malory (there is another candidate with the same name) as the author of the Morte was strengthened by the discovery in 1934 of a manuscript that differed from Caxton's text, the only version previously known. The manuscript contained eight separate romances. Caxton, in order to give the impression of a continuous narrative, had welded these together into twenty-one books, subdivided into short chapters with summary chapter headings. Caxton suppressed all but the last of the personal remarks the author had appended to individual tales in the manuscript. At the very end of the book Malory asks "all gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book * * * pray for me while I am alive that God send me good deliverance." The discovery of the manuscript revealed that at the close of the first tale he had written: "this was drawyn by a knight presoner Sir Thomas Malleore, that God sende him good recover." There is strong circumstantial evidence, therefore, that the book from which the Arthurian legends were passed on to future generations to be adapted in literature, art, and film was written in prison by a man whose violent career might seem at odds with the chivalric ideals he professes.

Such a contradiction—if it really is one—should not be surprising. Nostalgia for an ideal past that never truly existed is typical of much historical romance. Like the slave-owning plantation society of Margaret Mitchell's Gone with the Wind, whose southern gentlemen cultivate chivalrous manners and respect for gentlewomen, Malory's Arthurian world is a fiction. In our terms, it cannot even be labeled "historical," although the distinction between romance and history is not one that Malory would have made. Only rarely does he voice skepticism about the historicity of his tale; one such example is his questioning of the myth of Arthur's return. Much of the tragic power of his romance lies in his sense of the irretrievability of past glory in comparison with the sordidness of his own age.

The success of Malory's retelling owes much to his development of a terse and direct prose style, especially the naturalistic dialogue that keeps his narrative close to earth. And both he and many of his characters are masters of understatement who express themselves, in moments of great emotional tension, with a bare minimum of words.

In spite of its professed dedication to service of women, Malory's chivalry is primarily devoted to the fellowship and competitions of aristocratic men. Fighting consists mainly of single combats in tournaments, chance encounters, and battles, which Malory never tires of describing in professional detail. Commoners rarely come into view; when they do, the effect can be chilling—as when pillagers by moonlight plunder the corpses of the knights left on the field of Arthur's last battle. Above all, Malory cherishes an aristocratic male code of honor for which his favorite word is "worship." Men win or lose 'worship' through their actions in war and love.

The most 'worshipful' of Arthur's knights is Sir Lancelot, the 'head of all Christian knights,' as he is called in a moving eulogy by his brother, Sir Ector. But Lancelot is compromised by his fatal liaison with Arthur's queen and torn between the incompatible loyalties that bind him as an honorable knight, on the one hand, to his lord Arthur and, on the other, to his lady Guinevere. Malory loves his character Lancelot even to the point of indulging in the fleeting speculation, after Lancelot has been admitted to the queen's chamber, that their activities might have been innocent, 'for love that time was not as love is nowadays.' But when the jealousy and malice of two wicked knights forces the affair into the open, nothing can avert the breaking up of the fellowship of the Round Table and the death of Arthur himself, which Malory relates with somber magnificence as the passing of a great era.

From Morte Darthur

[THE CONSPIRACY AGAINST LANCELOT AND GUINEVERE]

In May, when every lusty heart flourisheth and burgeoneth, for as the season is lusty to behold and comfortable, so man and woman rejoiceth and gladdeth of summer coming with his fresh flowers, for winter with his rough winds and blasts causeth lusty men and women to cower and to sit fast by the fire—so this season it befell in the month of May a great anger and unhap that stinted not till the flower of chivalry of all the world was destroyed and slain. And all was long upon two unhappy knights which were named Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred that were brethren unto Sir Gawain. For this Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred had ever a privy hate unto the Queen, Dame Guinevere, and to Sir Lancelot, and daily and nightly they ever watched upon Sir Gawain.

So it misfortuned Sir Gawain and all his brethren were in King Arthur's chamber, and then Sir Agravain said thus openly, and not in no counsel, that many knights might hear: 'I marvel that we all be not ashamed both to see and to know how Sir Lancelot lieth daily and nightly by the Queen. And all we know well that it is so, and it is shamefully suffered of us all that we should suffer so noble a king as King Arthur is to be shamed.”

Then spoke Sir Gawain and said, "Brother, Sir Agrawain, I prai' you and charge you, move no such matters no more afore me, for wit you well, I will not be of your counsel."’

"So God me help," said Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, "we will not be known of your deeds."’

"Then will I!" said Sir Mordred.

"I lieve you well," said Sir Gawain, "for ever unto all unhappiness, sir, ye will grant." And I would that ye left all this and make you not so busy, for I know," said Sir Gawain, "what will fall of it."’

"Fall whatsoever fall may," said Sir Agrawain, 'I will disclose it to the King.)

"Not by my counsel," said Sir Gawain, "for and there arise war and wrack betwixt Sir Lancelot and us, wit you well, brother, there will many kings and great lords hold with Sir Lancelot. Also, brother, Sir Agrawain," said Sir Gawain, 'ye must remember how often times Sir Lancelot hath rescued the King and the Queen. And the best of us all had been full cold at the heart-root had not Sir Lancelot been better than we, and that has he proved himself full oft. And as for my part," said Sir Gawain, 'I will never be against Sir Lancelot for one day's deed, when he rescued me from King Carados of the Dolorous Tower and slew him and saved my life. Also, brother, Sir Agrawain and Sir Mordred, in like wise Sir Lancelot rescued you both and three score and two from Sir Tarquin. And therefore, brother, methinks such noble deeds and kindness should be remembered.'

'Do as ye list," said Sir Agrawain, "for I will layne it no longer.'

So with these words came in Sir Arthur.

"Now, brother," said Sir Gawain, "stint your noise."’

"That will I not," said Sir Agrawain and Sir Mordred.

"Well, will ye so?" said Sir Gawain. 'Then God speed you, for I will not hear of your tales, neither be of your counsel.'

"No more will I," said Sir Gaheris.

"Neither I," said Sir Gareth, "for I shall never say evil by that man that made me knight." And therewithal they three departed making great dole.'

"Alas!" said Sir Gawain and Sir Gareth, 'now is this realm wholly destroyed and mischieved, and the noble fellowship of the Round Table shall be disparbeled.'

So they departed, and then King Arthur asked them what noise they made.

"My lord," said Sir Agrawain, 'I shall tell you, for I may keep it no longer. Here is I and my brother Sir Mordred broke unto my brother Sir Gawain, Sir Gaheris, and to Sir Gareth—for this is all, to make it short—how that we know all that Sir Lancelot holdeth your queen, and hath done long; and we be your sister's sons, we may suffer it no longer. And we woot that ye should be above Sir Lancelot, and ye are the king that made him knight, and therefore we will prove it that he is a traitor to your person.'

"If it be so," said the King, "wit ye well, he is none other. But I would be loath to begin such a thing but I might have proofs of it, for Sir Lancelot is an hardy knight, and all ye know that he is the best knight among us all. And but if he be taken with the deed, he will fight with him that bringeth up the noise, and I know no knight that is able to match him. Therefore, and it be sooth as ye say, I would that he were taken with the deed."

For, as the French book saith, the King was full loath that such a noise should be upon Sir Lancelot and his queen. For the King had a deeming of it, but he would not hear of it, for Sir Lancelot had done so much for him and for the Queen so many times that, wit you well, the King loved him passingly well.

"My lord," said Sir Agravain, "ye shall ride tomorn on hunting, and doubt ye not, Sir Lancelot will not go with you. And so when it draweth toward night, ye may send the Queen word that ye will lie out all that night, and so may ye send for your cooks. And then, upon pain of death, that night we shall take him with the Queen, and we shall bring him unto you, quick or dead."

"I will well," said the King. "Then I counsel you to take with you sure fellowship."

"Sir," said Sir Agravain, "my brother, Sir Mordred, and I will take with us twelve knights of the Round Table."

"Beware," said King Arthur, "for I warn you, ye shall find him wight."

"Let us deal!" said Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred.

So on the morn King Arthur rode on hunting and sent word to the Queen that he would be out all that night. Then Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred got to them twelve knights and hid themself in a chamber in the castle of Carlisle. And these were their names: Sir Colgrevance, Sir Mador de la Porte, Sir Guingalgon, Sir Meliot de Logres, Sir Petipace of Winchelsea, Sir Galeron of Galway, Sir Melion de la Mountain, Sir Ascamore, Sir Gromore Somyr Jour, Sir Curselayne, Sir Florence, and Sir Lovell. So these twelve knights were with Sir Mordred and Sir Agravain, and all they were of Scotland, or else of Sir Gawain's kin, or well-willers to his brother.

So when the night came, Sir Lancelot told Sir Bors how he would go that night and speak with the Queen.

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "ye shall not go this night by my counsel."

"Why?" said Sir Lancelot.

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "I dread me ever of Sir Agravain that waiteth upon Sir Lancelot and his queen daily to do you shame and us all. And never gave my heart against no going that ever ye went to the queen so much as now, for I mistrust that the King is out this night from the Queen because peradventure he hath lain some watch for you and the Queen. Therefore, I dread me sore of some treason.'

"Have ye no dread," said Sir Lancelot, "for I shall go and come again and make no tarrying."

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "that me repents, for I dread me sore that your going this night shall wrath us all."

"Fair nephew," said Sir Lancelot, "I marvel me much why ye say thus, sithen the Queen hath sent for me. And wit you well, I will not be so much a coward, but she shall understand I will see her good grace."

"God speed you well," said Sir Bors, "and send you sound and safe again!"

So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy. And so he passed on till he came to the Queen's chamber, and so lightly he was had into the chamber. And then, as the French book saith, the Queen and Sir Lancelot were together. And whether they were abed or at other manner of disports, me list not thereof make no mention, for love that time was not as love is nowadays.

But thus as they were together there came Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred with twelve knights with them of the Round Table, and they said with great crying and scaring voice: "Thou traitor, Sir Lancelot, now are thou taken!" And thus they cried with a loud voice that all the court might hear it. And these fourteen knights all were armed at all points, as they should fight in a battle.

"Alas!" said Queen Guinevere, "now are we mischieved both!"

"Madam," said Sir Lancelot, "is there here any armor within your chamber that I might cover my body withal? And if there be any, give it me, and I shall soon stint their malice, by the grace of God!"

"Now, truly," said the Queen, "I have none armor neither helm, shield, sword, neither spear, wherefore I dread me sore our long love is come to a mischievous end. For I hear by their noise there be many noble knights, and well I woot they be surely armed, and against them ye may make no resistance. Wherefore ye are likely to be slain, and then shall I be burned! For and ye might escape them," said the Queen, "I would not doubt but that ye would rescue me in what danger that ever I stood in."

"Alas!" said Sir Lancelot, "in all my life thus was I never bestead that I should be thus shamefully slain for lack of mine armor."

But ever in one Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred cried: "Traitor knight, come out of the Queen's chamber! For wit thou well thou art beset so that thou shalt not escape."

"Ah, Jesu mercy!" said Sir Lancelot, "this shameful cry and noise I may not suffer, for better were death at once than thus to endure this pain." Then he took the Queen in his arms and kissed her and said, "Most noblest Christian queen, I beseech you, as ye have been ever my special good lady, and I at all times your poor knight and true unto my power, and as I never failed you in right nor in wrong sithen the first day King Arthur made me knight, that ye will pray for my soul if that I be slain. For well I am assured that Sir Bors, my nephew, and all the remnant of my kin, with Sir Lavain and Sir Urry, that they will not fail you to rescue you from the fire. And therefore, mine own lady, recomfort yourself, whatsoever come of me, that ye go with Sir Bors, my nephew, and Sir Urry and they all will do you all the pleasure that they may, and ye shall live like a queen upon my lands."

"Nay, Sir Lancelot, nay!" said the Oueen, "Wit thou well that I will not live long after thy days. But and ye be slain I will take my death as meekly as ever did martyr take his death for Jesu Christ's sake."

"Well, Madam," said Sir Lancelot, "sith it is so that the day is come that our love must depart, wit you well I shall sell my life as dear as I may. And a thousandfold," said Sir Lancelot, "I am more heavier for you than for myself! And now I had liefer than to be lord of all Christendom that I had sure armor upon me, that men might speak of my deeds ere ever I were slain."

"Truly," said the Queen, "and it might please God, I would that they would take me and slay me and suffer you to escape."

"That shall never be," said Sir Lancelot. "God defend me from such a shame! But, Jesu Christ, be Thou my shield and mine armor! And therewith Sir Lancelot wrapped his mantel about his arm well and surely; and by then they had gotten a great form out of the hall, and therewith they all rushed at the door. "Now, fair lords," said Sir Lancelot, "leave your noise and your rushing, and I shall set open this door, and then may ye do with me what it liketh you.""

"Come off, then," said they all, "and do it, for it availeth thee not to strive against us all. And therefore let us into this chamber, and we shall save thy life until thou come to King Arthur."

Then Sir Lancelot unbarred the door, and with his left hand he held it open a little, that but one man might come in at once. And so there came striding a good knight, a much man and a large, and his name was called Sir Colgrevance of Gore. And he with a sword struck at Sir Lancelot mightily. And he put aside the stroke and gave him such a buffet upon the helmet that he fell groveling dead within the chamber door. Then Sir Lancelot with great might drew the knight within the chamber door. And then Sir Lancelot, with help of the Queen and her ladies, he was lightly armed in Colgrevance’s armor. And ever stood Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred, crying, "Traitor knight! Come forth out of the Queen’s chamber!"

"Sirs, leave your noise," said Sir Lancelot, "for wit you well, Sir Agravain, ye shall not prison me this night. And therefore, and ye do by my counsel, go

And anon⁴ at the first stroke he slew Sir Agravain, and after twelve of his fellows. Within a little while he had laid them down cold to the earth, for there was none of the twelve knights might withstand Sir Lancelot one buffet.⁵ And also he wounded Sir Mordred, and therewithal he fled with all his might.

And then Sir Lancelot returned again unto the Queen and said, "Madam, now wit you well, all our true love is brought to an end, for now will King Arthur ever be my foe. And therefore, Madam, and it like you⁸ that I may have you with me, I shall save you from all manner adventurous⁷ dangers."

[WAR BREAKS OUT BETWEEN ARTHUR AND LANCELOT]²

Then said King Arthur unto Sir Gawain, "Dear nephew, I pray you make ready in your best armor with your brethren, Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, to bring my Queen to the fire, there to have her judgment and receive the death."

"Nay, my most noble king," said Sir Gawain, "that will I never do, for wit you well I will never be in that place where so noble a queen as is my lady Dame Guinevere shall take such a shameful end. For wit you well," said Sir Gawain, "my heart will not serve me for to see her die, and it shall never be said that ever I was of your counsel for her death."

"Then," said the King unto Sir Gawain, "suffer² your brethren Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth to be there."

"Alas," said Sir Gawain, "that ever I should endure to see this woeful day." So Sir Gawain turned him and wept heartily, and so he went into his chamber.

And then the Queen was led forth without Carlisle, and anon she was dispoiled into her smock. And then her ghostly father was brought to her to be shriven of her misdeeds. Then was there weeping and wailing and wringing of hands of many lords and ladies, but there were but few in comparison that would bear any armor for to strengthen the death of the Queen.

Then was there one that Sir Lancelot had sent unto that place, which went to espy what time the Queen should go unto her death. And anon as he saw the Queen dispoiled into her smock and shriven, then he gave Sir Lancelot warning. Then was there but spurring and plucking up of horses, and right so they came unto the fire. And who that stood against them, there were they slain—there might none withstand Sir Lancelot. So all that bore arms and withstood them, there were they slain, full many a noble knight. * * * And so in this rushing and hurling, as Sir Lancelot thrang here and there, it misfortuned him to slay Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, the noble knight, for they were unarmed and unwares. As the French book saith, Sir Lancelot smote Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth upon the brain-pans, wherethrough they were slain in the field, howbeit Sir Lancelot saw them not. And so were they found dead among the thickest of the press.

Then when Sir Lancelot had thus done, and slain and put to flight all that would withstand him, then he rode straight unto Queen Guinevere and made a kirtle and a gown to be cast upon her, and then he made her to be set behind him and prayed her to be of good cheer. Now wit you well the Queen was glad that she was escaped from death, and then she thanked God and Sir Lancelot.

And so he rode his way with the Queen, as the French book saith, unto Joyous Garde, and there he kept her as a noble knight should. And many great lords and many good knights were sent him, and many full noble knights drew unto him. When they heard that King Arthur and Sir Lancelot were at debate, many knights were glad, and many were sorry of their debate.

Now turn we again unto King Arthur, that when it was told him how and in what manner the Queen was taken away from the fire, and when he heard of the death of his noble knights, and in especial Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, then he swooned for very pure sorrow. And when he awoke of his swoon, then he said: "Alas, that ever I bore crown upon my head! For now have I lost the fairest fellowship of noble knights that ever held Christian king together. Alas, my good knights be slain and gone away from me. Now within these two days I have lost nigh forty knights and also the noble fellowship of Sir Lancelot and his blood, for now I may nevermore hold them together with my worship! Alas, that ever this war began!"

"Now, fair fellows," said the King, 'I charge you that no man tell Sir Gawain of the death of his two brethren, for I am sure," said the King, 'when he heareth tell that Sir Gareth is dead, he will go nigh out of his mind. Mercy Jesu,' said the King, "why slew he Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth? For I dare say, as for Sir Gareth, he loved Sir Lancelot above all men earthly."

"That is truth," said some knights, "but they were slain in the hurling, as Sir Lancelot thrang in the thickest of the press. And as they were unarmed, he smote them and wist not whom that he smote, and so unhappily they were slain."

"Well," said Arthur, 'the death of them will cause the greatest mortal war that ever was, for I am sure that when Sir Gawain knoweth hereof that Sir Gareth is slain, I shall never have rest of him till I have destroyed Sir Lancelot's kin and himself both, other else he to destroy me. And therefore," said the King, "wit you well, my heart was never so heavy as it is now. And much more I am sorrier for my good knights' loss than for the loss of my fair queen; for queens I might have enough, but such a fellowship of good knights shall never be together in no company. And now I dare say,' said King Arthur, 'there was never Christian king that ever held such a fellowship together. And alas, that ever Sir Lancelot and I should be at debate. Ah, Agravain, Agravain! said the King, 'Jesu forgive it thy soul, for thine evil will that thou and thy brother Sir Mordred haddest unto Sir Lancelot hath caused all this sorrow.' And ever among these complaints the King wept and swooned.

Then came there one to Sir Gawain and told him how the Queen was led away with Sir Lancelot, and nigh a four-and-twenty knights slain. 'Ah, Jesu, save me my two brethren!' said Sir Gawain. 'For full well wist I,' said Sir Gawain, 'that Sir Lancelot would rescue her, other else he would die in that field. And to say the truth he were not of worship but if he had rescued the Queen, insomuch as she should have been burned for his sake. And as in that,' said Sir Gawain, 'he hath done but knightly, and as I would have done myself and I had stood in like case. But where are my brethren?' said Sir Gawain. 'I marvel that I hear not of them.'

Then said that man, "Truly, Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth be slain.' "Jesu defend!" said Sir Gawain. 'For all this world I would not that they were slain, and in especial my good brother Sir Gareth."

"Sir," said the man, "he is slain, and that is great pity."

"Who slew him?" said Sir Gawain.

"Sir Lancelot," said the man, "slew them both."
"That may I not believe," said Sir Gawain, "that ever he slew my good brother Sir Gareth, for I dare say my brother loved him better than me and all his brethren and the King both. Also I dare say, an Sir Lancelot had desired my brother Sir Gareth with him, he would have been with him against the King and us all. And therefore I may never believe that Sir Lancelot slew my brethren."

"Verily, sir," said the man, "it is noised that he slew him."

"Alas," said Sir Gawain, "now is my joy gone." And then he fell down and swooned, and long he lay there as he had been dead. And when he arose out of his swoon, he cried out sorrowfully and said, "Alas!" And forthwith he ran unto the King, crying and weeping, and said, "Ah, mine uncle King Arthur! My good brother Sir Gareth is slain, and so is my brother Sir Gaheris, which were two noble knights."

Then the King wept and he both, and so they fell on swooning. And when they were revived, then spake Sir Gawain and said, "Sir, I will go and see my brother Sir Gareth."

"Sir, ye may not see him," said the King, "for I caused him to be interred and Sir Gaheris both, for I well understood that ye would make overmuch sorrow, and the sight of Sir Gareth should have caused your double sorrow."

"Alas, my lord," said Sir Gawain, "how slew he my brother Sir Gareth? Mine own good lord, I pray you tell me."

"Truly," said the King, "I shall tell you as it hath been told me—Sir Lancelot slew him and Sir Gaheris both."

"Alas," said Sir Gawain, "they bore none arms against him, neither of them both."

"I woot not how it was," said the King, "but as it is said, Sir Lancelot slew them in the thickest of the press and knew them not. And therefore let us shape a remedy for to revenge their deaths."

"My king, my lord, and mine uncle," said Sir Gawain, "wit you well, now I shall make you a promise which I shall hold by my knighthood, that from this day forward I shall never fail Sir Lancelot until that one of us have slain the other. And therefore I require you, my lord and king, dress you unto the wars, for wit you well, I will be revenged upon Sir Lancelot; and therefore, as ye will have my service and my love, now haste you thereto and assay your friends. For I promise unto God," said Sir Gawain, "for the death of my brother Sir Gareth I shall seek Sir Lancelot throughout seven kings' realms, but I shall slay him, other else he shall slay me."

"Sir, ye shall not need to seek him so far," said the King, "for as I hear say, Sir Lancelot will abide me and us all within the castle of Joyous Garde. And much people draweth unto him, as I hear say."

"That may I right well believe," said Sir Gawain, "but my lord," he said, "assay your friends and I will assay mine."

"It shall be done," said the King, "and as I suppose I shall be big' enough to drive him out of the biggest tower of his castle."

So then the King sent letters and writs throughout all England, both the length and the breadth, for to summon all his knights. And so unto King Arthur drew many knights, dukes, and earls, that he had a great host, and when they were assembled the King informed them how Sir Lancelot had bereft him his Queen. Then the King and all his host made them ready to lay siege about Sir Lancelot where he lay within Joyous Garde.

[THE DEATH OF ARTHUR]'

So upon Trinity Sunday at night King Arthur dreamed a wonderful dream, and in his dream him seemed that he saw upon a chafflet a chair, and the chair was fast to a wheel, and thereupon sat King Arthur in the richest cloth of gold that might be made. And the King thought there was under him, far from him, an hideous deep black water, and therein was all manner of serpents, and worms, and wild beasts, foul and horrible. And suddenly the King thought that the wheel turned upside down, and he fell among the serpents, and every beast took him by a limb. And then the King cried as he lay in his bed, "Help, help!"

And then knights, squires, and yeomen awakened the King, and then he was so amazed that he wist not where he was. And then so he awakened until it was nigh day, and then he fell on slumbering again, not sleeping nor thoroughly waking. So the King seemed verily that there came Sir Gawain unto him with a number of fair ladies with him. So when King Arthur saw him, he said, "Welcome, my sister's son. I weened ye had been dead. And now I see thee on-live, much am I beholden unto Almighty Jesu. Ah, fair nephew and my sister's son, what been these ladies that hither be come with you?"

"Sir," said Sir Gawain, "all these be ladies for whom I have foughten for when I was man living. And all these are tho that I did battle for in righteous quarrels, and God hath given them that grace, at their great prayer, because I did battle for them for their right, that they should bring me hither unto you. Thus much hath given me leave God, for to warn you of your death. For and ye fight as tomorn with Sir Mordred, as ye both have assigned, doubt ye not ye must be slain, and the most party of your people on both parties. And for the great grace and goodness that Almighty Jesu hath unto you, and for pity of you and many mo other good men there shall be slain, God hath sent me to you of his special grace to give you warning that in no wise ye do battle as tomorn, but that ye take a treatise for a month-day. And proffer you largely, so that tomorn ye put in a delay. For within a month shall come Sir Lancelot with all his noble knights and rescue you worshipfully and slay Sir Mordred and all that ever will hold with him."

Then Sir Gawain and all the ladies vanished. And anon the King called upon his knights, squires, and yeomen, and charged them wightly to fetch his noble lords and wise bishops unto him. And when they were come the King told them of his avision, that Sir Gawain had told him and warned him that, and

8. The pope arranges a truce, Guinevere is returned to Arthur, and Lancelot and his kin leave England to become rulers of France. At Gawain's instigation Arthur invades France to resume the war against Lancelot. Word comes to the king that Mordred has seized the kingdom, and Arthur leads his forces back to England. Mordred attacks them upon their landing, and Gawain is mortally wounded and dies, although not before he has repented for having insisted that Arthur fight Lancelot and has written Lancelot to come to the aid of his former lord.
he fought on the morn, he should be slain. Then the King commanded Sir Lucan the Butler and his brother Sir Bedivere the Bold, with two bishops with them, and charged them in any wise to take a treatise for a month-day with Sir Mordred. 'And spare not: proffer him lands and goods as much as ye think reasonable.'

So then they departed and came to Sir Mordred where he had a grim host of an hundred thousand, and there they entreated Sir Mordred long time. And at the last Sir Mordred was agreed for to have Cornwall and Kent by King Arthur's days, and after that, all England, after the days of King Arthur.

Then were they condescended that King Arthur and Sir Mordred should meet betwixt both their hosts, and everich of them should bring fourteen persons. And so they came with this word unto Arthur. Then said he, 'I am glad that this is done,' and so he went into the field.

And when King Arthur should depart, he warned all his host that, and they see any sword drawn, 'Look ye come on fiercely and slay that traitor Sir Mordred, for I in no wise trust him.' In like wise Sir Mordred warned his host that 'And ye see any manner of sword drawn, look that ye come on fiercely, and so slay all that ever before you standeth, for in no wise I will not trust for this treatise.' And in the same wise said Sir Mordred unto his host, 'For I know well my father will be avenged upon me.'

And so they met as their pointment was and were agreed and accorded thoroughly. And wine was fetched and they drank together. Right so came an adder out of a little heath-bush, and it stung a knight in the foot. And so when the knight felt him so stung, he looked down and saw the adder. And anon he drew his sword to slay the adder, and thought none other harm. And when the host on both parties saw that sword drawn, then they blew beams, trum-pets, and horns, and shouted grimly. And so both hosts dressed them together. And King Arthur took his horse and said, 'Alas, this unhappy day!' and so rode to his party, and Sir Mordred in like wise.

And never since was there never seen a more dolefuller battle in no Christian land, for there was but rushing and riding, foining and striking; and many a grim word was there spoken of either to other, and many a deadly stroke. But ever King Arthur rode throughout the battle of Sir Mordred many times and did full nobly, as a noble king should do, and at all times he fainted never. And Sir Mordred did his devoir that day and put himself in great peril.

And thus they fought all the long day, and never stinted till the noble knights were laid to the cold earth. And ever they fought still till it was near night, and by then was there an hundred thousand laid dead upon the down. Then was King Arthur wood-wroth out of measure when he saw his people so slain from him. And so he looked about him and could see no mo of all his host, and good knights left no mo on-live, but two knights: the tone was Sir Lucan the Butler and [the other] his brother Sir Bedivere. And yet they were full sore wounded.

"Jesu, mercy," said the King, "where are all my noble knights become? Alas that ever I should see this doleful day! For now," said King Arthur, "I am come to mine end. But would to God," said he, "that I wist now where were that traitor Sir Mordred that has caused all this mischief."

Then King Arthur looked about and was ware where stood Sir Mordred leaning upon his sword among a great heap of dead men.

"Now give me my spear," said King Arthur unto Sir Lucan, "for yonder I have espied the traitor that all this woe hath wrought."

"Sir, let him be," said Sir Lucan, "for he is unhappy. And if ye pass this unhappy day ye shall be right well revenged upon him. And, good lord, remember ye of your night's dream, and what the spirit of Sir Gawain told you tonight, and yet God of his great goodness hath preserved you hitherto. And for God's sake, my lord, leave off by this, for, blessed be God, ye have won the field: for yet we been here three on-live, and with Sir Mordred is not one on-live. And therefore if ye leave off now, this wicked day of destiny is past."

"Now, tide me death, tide me life," said the King, "now I see him yonder alone, he shall never escape mine hands. For at a better avail shall I never have him."

"God speed you well!" said Sir Bedivere.

Then the King got his spear in both his hands and ran toward Sir Mordred, crying and saying, "Traitor, now is thy deathday come!"

And when Sir Mordred saw King Arthur he ran until him with his sword drawn in his hand, and there King Arthur smote Sir Mordred under the shield, with a foin of his spear, throughout the body more than a fathom. And when Sir Mordred felt that he had his death's wound, he thrust himself with the might that he had up to the burr of King Arthur's spear, and right so he smote his father King Arthur with his sword holden in both his hands, upon the side of the head, that the sword pierced the helmet and the tay of the brain. And therewith Sir Mordred dashed down stark dead to the earth.

And noble King Arthur fell in a swough to the earth, and there he swooned oftentimes, and Sir Lucan and Sir Bedivere oftetimes heaved him up. And so, weakly betwixt them, they led him to a little chapel not far from the seaside, and when the King was there, him thought him reasonably eased. Then heard they people cry in the field. "Now go thou, Sir Lucan," said the King, "and do me to wit what betokens that noise in the field."

So Sir Lucan departed, for he was grievously wounded in many places. And so as he yede he saw and harkened by the moonlight how that pillers and robbers were come into the field to pill and to rob many a full noble knight of brooches and bees and of many a good ring and many a rich jewel. And who that were not dead all out there they slew them for their harness and their riches. When Sir Lucan understood this work, he came to the King as soon as he might and told him all what he had heard and seen. "Therefore by my read," said Sir Lucan, "it is best that we bring you to some town."

"I would it were so," said the King, "but I may not stand, my head works so. Ah, Sir Lancelot," said King Arthur, "this day have I sore missed thee. And alas that ever I was against thee, for now have I my death, whereof Sir Gawain me warned in my dream."

Then Sir Lucan took up the King the t'one party and Sir Bedivere the other party; and in the lifting up the King swooned and in the lifting Sir Lucan fell in a swoon that part of his guts fell out of his body, and therewith the noble knight's heart burst. And when the King awoke he beheld Sir Lucan how he lay foaming at the mouth and part of his guts lay at his feet.

"Alas," said the King, "this is to me a full heavy sight to see this noble duke so die for my sake, for he would have holpen me that had more need of help than I. Alas that he would not complain him for his heart was so set to help me. Now Jesu have mercy upon his soul."

Then Sir Bedivere wept for the death of his brother.

'Now leave this mourning and weeping, gentle knight,' said the King, "for all this will not avail me. For wit thou well, and I might live myself, the death of Sir Lucan would grieve me evermore. But my time passeth on fast," said the King. 'Therefore,' said King Arthur unto Sir Bedivere, 'take thou here Excalibur my good sword and go with it to yonder water's side; and when thou comest there I charge thee throw my sword in that water and come again and tell me what thou sawest there.'

"My lord," said Sir Bedivere, "your commandment shall be done, and [I shall] lightly bring you word again." So Sir Bedivere departed. And by the way he beheld that noble sword, that the pommel and the haft was all precious stones. And then he said to himself, "If I throw this rich sword in the water, thereof shall never come good, but harm and loss." And then Sir Bedivere hid Excalibur under a tree. And so, as soon as he might, he came again unto the King and said he had been at the water and had thrown the sword into the water.

"What saw thou there?" said the King.

"Sir," he said, "I saw nothing but waves and winds."

"That is untruly said of thee," said the King. "And therefore go thou lightly again and do my commandment; as thou art to me lief and dear, spare not, but throw it in."

Then Sir Bedivere returned again and took the sword in his hand. And yet him thought sin and shame to throw away that noble sword. And so eft he hid the sword and returned again and told the King that he had been at the water and done his commandment.

"What sawest thou there?" said the King.

"Sir," he said, "I saw nothing but waters wap and waves wan."

"Ah, traitor unto me and untrue," said King Arthur, "now hast thou betrayed me twice. Who would have weened that thou that has been to me so lief and dear, and thou art named a noble knight, and would betray me for the riches of this sword. But now go again lightly, for thy long tarrying putteth me in great jeopardy of my life, for I have taken cold. And but if thou do now as I bid thee, if ever I may see thee I shall slay thee mine own hands, for thou wouldest for my rich sword see me dead.'

Then Sir Bedivere departed and went to the sword and lightly took it up, and so he went to the water's side; and there he bound the girdle about the hilt, and threw the sword as far into the water as he might. And there came an arm and an hand above the water and took it and clutched it, and shook it thrice and brandished; and then vanished away the hand with the sword into the water. So Sir Bedivere came again to the King and told him what he saw.

"Alas," said the King, "help me hence, for I dread me I have tarried overlong."

Then Sir Bedivere took the King upon his back and so went with him to that water's side. And when they were at the water's side, even fast by the bank hoved a little barge with many fair ladies in it; and among them all was a queen; and all they had black hoods, and all they wept and shrieked when they saw King Arthur.

"Now put me into that barge," said the King; and so he did softly. And there received him three ladies with great mourning, and so they set them down. And in one of their laps King Arthur laid his head, and then the queen said, "Ah, my dear brother, why have ye tarried so long from me? Alas, this wound on your head hath caught overmuch cold." And anon they rowed fromward the land, and Sir Bedivere beheld all tho ladies go froward him.

Then Sir Bedivere cried and said, "Ah, my lord Arthur, what shall become of me, now ye go from me and leave me here alone among mine enemies?"

"Comfort thyself," said the King, "and do as well as thou mayest, for in me is no trust for to trust in. For I must into the vale of Avilion to heal me of my grievous wound. And if thou hear nevermore of me, pray for my soul."

But ever the queen and ladies wept and shrieked that it was pity to hear. And as soon as Sir Bedivere had lost the sight of the barge he wept and wailed and so took the forest, and went all that night. And in the morning he was ware betwixt two holts hoar of a chapel and an hermitage.

Thus of Arthur I find no more written in books that been authorized, neither more of the very certainty of his death heard I never read, but thus was he led away in a ship wherein were three queens: that one was King Arthur's sister, Queen Morgan la Fee, the t'other was the Queen of North Wales, and the third was the Queen of the Waste Lands.

Now more of the death of King Arthur could I never find but that these ladies brought him to his burials, and such one was buried there that the hermit bore witness that sometime was Bishop of Canterbury. But yet the hermit knew not in certain that he was verily the body of King Arthur, for this tale Sir Bedivere, a Knight of the Table Round, made it to be written. Yet some men say in many parts of England that King Arthur is not dead, but had by the will of our Lord Jesu into another place. And men say that he shall come again and he shall win the Holy Cross. Yet I will not say that it shall be so, but rather I will say, Here in this world he changed his life. And many men say that there is written upon his tomb this verse: \textit{Hie iacet Arthurus, rex quondam, rexque futurus.}

And thus upon a night there came a vision to Sir Lancelot and charged him, in remission of his sins, to haste him unto Amesbury: \textit{And by then thou come there, thou shalt find Queen Guinevere dead. And therefore take thy fellows with thee, and purvey them of an horse-bier, and fetch thou the corse of her, and bury her by her husband, the noble King Arthur. \textit{"It were well done," said the hermit, "that ye made you ready and that ye disobey not the avision."}

Then Sir Lancelot took his eight fellows with him, and on foot they yede from Glastonbury to Amesbury, the which is little more than thirty mile, and thither they came within two days, for they were weak and feeble to go. And when Sir Lancelot was come to Amesbury within the nunnery, Queen Guinevere died but half an hour afore. And the ladies told Sir Lancelot that Queen Guinevere told them all ere she passed that Sir Lancelot had been priest near a twelve-month: \textit{and hither he cometh as fast as he may to fetch my corse, and beside my lord King Arthur he shall bury me." Wherefore the Queen said in hearing of them all, "I beseech Almighty God that I may never have power to see Sir Lancelot with my worldly eyes."}

\textit{"And thus," said all the ladies, "was ever her prayer these two days till she was dead."}

Then Sir Lancelot saw her visage, but he wept not greatly, but sighed. And so he did all the observance of the service himself, both the \textit{dirige} and on the morn he sang mass. And there was ordained an horse-bier, and so with an hundred torches ever burning about the corse of the Queen, and ever Sir Lancelot with his eight fellows went about the horse-bier, singing and reading many an holy orison, and frankincense upon the corse incensed.

Thus Sir Lancelot and his eight fellows went on foot from Amesbury unto Glastonbury, and when they were come to the chapel and the hermitage, there she had a \textit{dirige} with great devotion. And on the morn the hermit that sometime was Bishop of Canterbury sang the mass of requiem with great devotion, and Sir Lancelot was the first that offered, and then also his eight fellows. And then she was wrapped in cerecloth of Rennes, from the top to the toe, in thirtyfold, and after she was put in a web of lead, and then in a coffin of marble. And when she was put in the earth Sir Lancelot swooned and lay long still, while the hermit came and awaked him, and said, "Ye be to blame, for ye displease God with such manner of sorrow-making."

"Truly," said Sir Lancelot, "I trust I do not displease God, for He knoweth mine intent—for my sorrow was not, nor is not, for any rejoicing of sin, but my sorrow may never have end. For when I remember of her beaulte and of her noblesse that was both with her king and with her, so when I saw his corse and her corse so lie together, truly mine heart would not serve to sustain my careful body. Also when I remember me how by my defaute and mine orgule and my pride that they were both laid full low, that were peerless that ever was living of Christian people, wit you well," said Sir Lancelot, "this remembered, of their kindness and mine unkindness, sank so to mine heart that I might not sustain myself." So the French book maketh mention.

Then Sir Lancelot never after ate but little meat, nor drank, till he was dead, for then he sickened more and more and dried and dwined away. For the Bishop nor none of his fellows might not make him to eat, and little he drank, that he was waxen by a kibbet shorter than he was, that the people could not know him. For evermore, day and night, he prayed, but sometime he slumbered a broken sleep. Ever he was lying groveling on the tomb of King Arthur and Queen Guinevere, and there was no comfort that the Bishop nor Sir Bors, nor none of his fellows could make him—it availed not. So within six weeks after, Sir Lancelot fell sick and lay in his bed. And then he sent for the Bishop that there was hermit, and all his true fellows. Then Sir Lancelot said with dreary steven, "Sir Bishop, I pray you give to me all my rights that longeth to a Christian man."

"It shall not need you," said the hermit and all his fellows. "It is but heaviness of your blood. Ye shall be well mended by the grace of God to morrow."

"My fair lords," said Sir Lancelot, "wit you my careful body will into the earth; I have warning more than now I will say. Therefore give me my rights."

So when he was houseled and annealed and had all that a Christian man ought to have, he prayed the Bishop that his fellows might bear his body to Joyous Garde. (Some men say it was Alnwick, and some men say it was Bamborough.) "Howbeit," said Sir Lancelot, "me repenteth sore, but I made mine avow sometime that in Joyous Garde I would be buried. And because of breaking of mine avow, I pray you all, lead me thither." Then there was weeping and wringing of hands among his fellows.

So at a season of the night they all went to their beds, for they all lay in one chamber. And so after midnight, against day, the Bishop that was hermit, as he lay in his bed asleep, he fell upon a great laughter. And therewith all the fellowship awoke and came to the Bishop and asked him what he ailed. 7

"Ah, Jesu mercy," said the Bishop, "why did ye awake me? I was never in all my life so merry and so well at ease."

"Wherefore?" said Sir Bors.

"Truly," said the Bishop, "here was Sir Lancelot with me, with more angels than ever I saw men in one day. And I saw the angels heave up Sir Lancelot unto heaven, and the gates of heaven opened against him."

"It is but dretching of swevens," said Sir Bors, "for I doubt not Sir Lancelot aileth nothing but good."

"It may well be," said the Bishop. "Go ye to his bed and then shall ye prove the sooth."

So when Sir Bors and his fellows came to his bed, they found him stark dead. And he lay as he had smiled, and the sweetest savor about him that ever they felt. Then was there weeping and wringing of hands, and the greatest dole they made that ever made men. And on the morn the Bishop did his mass of Requiem, and after the Bishop and all the nine knights put Sir Lancelot in the same horse-bier that Queen Guinevere was laid in tofore that she was buried. And so the Bishop and they all together went with the body of Sir Lancelot daily, till they came to Joyous Garde. And ever they had an hundred torches burning about him.

And so within fifteen days they came to Joyous Garde. And there they laid his corse in the body of the choir, and sang and read many psalters and prayers over him and about him. And ever his visage was laid open and naked, that all folks might behold him; for such was the custom in those days that all men of worship should so lie with open visage till that they were buried.

And right thus as they were at their service, there came Sir Ector de Maris that had seven year sought all England, Scotland, and Wales, seeking his brother, Sir Lancelot. And when Sir Ector heard such noise and light in the choir of Joyous Garde, he alight and put his horse from him and came into the choir. And there he saw men sing and weep, and all they knew Sir Ector, but he knew not them. Then went Sir Bors unto Sir Ector and told him how there lay his brother, Sir Lancelot, dead. And then Sir Ector threw his shield, sword, and helm from him, and when he beheld Sir Lancelot's visage, he fell down in a swoon. And when he waked, it were hard any tongue to tell the doleful complaints that he made for his brother.

"Ah, Lancelot!" he said, "thou were head of all Christian knights. And now I dare say," said Sir Ector, "thou Sir Lancelot, there thou liest, that thou were never matched of earthly knight's hand. And thou were the courteoust knight that ever bore shield. And thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse, and thou were the truest lover, of a sinful man, that ever loved woman, and thou were the kindest man that ever struck with sword. And thou was the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall among ladies, and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in the rest."

Then there was weeping and dolor out of measure.

Thus they kept Sir Lancelot's corse aloft fifteen days, and then they buried it with great devotion. And then at leisure they went all with the Bishop of Canterbury to his hermitage, and there they were together more than a month.

Then Sir Constantine that was Sir Cador's son of Cornwall was chosen king of England, and he was a full noble knight, and worshipfully he ruled this realm. And then this King Constantine sent for the Bishop of Canterbury, for he heard say where he was. And so he was restored unto his bishopric and left that hermitage, and Sir Bedivere was there ever still hermit to his life's end.

Then Sir Bors de Ganis, Sir Ector de Maris, Sir Galahantine, Sir Galihud, Sir Galihodin, Sir Blamour, Sir Bleoberis, Sir Villars le Valiant, Sir Claruss of Clermount, all these knights drew them to their countries. Howbeit King Constantine would have had them with him, but they would not abide in this realm. And there they all lived in their countries as holy men.

And some English books make mention that they went never out of England after the death of Sir Lancelot—but that was but favor of makers. For the French book maketh mention—and is authorized—that Sir Bors, Sir Ector, Sir Blamour, and Sir Bleoberis went into the Holy Land, theras Jesu Christ was quick and dead, and anon as they had established their lands; for the book saith so Sir Lancelot commanded them for to do ere ever he passed out of this world. There these four knights did many battles upon the miscreants, or Turks, and there they died upon a Good Friday for God's sake.

Here is the end of the whole book of King Arthur and of his noble knights of the Round Table, that when they were whole together there was ever an hundred and forty. And here is the end of The Death of Arthur.

I pray you all gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book of Arthur and his knights from the beginning to the ending, pray for me while I am alive that God send me good deliverance. And when I am dead, I pray you all pray for my soul.

For this book was ended the ninth year of the reign of King Edward the Fourth, by Sir Thomas Malory, knight, as Jesu help him for His great might, as he is the servant of Jesu both day and night.

ROBERT HENRYSON

ca. 1425—ca. 1500

Robert Henryson is perhaps the greatest of a set of exceptionally accomplished late-fifteenth- and early-sixteenth-century Scots poets. He was an acute reader and critic of Chaucer; his intense poem The Testament of Cresseid, which is a sequel to Troilus and Criseyde, imagines the fate of Criseyde/Cresseid as she becomes a prostitute in the Greek camp, stricken with both venereal disease and, finally, remorse. This text was routinely printed, in sixteenth-century editions of Chaucer's works, at the end of Troylus as its sixth book. The Cock and the Fox, one of fourteen fables that constitute another subtle, penetrating work by Henryson, his Moral Fables, is a wonderfully original retelling of Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale. Henryson clearly enjoyed and shared Chaucer's humor, and the animals in his fables speak a gruffly colloquial idiom; he also learned and adapted from Chaucer the art of sudden changes of stylistic register. Although Henryson's moral vision is darker and more hard-edged than Chaucer's, he too puts pressure on the simplistic moralizing characteristic of the fable tradition.

Very little is known for certain about Henryson's life. Because he is spoken of as "master," he probably held a master's degree, and evidence points to his having been headmaster of a grammar school founded by monks of the town Dunfermline. As a schoolmaster, Henryson would have regularly used collections of fables to teach boys their Latin. Such a Latin collection by Walter the Englishman served as Henryson's main source for The Fables.

One of the chief attractions of Henryson's poetry is the language, which is no more difficult than Chaucer's. The text here is based on the Oxford edition by Denton Fox (1981), but spellings have occasionally been altered for easier comprehension. The notes call attention to some of the main differences between Chaucer's East Midland and Henryson's Scots dialect. The seven-line stanza of The Fables and The Testament of Cresseid, known as rhyme royal, is the one Chaucer used in his Troilus and Criseyde and most of the religious stories in The Canterbury Tales. It has been said to derive its name from the fact that a royal poet, King James I of Scotland, wrote The Kingis Quair (The King's Book) in that stanza.

1. Brute, adj., in the sense of relating to animals, as in "brute beasts."
2. Wanting, (i.e., lacking). In the Scottish dialect the normal ending of the present participle is and instead of -ing.
3. Note that Scottish dialect uses their and them where Chaucer's East Midland still has hire and hem.
4. So. Note that in Scottish dialect long o is pronounced for long o.
5. Note that the third person singular of verbs ends in -s or -es instead of -th as in Chaucer.
6. A case I found which happened a year or two ago. "Ane": a. The same word as one, which functions as the indefinite article.
7. In a village (in) those days.
8. Who made her living (literally: won her food) by.

1. When the lark could sing, i.e., at dawn.
2. Generic name for a fox, perhaps invented here by Henryson.
3. The stratagems, the devices, and the trickery.
4. Dissimulating in facial expression and manner.
5. It would be just a shame if I were not to serve you. "Serve" has both the feudal sense of service and a second sense.
6. Dirige (modern "dirge"): the first word of the anthem beginning the funeral service, which designates the prayer itself or the whole Office for the Dead: "Dirige Domino Deus noster"—Lead me O Lord my God (Psalm 5.9).
7. Between the two of us how should there be a feud? "Suld": should. The future of "shall" is "sail."
When I beheld your feddeis fair and gent,
Your beck, your breast, your hekill, and your kame—
Schir, by my saul, and the blissit sacrament.

EVERYMAN
after 1485

Everyman is a late example of a kind of medieval drama known as the morality play. Morality plays apparently evolved side by side with the mystery plays, although they were composed individually and not in cycles. They too have a primarily religious purpose, but their method of attaining it is different. Both mysteries and moralities addressed questions of the ultimate fate of the soul. The mysteries dramatized significant events in biblical and sacred history from the creation of the world to Judgment Day in order to bring out the meaning of God's scheme of salvation. The moralities, however, instead of rehearsing scriptural stories, dramatized allegories of spiritual struggle. Typically, a person named Human or Mankind or Youth is faced with a choice between a pious life in the company of such associates as Mercy, Discretion, and Good Deeds and a dissolute life among riotous companions like Lust or Mischief. Everyman is about the day of judgment that every individual human being must face eventually. The play represents allegorically the forces—both outside the protagonist and within—that can help to save Everyman and those that cannot or that obstruct his salvation.

Everyman lacks the broad (even slapstick) humor of many morality plays that portray as clowns the vices that try to lure the Everyman figure away from salvation. The play does contain a certain grim humor in showing the haste with which the hero's fair-weather friends abandon him when they discover what his problem is. The play inculcates its austere lesson by the simplicity and directness of its language and of its approach. A sense of urgency builds—one by one Everyman's supposed resources fail him as time is running out. Ultimately Knowledge teaches him the lesson that every Christian must learn in order to be saved.

The play was written near the end of the fifteenth century. It is probably a translation of a Flemish play, although it is possible that the Flemish play is the translation and the English Everyman the original.

1. The text is based on the earliest printing of the play (no manuscript is known) by John Sket about 1530, as reproduced by W. W. Greg (1904). The spelling has been modernized except where modernization would spoil the rhyme, and modern punctuation has been added. The stage directions have been amplified.
HERE BEGINNETH A TREATISE HOW THE HIGH FATHER OF HEAVEN SENDETH DEATH TO SUMMON EVERY CREATURE TO COME AND GIVE ACCOUNT OF THEIR LIVES IN THIS WORLD, AND IS IN MANNER OF A MORAL PLAY

[Enter MESSENER.]

MESSENER  I pray you all give your audience,
And hear this matter with reverence,
By figure a moral play.
The Summoning of Everyman called it is,
That of our lives and ending shows
How transitory we be all day.°
The matter is wonder precious,
But the intent of it is more gracious
And sweet to bear away.
The story saith: Man, in the beginning
Look well, and take good heed to the ending,
Be you never so gay.
You think sin in the beginning full sweet,
Which in the end causeth the soul to weep,
When the body lieth in clay.
Here shall you see how fellowship and jollity,
Both strength, pleasure, and beauty,
Will fade from thee as flower in May.
For ye shall hear how our Heaven-King
Calleth Everyman to a general reckoning.
Give audience and hear what he doth say.

[Exit MESSENER.—Enter GOD.]

GOD  I perceive, here in my majesty,
How that all creatures be to me unkind,°
Living without dread in worldly prosperity.
Of ghostly sight the people be so blind,
Drowned in sin, they know me not for their God.
In worldly riches is all their mind:
They fear not of my righteousness the sharp rod;
My law that I showed when I for them died
They forget clean, and shedding of my blood red.
I hanged between two,² it cannot be denied:
To get them life I suffered to be dead.
I healed their feet, with thorns hurt was my head.
I could do no more than I did, truly—
And now I see the people do clean forsake me.
They use the seven deadly sins damnable,
As pride, coveitise,³ wrath, and lechery³
Now in the world be made commendable.
And thus they leave of angels the heavenly company.

² I.e., the two thieves between whom Christ was crucified.
³ The other three deadly sins are envy, gluttony, and sloth.
Everyman liveth so after his own pleasure,
And yet of their life they be nothing sure.
I see the more that I them forbear,
The worse they be from year to year:
All that liveth appaireth fast.

Therefore I will, in all the haste,
Have a reckoning of every man's person.
For, and I leave the people thus alone
In their life and wicked tempests,
Verily they will become much worse than beasts;
For now one would by envy another up eat.
Charity do they all clean forget.
I hoped well that every man
In my glory should make his mansion,
And thereto I had them all elect.
But now I see, like traitors deject,
They thank me not for the pleasure that I to them meant,
Nor yet for their being that I them have lent.
I proffered the people great multitude of mercy,
And few there be that asketh it heartily.

They be so cumbered with worldly riches
That needs on them I must do justice—
On every man living without fear.
Where art thou, Death, thou mighty messenger?

[Enter Death.]

Almighty God, I am here at your will,
Your commandment to fulfill.
Go thou to Everyman,
And show him, in my name,
A pilgrimage he must on him take,
Which he in no wise may escape;
And that he bring with him a sure reckoning
Without delay or any tarrying.

Lord, I will in the world go run over all,
And cruelly out-search both great and small.

[Exit God.]

Everyman will I beset that liveth beastly
Out of God's laws, and dreadeth not folly.
He that loveth riches I will strike with my dart,
His sight to blind, and from heaven to depart
Except that Almsdeeds be his good friend—
In hell for to dwell, world without end.

Lo, yonder I see Everyman walking;
Full little he thinketh on my coming;
His mind is on fleshly lusts and his treasure,
And great pain it shall cause him to endure
Before the Lord, Heaven-King.
Everyman, stand still! Whither art thou going Thus gaily? Hast thou thy Maker forget?
EVERYMAN Why askest thou?
Why wouldest thou weet?°
DEATH Yea, sir, I will show you:
In great haste I am sent to thee
From God out of his majesty.
EVERYMAN What! sent to me?
DEATH Yea, certainly.
Though thou have forgot him here,
He thinketh on thee in the heavenly sphere,
As, ere we depart, thou shalt know.
EVERYMAN What desireth God of me?
DEATH That shall I show thee:
A reckoning he will needs have Without any longer respite.
EVERYMAN To give a reckoning longer leisure I crave.
This blind matter troublèth my wit.
DEATH On thee thou must take a long journey:
Therefore thy book of count° with thee thou bring,
For turn again thou cannot by no way.
And look thou be sure of thy reckoning,
For before God thou shalt answer and shew
Thy many bad deeds and good but a few—
How thou hast spent thy life and in what wise,
Before the Chief Lord of Paradise.
Have ado that we were in that way,°
For weet thou well thou shalt make none attorney.
EVERYMAN Full unready I am such reckoning to give.
I know thee not. What messenger art thou?
DEATH I am Death that no man dreadeth,°
For every man I 'rest,° and no man spareth;
For it is God's commandment
That all to me should be obedient.
EVERYMAN O Death, thou comest when I had thee least in mind.
In thy power it lieth me to save:
Yet of my good° will I give thee, if thou wilt be kind,
Yea, a thousand pound shalt thou have—
And defer this matter till another day.
DEATH Everyman, it may not be, by no way.
I set nought by° gold, silver, nor riches,
Nor by pope, emperor, king, duke, nor princes,
For, and° I would receive gifts great,
All the world I might get.
But my custom is clean contrary:
I give thee no respite. Come hence and not tarry!

4. I.e., let's get started at once.
5. I.e., none to appear in your stead.
6. That fears nobody.
7. I care nothing for.
EVERYMAN Alas, shall I have no longer respite?
I may say Death giveth no warning.
To think on thee it maketh my heart sick,
For all unready is my book of reckoning.
But twelve year and I might have a biding,8
My counting-book I would make so clear
That my reckoning I should not need to fear.
Wherefore, Death, I pray thee, for God’s mercy,
Spare me till I be provided of remedy.

DEATH Thee availeth not to cry, weep, and pray;
But haste thee lightly9 that thou were gone that joumay
And prove thy friends, if thou can.
For weet thou well the tide abideth no man,
And in the world each living creature
For Adam’s sin must die of nature.9

EVERYMAN Death, if I should this pilgrimage take
And my reckoning surely make,
Show me, for saint charity,
Should I not come again shortly?

DEATH No, Everyman. And thou be once there,
Thou mayst never more come here,
Trust me verily.

EVERYMAN O gracious God in the high seat celestial,
Have mercy on me in this most need!
Shall I have company from this vale terrestrial
Of mine acquaintance that way me to lead?

DEATH Yea, if any be so hardy
That would go with thee and bear thee company.
Hie thee that thou were gone to God’s magnificence,
Thy reckoning to give before his presence.
What, weenest thou thy life is given thee,
And thy worldly goods also?

EVERYMAN I had weened so, verily.

DEATH Nay, nay, it was but lent thee.
For as soon as thou art go,
Another a while shall have it and then go therefro,
Even as thou hast done.
Everyman, thou art mad! Thou hast thy wits five,senses
And here on earth will not amend thy live!
For suddenly I do come.

EVERYMAN O wretched caitiff! Whither shall I flee
That I might ’scape this endless sorrow?
Now, gentle Death, spare me till tomorrow.
That I may amend me
With good advisement.10

DEATH Nay, thereto I will not consent,
Nor no man will I respite,
But to the heart suddenly I shall smite,

8. If I might have a delay for just twelve years.  9. In thy life.  9. Naturally.
Without any advisement.
Arid now out of thy sight I will me hie:
See thou make thee ready shortly,
For thou mayst say this is the day
That no man living may 'scape away.

[Exit DEATH.]

EVERYMAN  Alas, I may well weep with sighs deep:
Now have I no manner of company
To help me in my journey and me to keep.
And also my writing is full unready—
I would to God I had never be get!
To my soul a full great profit it had be.
For now I fear pains huge and great.
The time passeth: Lord, help, that all wrought!
For though I mourn, it availeth nought.
The day passeth and is almost ago:
I wot not well what for to do.
To whom were I best my complaint to make?
What and I to Fellowship thereof spake,
And showed him of this sudden chance?
For in him is all mine affiance,
We have in the world so many a day
Be good friends in sport and play.
I see him yonder, certainly.
I trust that he will bear me company.
Therefore to him will I speak to ease my sorrow.

[Enter FELLOWSHIP.]

205  Well met, good Fellowship, and good morrow!
FELLOWSHIP  Everyman, good morrow, by this day!
Sir, why lookest thou so piteously?
If anything be amiss, I pray thee me say,
That I may help to remedy.
EVERYMAN  Yea, good Fellowship, yea:
I am in great jeopardy.
FELLOWSHIP  My true friend, show to me your mind.
I will not forsake thee to my life's end
In the way of good company.
EVERYMAN  That was well spoken, and lovingly!
FELLOWSHIP  Sir, I must needs know your heaviness.
I have pity to see you in any distress.
If any have you wronged, ye shall revenged be,
Though I on the ground be slain for thee.
EVERYMAN  Verily, Fellowship, gramercy!
FELLOWSHIP  Tush! by thy thanks I set not a stree.
Show me your grief and say no more.

EVERYMAN If my heart should to you break, disclose
And then you to turn your mind from me,
And would not me comfort when ye hear me speak,
Then should I ten times sorrier be.

FELLOWSHIP Sir, I say as I will do, indeed.
EVERYMAN Then be you a good friend at need.
I have found you true herebefore.
FELLOWSHIP And so ye shall evermore.
For, in faith, and if thou go to hell,
I will not forsake thee by the way.
EVERYMAN Ye speak like a good friend. I believe you well.
I shall deserve it, and if I may.
FELLOWSHIP I speak of no deserving, by this day!
For he that will say and nothing do
Is not worthy with good company to go.
Therefore show me the grief of your mind,
As to your friend most loving and kind.
EVERYMAN I shall show you how it is:
Commanded I am to go a journey,
A long way, hard and dangerous,
And give a strict count, without delay,
Before the high judge Adonai.
Wherefore I pray you bear me company,
As ye have promised, in this journey.

FELLOWSHIP This is matter indeed! Promise is duty—
But, and I should take such a voyage on me,
I know it well, it should be to my pain.
Also it maketh me afraid, certain.
But let us take counsel here, as well as we can—
For your words would fright a strong man.

EVERYMAN Why, ye said if I, had need,
Ye would me never forsake, quick or dead,
Though it were to hell, truly.
FELLOWSHIP SO I said, certainly,
But such pleasures be set aside, the sooth to say.
And also, if we took such a journey,
When should we again come?

EVERYMAN Nay, never again, till the day of doom.
FELLOWSHIP In faith, then will not I come there!
Who hath you these tidings brought?
EVERYMAN Indeed, Death was with me here.

FELLOWSHIP NOW by God that all hath bought,
If Death were the messenger,
For no man that is living today
I will not go that loathsome journey—
Not for the father that begat me!

EVERYMAN Ye promised otherwise, pardie.
FELLOWSHIP I wot well I said so, truly.
And yet, if thou wilt eat and drink and make good cheer,
Or haunt to women the lusty company, \(^2\)
I would not forsake you while the day is clear,

EVERYMAN Yea, thereto ye would be ready—
To go to mirth, solace, \(^3\) and play:
Your mind to folly will sooner apply
Than to bear me company in my long journey.

FELLOWSHIP Now in good faith, I will not that way.
But, and thou will murder or any man kill,
In that I will help thee with a good will.
EVERYMAN O that is simple advice, indeed!
Gentle fellow, help me in my necessity:
We have loved long, and now I need—
And now, gentle Fellowship, remember me!

FELLOWSHIP Whether ye have loved me or no,
By Saint John, I will not with thee go!
EVERYMAN Yet I pray thee take the labor and do so much for me,
To bring me forward, \(^4\) for saint charity,
And comfort me till I come without the town.
FELLOWSHIP Nay, and thou would give me a new gown,
I will not a foot with thee go.
But, and thou had tarried, I would not have left thee so.
And as now, God speed thee in thy journey!
For from thee I will depart as fast as I may.
EVERYMAN Whither away, Fellowship? Will thou forsake me?
FELLOWSHIP Yea, by my fay! To God I betake thee.
EVERYMAN Farewell, good Fellowship! For thee my heart is sore.

FELLOWSHIP In faith, Everyman, farewell now at the ending:
For you I will remember that parting is mourning.

[Exit FELLOWSHIP.]

EVERYMAN Alack, shall we thus depart indeed—
Ah, Lady, help!—without any more comfort?
Lo, Fellowship forsaketh me in my most need!
For help in this world whither shall I resort?
Fellowship herebefore with me would merrily make,
And now little sorrow for me doth he take.
It is said, "In prosperity men friends may find
Which in adversity be full unkind."
Now whither for succor shall I flee,
Sith that Fellowship hath forsaken me?
To my kinsmen I will, truly,
Praying them to help me in my necessity.
I believe that they will do so,
For kind will creep where it may not go.\(^3\)

---

2. Or frequent the lusty company of women.
3. For kinship will creep where it cannot walk (i.e., kinsmen will suffer hardship for one another).
I will go 'say'—for yonder I see them—
Where° be ye now my friends and kinsmen.

[Enter KINDRED and COUSIN.]

KINDRED Here be we now at your commandment:
Cousin, I pray you show us your intent
In any wise, and not spare.

COUSIN Yea, Everyman, and to us declare
If ye be disposed to go anywhither.
For, weet° you well, we will live and die togethier.

KINDRED In wealth and woe we will with you hold,
For over his kin a man may be bold. 4

EVERYMAN Gramercy,° my friends and kinsmen kind.
Now shall I show you the grief of my mind.
I was commanded by a messenger
That is a high king's chief officer:
He bade me go a pilgrimage, to my pain—
And I know well I shall never come again.
Also I must give a reckoning strait,°
For I have a great enemy that hath me in wait, 5
Which intendeth me to hinder.

KINDRED What account is that which ye must render?
That would I know.

EVERYMAN Of all my works I must show
How I have lived and my days spent;
Also of ill deeds that I have used
In my time sith life was me lent.
Therefore I pray you go thither with me
To help me make mine account, for saint charity.

COUSIN What, to go thither? Is that the matter?
Nay, Everyman, I had liefer fast bread and water All this five year and more!

EVERYMAN Alas, that ever I was bore!°
For now shall I never be merry
If that you forsake me.

KINDRED Ah, sir, what? Ye be a merry man:
Take good heart to you and make no moan.
But one thing I warn you, by Saint Anne,
As for me, ye shall go alone.

EVERYMAN My Cousin, will you not with me go?

COUSIN NO, by Our Lady! I have the cramp in my toe:
Trust not to me. For, so God me speed,
I will deceive you in your most need.

KINDRED It availeth you not us to 'tice.°
Ye shall have my maid with all my heart:
She loveth to go to feasts, there to be nice,°

4. I.e., for a man may make demands of his kinsmen.
5. I.e., Satan lies in ambush for me.
6. I.e., rather fast on.
And to dance, and abroad to start.
I will give her leave to help you in that journey,
If that you and she may agree.

EVERYMAN Now show me the very effect of your mind:
Will you go with me or abide behind?
KINDRED Abide behind? Yea, that will I and I may!
Therefore farewell till another day.

EVERYMAN How should I be merry or glad?
For fair promises men to me make,
But when I have most need they me forsake.
I am deceived. That maketh me sad.
Cousin Cousin Everyman, farewell now,
For verily I will not go with you;
Also of mine own an unready reckoning
I have to account—therefore I make tarrying.
Now God keep thee, for now I go.

EVERYMAN Ah, Jesus, is all come hereto?
Lo, fair words maketh fools fain:
They promise and nothing will do, certain.
My kinsmen promised me faithfully
For to abide with me steadfastly,
And now fast away do they flee.
Even so Fellowship promised me.
What friend were best me of to provide?
I lose my time here longer to abide.
Yet in my mind a thing there is:
All my life I have loved riches;
If that my Good now help me might.
I will speak to him in this distress.
Where art thou, my Goods and riches?

GOODS Who calleth me? Everyman? What, hast thou haste?
I lie here in corners, trussed and piled so high,
And in chests I am locked so fast—
Also sacked in bags—thou mayst see with thine eye
I cannot stir, in packs low where I lie.
What would ye have? Lightly me say.

EVERYMAN Come hither, Good, in all the haste thou may.
For of counsel I must desire thee.

GOODS Sir, and ye in the world have sorrow or adversity,
That can I help you to remedy shortly.

7. To go gadding about.
EVERYMAN  It is another disease that grieveth me:
In this world it is not, I tell thee so.
I am sent for another way to go,
To give a strait count general
Before the highest Jupiter of all.
And all my life I have had joy and pleasure in thee:
Therefore I pray thee go with me,
For, peradventure, thou mayst before God Almighty
My reckoning help to clean and purify.
For it is said ever among that money maketh all right that is wrong.

GOODS  Nay, Everyman, I sing another song:
I follow no man in such voyages.
For, if I went with thee,
Thou shouldest fare much the worse for me;
For because on me thou did set thy mind,
Thy reckoning I have made blotted and blind,
That thine account thou cannot make truly—
And that hast thou for the love of me.

EVERYMAN  That would grieve me full sore
When I should come to that fearful answer.
Up, let us go thither together.

GOODS  Nay, not so, I am too brittle, I may not endure.
I will follow no man one foot, be ye sure.

EVERYMAN  Alas, I have thee loved and had great pleasure
All my life-days on good and treasure.

GOODS  That is to thy damnation, without leasing,
For my love is contrary to the love everlasting.
But if thou had me loved moderately during,
As to the poor to give part of me,
Then shouldest thou not in this dolor be,
Nor in this great sorrow and care.

EVERYMAN  Lo, now was I deceived ere I was ware,
And all I may wite blame on misspending of time.

GOODS  What, weekest thou that I am thine?

EVERYMAN  I had weened so.

GOODS  Nay, Everyman, I say no.
As for a while I was lent thee;
A season thou hast had me in prosperity.
My condition is man's soul to kill;
If I save one, a thousand I do spill.
Weenest thou that I will follow thee?
Nay, from this world, not verily.

EVERYMAN  I had weened otherwise.

GOODS  Therefore to thy soul Good is a thief;
For when thou art dead, this is my guise—
Another to deceive in the same wise
As I have done thee, and all to his soul's repreef.

EVERYMAN  O false Good, cursed thou be,
Thou traitor to God, that hast deceived me
And caught me in thy snare!

GOODS  Marry, thou brought thyself in care,
Whereof I am glad:
I must needs laugh, I cannot be sad.

GOODS  No, so God me speed!
Therefore farewell and have good day.

[Exit GOODS.]

EVERYMAN  Oh, to whom shall I make my moan
For to go with me in that heavy journey?

First Fellowship said he would with me gone.
His words were very pleasant and gay,
But afterward he left me alone.
Then spake I to my kinsmen, all in despair,
And also they gave me words fair—
They lacked no fair speaking,
But all forsake me in the ending.
Then went I to my Goods that I loved best,
In hope to have comfort; but there had I least,
For my Goods sharply did me tell
That he bringeth many into hell.
Then of myself I was ashamed,
And so I am worthy to be blamed:
Thus may I well myself hate.
Of whom shall I now counsel take?
I think that I shall never speed
Till that I go to my Good Deed.
But alas, she is so weak
That she can neither go nor speak.
Yet will I venture on her now.
My Good Deeds, where be you?

GOOD DEEDS  [speaking from the ground]
Here I lie, cold in the ground:
Thy sins hath me sore bound
That I cannot stir.

EVERYMAN  O Good Deeds, I stand in fear:
I must you pray of counsel,
For help now should come right well.
GOOD DEEDS  Everyman, I have understanding
That ye be summoned, account to make,
Before Messiah of Jer’salem King.
And you do by me,
that journey with you will I take.
EVERYMAN  Therefore I come to you my moan to make:
I pray you that ye will go with me.
GOOD DEEDS  I would full fain, but I cannot stand, verily.
EVERYMAN  Why, is there anything on you fall?

8. I.e., if you do what I say.
GOOD DEEDS  Yea, sir, I may thank you of all:
If ye had perfectly cheered me,
Your book of count full ready had be.

[GOOD DEEDS shows him the account book.]

Look, the books of your works and deeds eke,°
As how they lie under the feet,
To your soul’s heaviness.

EVERYMAN  Our Lord Jesus help me!
For one letter here I cannot see.

GOOD DEEDS  There is a blind° reckoning in time of distress!

EVERYMAN  Good Deeds, I pray you help me in this need,
Or else I am forever damned indeed.
Therefore help me to make reckoning
Before the Redeemer of all thing.
That King is and was and ever shall.

GOOD DEEDS  Everyman, I am sorry oP your fall
And fain would help you and° I were able.

EVERYMAN  Good Deeds, your counsel I pray you give me.

GOOD DEEDS  That shall I do verily,
Though that on my feet I may not go;
I have a sister that shall with you also,
Called Knowledge, which shall with you abide
To help you to make that dreadful reckoning.

[Enter KNOWLEDGE.]

KNOWLEDGE  Everyman, I will go with thee and be thy guide,
In thy most need to go by thy side.
EVERYMAN  In good condition I am now in everything,
And am whole content with this good thing,
Thanked be God my Creator.
GOOD DEEDS  And when she hath brought you there
Where thou shalt heal thee of thy smart,°
Then go you with your reckoning and your Good Deeds together

EVERYMAN  For to make you joyful at heart
Before the blessed Trinity.
GOOD DEEDS  My Good Deeds, gramercy!
I am well content, certainly,
With your words sweet.

KNOWLEDGE  NOW go we together lovingly
To Confession, that cleansing river.
EVERYMAN  For joy I weep—I would we were there!
But I pray you give me cognition,
Where dwelleth that holy man Confession?

KNOWLEDGE  In the House of Salvation:
We shall us comfort, by God’s grace.

[KNOWLEDGE leads EVERYMAN to CONFESSION.]
Lo, this is Confession: kneel down and ask mercy,
For he is in good conceit with God Almighty.
EVERYMAN [kneeling] O glorious fountain that all uncleanness doth clarify,
Wash from me the spots of vice unclean,
That on me no sin may be seen.
I come with Knowledge for my redemption,
Redempt with heart and full contrition,
For I am commanded a pilgrimage to take
And great accounts before God to make.
Now I pray you, Shrift, mother of Salvation,
Help my Good Deeds for my piteous exclamation.

CONFESSION I know your sorrow well, Everyman:
Because with Knowledge ye come to me,
I will you comfort as well as I can,
And a precious jewel I will give thee,
Called Penance, voider of adversity.
Therewith shall your body chastised be—
With abstinence and perseverance in God's service.
Here shall you receive that scourge of me,
Which is penance strong that ye must endure,
To remember thy Saviour was scourged for thee
With sharp scourges, and suffered it patiently.
So must thou ere thou 'scape that painful pilgrimage.
Knowledge, keep him in this voyage,
And by that time Good Deeds will be with thee.
But in any wise be secure of mercy—
For your time draweth fast—and ye will saved be.
Ask God mercy and he will grant, truly.
When with the scourge of penance man doth him bind,
The oil of forgiveness then shall he find.
EVERYMAN Thanked be God for his gracious work,
For now I will my penance begin.
This hath rejoiced and lighted my heart.
Though the knots be painful and hard within.

KNOWLEDGE Everyman, look your penance that ye fulfill,
What pain that ever it to you be;
And Knowledge shall give you counsel at will
How your account ye shall make clearly.

EVERYMAN O eternal God, O heavenly figure,
O way of righteousness, O goodly vision,
Which Adam forfeited by his disobedience;
O blessed Godhead, elect and high Divine,
Forgive my grievous offense!
Here I cry thee mercy in this presence:
O ghostly Treasure, O Ransomer and Redeemer,
Of all the world Hope and Conduiter.

9. I.e., to my senses. "Knots": i.e., the knots on the scourge (whip) of penance.
EVERYMAN

Mirror of joy, Founder of mercy,
Which enlumineth heaven and earth thereby,
Hear my clamorous complaint, though it late be;
Receive my prayers, of thy benignity.
Though I be a sinner most abominable,
Yet let my name be written in Moses' table.¹

Mary, pray to the Maker of all thing
Me for to help at my ending,
And save me from the power of my enemy,
For Death assaileth me strongly.
And Lady, that I may by mean of thy prayer
Of your Son's glory to be partner—
1
I beseech you help my soul to save.
Knowledge, give me the scourge of penance:
My flesh therewith shall give acquittance.²
I will now begin, if God give me grace.

KNOWLEDGE Everyman, God give you time and space!³
Thus I bequeath you in the hands of our Saviour:
Now may you make your reckoning sure.
EVERYMAN In the name of the Holy Trinity
My body sore punished shall be:
Take this, body, for the sin of the flesh!
Also thou delightest to go gay and fresh,
And in the way of damnation thou did me bring,
Therefore suffer now strokes of punishing!
Now of penance I will wade the water clear,
To save me from purgatory, that sharp fire.

GOOD DEEDS I thank God, now can I walk and go,
And am delivered of my sickness and woe.
Therefore with Everyman I will go, and not spare:
His good works I will help him to declare.

KNOWLEDGE NOW, Everyman, be merry and glad:
Your Good Deeds cometh now, ye may not be sad.
Now is your Good Deeds whole and sound,
Going upright upon the ground.

EVERYMAN My heart is light, and shall be evermore.
Now will I smite faster than I did before.

GOOD DEEDS Everyman, pilgrim, my special friend,
Blessed be thou without end!
For thee is preparèd the eternal glory.
Ye have made whole and sound
Therefore I will bide by thee in every stound.⁴

EVERYMAN Welcome, my Good Deeds! Now I hear thy voice,
I weep for very sweetness of love.

KNOWLEDGE Be no more sad, but ever rejoice:
God seeth thy living in his throne above.
Put on this garment to thy behave.⁴

¹ "Moses' table" is here the tablet on which are recorded those who have been baptized and have done penance.

² satisfaction for sins

³ opportunity

⁴ walking, prepared, trial, advantage
Which is wet with your tears—
Or else before God you may it miss
When ye to your journey's end come shall.

EVERYMAN Gentle Knowledge, what do ye it call?

KNOWLEDGE It is a garment of sorrow;
From pain it will you borrow:
Contrition it is
That getteth forgiveness;
It pleaseth God passing well.

GOOD DEEDS Everyman, will you wear it for your heal?

EVERYMAN Now blessed be Jesu, Mary's son,
For now have I on true contrition.
And let us go now without tarrying.
Good Deeds, have we clear our reckoning?

GOOD DEEDS Yea, indeed, I have it here.

EVERYMAN Then I trust we need not fear.
Now friends, let us not part in twain.

KNOWLEDGE Nay, Everyman, that will we not, certain.

GOOD DEEDS Yet must thou lead with thee
Three persons of great might.

EVERYMAN Who should they be?

GOOD DEEDS Discretion and Strength they hight,
And thy Beauty may not abide behind.

KNOWLEDGE Also ye must call to mind
Your Five-Wits as for your counselors.

GOOD DEEDS YOU must have them ready at all hours.

EVERYMAN How shall I get them hither?

GOOD DEEDS TO your help and comfort, ye may believe me.

STRENGTH We will bring him all thither,
To his help and comfort, ye may believe me.

DISCRETION So will we go with him all together.

EVERYMAN Almighty God, loved might thou be!
I give thee laud that I have hisher brought Strength, Discretion, Beauty, and Five-Wits—lack I nought—
And my Good Deeds, with Knowledge clear.
All be in my company at my will here:
I desire no more to my business.

STRENGTH And I, Strength, will by you stand in distress,
Though thou would in battle fight on the ground.

FIVE-WITS And though it were through the world round,
EVERYMAN  /  479

We will not depart for sweet ne sour.

BEAUTY   No more will I, until death's hour,
Whatsoever thereof befall.

DISCRETION   Everyman, advise you first of all:
Go with a good advisement\(^6\) and deliberation.
We all give you virtuous\(^6\) monition\(^6\)
That all shall be well.

EVERYMAN - My friends, hearken what I will tell;
I pray God reward you in his heaven-sphere;
Now hearken all that be here,
For I will make my testament,
Here before you all present:
In alms half my good\(^6\) I will give with my hands twain,
In the way of charity with good intent;
And the other half, still\(^6\) shall remain,
I 'queath\(^6\) to be returned there it ought to be.
This I do in despite of the fiend of hell,
To go quit out of his perel,\(^2\)
Ever after and this day.

KNOWLEDGE   Everyman, hearken what I say:
Go to Priesthood, I you advise,
And receive of him, in any wise,\(^6\)
The holy sacrament and ointment\(^6\) togethier;
Then shortly see ye turn again hither:
We will all abide you here.

FIVE-WITS Yea, Everyman, hie you that ye ready were.
There is no emperor, king, duke, ne baron,
That of God hath commission
As hath the least priest in the world being:
For of the blessed sacraments pure and bening\(^6\)
He beareth the keys, and thereof hath the cure\(^6\)
For man's redemption—it is ever sure—
Which God for our souls' medicine
Gave us out of his heart with great pine,\(^9\)
Here in this transitory life for thee and me.
The blessed sacraments seven there be:
Baptism, confirmation, with priesthood\(^6\) good,
And the sacrament of God's precious flesh and blood,
Marriage, the holy extreme unction, and penance:
These seven be good to have in remembrance,
Gracious sacraments of high divinity.

EVERYMAN   Fain\(^6\) would I receive that holy body,
And meekly to my ghostly\(^6\) father I will go.

FIVE-WITS   Everyman, that is the best that ye can do:
God will you to salvation bring,
For priesthood exceedeth all other thing:
To us Holy Scripture they do teach,
And converteth man from sin, heaven to reach;
God hath to them more power given

\(^2\) In order to go free of danger from him.
Than to any angel that is in heaven.
With five words he may consecrate
God's body in flesh and blood to make,
And handleth his Maker between his hands.
The priest bindeth and unbindeth all bands,
Both in earth and in heaven.
Thou ministere all the sacraments seven:
Though we kiss thy feet, thou wast worthy;
Thou art surgeon that curest sin deadly;
No remedy we find under God
But all only priesthood.

Everyman, God gave priests that dignity
And setteth them in his stead among us to be.
Thus be they above angels in degree.

Exit EVERYMAN.

KNOWLEDGE If priests be good, it is so, surely.

But when Jesu hanged on the cross with great smart,
There he gave out of his blessed heart
The same sacrament in great torment,
He sold them not to us, that Lord omnipotent:
Therefore Saint Peter the Apostle doth say
That Jesu's curse hath all they
Which God their Saviour do buy or sell,
Or they for any money do take or tell.
Sinful priests giveth the sinners example bad:
Their children sitteth by other men's fires, I have heard;
And some haunteth women's company
With unclean life, as lusts of lechery.
These be with sin made blind.

FIVE-WITS I trust to God no such may we find.
Therefore let us priesthood honor,
And follow their doctrine for our souls' succor.
We be their sheep and they shepherds be
By whom we all be kept in surety.
Peace, for yonder I see Everyman come,
Which hath made true satisfaction.

GOOD DEEDS Methink it is he indeed.

[Re-enter EVERYMAN.]

EVERYMAN Now Jesu be your alder speed!
I have received the sacrament for my redemption,

3. The five words ("For this is my body") spoken by the priest when he offers the wafer at communion.
4. A reference to the power of the keys, inherited by the priesthood from St. Peter, who received it from Christ (Matthew 16:19) with the promise that whatever St. Peter bound or loosed on earth would be bound or loosed in heaven.
5. Except from priesthood alone.
6. To give or receive money for the sacraments is simony, named after Simon, who wished to buy the gift of the Holy Ghost and was cursed by St. Peter.
7. Or who, for any sacrament, take or count out money.
8. The prosperer of you all.
And then mine extreme unction.
Blessed be all they that counseled me to take it!
And now, friends, let us go without longer respite.
I thank God that ye have tarried so long.
Now set each of you on this rood your hond
And shortly follow me:
I go before there I would be. God be our guide!

STRENGTH  Everyman, we will not from you go
Till ye have done this voyage long.
DISCRETION  I, Discretion, will bide by you also.
KNOWLEDGE  And though this pilgrimage be never so strong.
I will never part you fro.

STRENGTH  Everyman, I will be as sure by thee
As ever I did by Judas Maccabee. 9
EVERYMAN  Alas, I am so faint I may not stand—
My limbs under me doth fold!
Friends, let us not turn again to this land,
Not for all the world's gold.
For into this cave must I creep
And turn to earth, and there to sleep.
BEAUTY  What, into this grave, alas?
EVERYMAN  Yea, there shall ye consume, more and lass. 1
BEAUTY  And what, should I smother here?
EVERYMAN  Yea, by my faith, and nevermore appear.
In this world live no more we shall,
But in heaven before the highest Lord of all.
BEAUTY  I cross out all this! Adieu, by Saint John—
I take my tape in my lap and am gone. 2
EVERYMAN  What, Beauty, whither will ye?
BEAUTY  Peace, I am deaf—I look not behind me,
Not and thou wouldest give me all the gold in thy chest.

[Exit  BEAUTY.]

EVERYMAN  Alas, whereto may I trust?
Beauty goeth fast away fro me—
She promised with me to live and die!
STRENGTH  Everyman, I will thee also forsake and deny.
Thy game liketh me not at all.
EVERYMAN  Why then, ye will forsake me all?
Sweet Strength, tarry a little space.
STRENGTH  Nay, sir, by the rood of grace,
I will hie me from thee fast,
Though thou weep till thy heart tobrast. 6
EVERYMAN  Ye would ever bide by me, ye said.
STRENGTH  Yea, I have you far enough conveyed 10
Ye be old enough, I understand.

9. Judas Maccabees was an enormously powerful warrior in the defense of Israel against the Syrians in late Old Testament times.
1. More and less (i.e., all of you).
2. I tuck my skirts in my belt and am off.
Your pilgrimage to take on hand:
I repent that I hither came.

EVERYMAN Strength, you to displease I am to blame,³

STRENGTH Yet promise is debt, this ye well wot.°

Yet promise is debt, this ye well wot.°

EVERYMAN In faith, I care not:

STRENGTH Thou but a fool to complain;

You spend your speech and waste your brain.

Go, thrust thee into the ground.

[Exit STRENGTH.]

EVERYMAN I had weened° surer I should you have found.

He that trusteth in his Strength
She him deceiveth at the length.
Both Strength and Beauty forsaketh me—
Yet they promised me fair and lovingly.

DISCRETION Everyman, I will after Strength be gone:
As for me, I will leave you alone.

EVERYMAN Why Discretion, will ye forsake me?

DISCRETION Yes, in faith, I will go from thee.

For when Strength goeth before,

EVERYMAN Yet I pray thee, for the love of the Trinity,

Look in my grave once piteously.

DISCRETION Nay, so nigh will I not come.

Farewell everyone!

[Exit DISCRETION.]

EVERYMAN O all thing faileth save God alone—

Beauty, Strength, and Discretion.

For when Death bloweth his blast
They all run fro me full fast.

FIVE-WITS Everyman, my leave now of thee I take.

EVERYMAN I will follow the other, for here I thee forsake.

FIVE-WITS I will no longer thee keep.⁴

Now farewell, and there an end!

[Exit FIVE-WITS.]

EVERYMAN O Jesu, help, all hath forsaken me!

GOOD DEEDS Nay, Everyman, I will bide with thee:
I will not forsake thee indeed;
Thou shalt find me a good friend at need.

EVERYMAN Gramercy, Good Deeds! Now may I true friends see.

They have forsaken me every one—
EVERYMAN  /  483

I loved them better than my Good Deeds alone.
Knowledge, will ye forsake me also?
But not yet, for no manner of danger.

KNOWLEDGE  Yea, Everyman, when ye to Death shall go,
EVERYMAN  Gramercy, Knowledge, with all my heart!
KNOWLEDGE  Nay, yet will I not from hence depart
Till I see where ye shall become.4
EVERYMAN  Methink, alas, that I must be gone
To make my reckoning and my debts pay.
For I see my time is nigh spent away,
Take example, all ye that this do hear or see,
How they that I best loved do forsake me,
Except my Good Deeds that bideth truly.

GOOD DEEDS  All earthly things is but vanity.
Beauty, Strength, and Discretion do man forsake,
Foolish friends and kinsmen that fair spake—
All fleeth save Good Deeds, and that am I.
EVERYMAN  Have mercy on me, God most mighty,
And stand by me, thou mother and maid, holy Mary!
GOOD DEEDS  Fear not: I will speak for thee.
EVERYMAN  Here I cry God mercy!
GOOD DEEDS  Short our end, and 'minish our pain.5
Let us go, and never come again.

EVERYMAN  Into thy hands, Lord, my soul I commend:
Receive it, Lord, that it be not lost.
As thou me boughtest,4 so me defend,
And save me from the fiend's boast,
That I may appear with that blessed host
That shall be saved at the day of doom.

In manus tuas, of mights most,
Forever commendō spiritum meum.6

KNOWLEDGE  NOW hath he suffered that we all shall endure,
The Good Deeds shall make all sure.
Now hath he made ending,
Methinketh that I hear angels sing
And make great joy and melody
Where Everyman's soul received shall be.
ANGEL  [within]  Come, excellent elect5 spouse to Jesu!7
Here above thou shalt go
Because of thy singular virtue.
Now the soul is taken the body fro,
Thy reckoning is crystal clear:
Now shalt thou into the heavenly sphere—

4. Till I see what shall become of you.
5. I.e., make our dying quick and diminish our pain.
6. Into thy hands, O greatest of powers, I commend my spirit forever.
7. The soul is often referred to as the bride of Jesus.
Unto the which all ye shall come
That liveth well before the day of doom.

[Enter DOCTOR.]

DOCTOR This memorial men may have in mind:
Ye hearers, take it of worth, old and young,
And forsake Pride, for he deceiveth you in the end.
And remember Beauty, Five-Wits, Strength, and Discretion,
They all at the last do Everyman forsake,
Save his Good Deeds there doth he take—
But beware, for and they be small,
Before God he hath no help at all—
None excuse may be there for Everyman.

Alas, how shall he do then?
For after death amends may no man make,
For then mercy and pity doth him forsake.
If his reckoning be not clear when he doth come,
God will say, "Ite, maledicti, in ignem eternum!"

And he that hath his account whole and sound,
High in heaven he shall be crowned,
Unto which place God bring us all thither,
That we may live body and soul togethers.
Thereto help, the Trinity!

Amen, say ye, for saint charity.

9. Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.
The Ancient Roman poet Virgil characterized Britain as a wild, remote place set apart from all the world, and it must still have seemed so in the early sixteenth century to the cosmopolitan inhabitants of cities like Venice, Madrid, and Paris. To be sure, some venturesome travelers crossed the Channel and visited London, Oxford, or Cambridge, bringing home reports of bustling markets, impressive universities, and ambitious nobles vying for position at an increasingly powerful royal court. But these visitors were but a trickle compared with the flood of wealthy young Englishmen (and, to a lesser extent, Englishwomen) who embarked at the first opportunity for the Continent. English travelers were virtually obliged to learn some French, Italian, or Spanish, for they would encounter very few people who knew their language. On returning home, they would frequently wear foreign fashions—much to the disgust of moralists—and would pepper their speech with foreign phrases.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, the English language had almost no prestige abroad, and there were those at home who doubted that it could serve as a suitable medium for serious, elevated, or elegant discourse. It is no accident that one of the first works in this selection of sixteenth-century literature, Thomas More's Utopia, was not written in English: More, who began his great book in 1515 when he was on a diplomatic mission in the Netherlands, was writing for an international intellectual community, and as such his language of choice was Latin. His work quickly became famous throughout Europe, but it was not translated into English until the 1550s. Evidently, neither More himself nor the London printers and booksellers thought it imperative to publish a vernacular Utopia. Yet by the century's end there were signs of a great increase in what we might call linguistic self-confidence, signs that at least some contemporary observers were aware that something extraordinary had happened to their language. Though in 1600 England still remained somewhat peripheral to the Continent, English had been fashioned into an immensely powerful expressive medium, one whose cadences in the works of Marlowe, Shakespeare, or the translators of the Bible continue after more than four centuries to thrill readers.

How did it come about that by the century’s end so many remarkable poems, plays, and prose works were written in English? The answer lies in part in the spectacular creativity of a succession of brilliant writers, the best of whom are represented in these pages. Still, a vital literary culture is the product of a complex process, involving thousands of more modest, half-hidden creative acts sparked by a wide range of motives, some of which we will briefly explore.

THE COURT AND THE CITY

The development of the English language in the sixteenth century is linked at least indirectly to the consolidation and strengthening of the English state. Preoccupied by violent clashes between the thuggish feudal retainers of rival barons, England through most of the fifteenth century had rather limited time and inclination to cultivate rhetorical skills. The social and economic health of the nation had been severely damaged by the so-called Wars of the Roses, a vicious, decades-long struggle for royal power between the noble houses of York and Lancaster. The struggle was resolved by the establishment of the Tudor dynasty that ruled England from 1485 to 1603. The family name derives from Owen Tudor, an ambitious Welshman who himself had no claim to the throne but who married Catherine of Valois, widow of the Lancastrian king Henry V. Their grandson, the earl of Richmond, who also inherited Lancastrian blood on his mother's side, became the first Tudor monarch; he won the crown by leading the army that defeated and killed the reigning Yorkist king, Richard III, at the battle of Bosworth Field. The victorious Richmond, crowned King Henry VII in 1485, promptly consolidated his rather shaky claim to the throne by marrying Elizabeth of the house of York, hence effectively uniting the two rival factions.

England's barons, impoverished and divided by the dynastic wars, could not effectively oppose the new power of the Crown, and the leaders of the Church also generally supported the royal power. The wily Henry VII was therefore able to counter the multiple and competing power structures characteristic of feudal society and to impose a much stronger central authority and order on the nation. Initiated by the first Tudor sovereign, this consolidation progressed throughout the sixteenth century; by the reign of the last Tudor—Henry's granddaughter, Elizabeth I—though the ruler still needed the consent of Parliament on crucial matters (including the all-important one of levying taxes), the royal court had concentrated in itself much of the nation's power.

The court was a center of culture as well as power: court entertainments such as theater and masque (a sumptuous, elaborately costumed performance of dance, song, and poetry); court fashions in dress and speech; court tastes in painting, music, and poetry—all shaped the taste and the imagination of the country as a whole. Culture and power were not, in any case, easily separable in Tudor England. In a society with no freedom of speech as we understand it and with relatively limited means of mass communication, important public issues were often aired indirectly, through what we might now regard as entertainment, while lyrics that to us seem slight and nonchalant could... serve as carefully crafted manifestations of rhetorical agility by aspiring courtiers.

Whereas late medieval noblemen had guarded their power by keeping their distance from London and the king, ruling over semi-independent fiefdoms, in the Tudor era the route to power lay in proximity to the royal body. (One of the coveted positions in the court of Henry VIII was Groom of the Stool, “close stool” being the Tudor term for toilet.) The monarch’s chief ministers and favorites were the primary channels through which patronage was dispensed to courtiers who competed for offices in the court, the government bureaucracies, the royal household, the army, the church, and the universities, or who sought titles, grants of land, leases, or similar favors. But if proximity held out the promise of wealth and power, it also harbored danger. Festive evenings with the likes of the ruthless Henry VIII were not occasions for relaxation. The court fostered paranoia, and an attendant obsession with secrecy, spying, duplicity, and betrayal.

Tudor courtiers were torn between the need to protect themselves and the equally pressing need to display themselves. For lessons in the art of intrigue, many no doubt turned to Machiavelli’s notorious II Principe (The Prince), with its cool guidance on how power may be gained and kept. For advice on the cultivation and display of the self, they could resort to the still more influential II Cortegiano (The Courtier) by Count Baldassare Castiglione. It was particularly important, Castiglione wrote, to conceal the effort that lay behind elegant accomplishments, so that they would seem natural. In this anxious atmosphere, courtiers became highly practiced at crafting and deciphering graceful words with double or triple meanings. Sixteenth-century poets had much to learn from courtiers, the Elizabethan critic George Puttenham observed; indeed many of the best poets in the period, Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others, were courtiers.

If court culture fostered performances for a small coterie audience, other forces in Tudor England pulled toward a more public sphere. Markets expanded significantly, international trade flourished, and cities throughout the realm experienced a rapid surge in size and importance. London’s population in particular soared, from 60,000 in 1520, to 120,000 in 1550, to 375,000 a century later, making it the largest and fastest-growing city not only in England but in all of Europe. Every year in the first half of the seventeenth century about 10,000 people migrated to London from other parts of England—wages in London tended to be around 50 percent higher than in the rest of the country—and it is estimated that one in eight English people lived in London at some point in their lives. Elderly Londoners in the 1590s could barely recognize the city of their childhood; London’s boom was one factor among many contributing to the sense of a culture moving at increasing velocity away from its historical roots.

About a decade before Henry VII won his throne, the art of printing from movable metal type, a German invention, had been introduced into England by William Caxton (ca. 1422—1491), who had learned and practiced it in the Low Countries. Though reliable statistics are impossible to come by, literacy seems to have increased during the fifteenth century and still more during the sixteenth, when Protestantism encouraged a direct encounter with the Bible. Printing made books cheaper and more plentiful, providing more opportunity to read and more incentive to learn. The greater availability of books may also have reinforced the trend toward silent reading, a trend that gradually transformed what had been a communal experience into a more intimate encounter with a text.

Yet it would be a mistake to imagine these changes as sudden and dramatic. Manuscripts retained considerable prestige among the elite; throughout the sixteenth and well into the seventeenth centuries court poets in particular were wary of the "stigma of print" that might mark their verse as less exclusive. Although Caxton, who was an author and translator as well as a printer, introduced printed books, he attempted to cater to courtly tastes by translating works whose tone was more medieval than modern. The fascination with the old chivalric code of behavior is reflected as well in the jousts and tournaments that continued at court for a century, long after gunpowder had rendered them obsolete. As often in an age of spectacular novelty, many people looked back to an idealized past. Indeed the great innovations of the Tudor era—intellectual, governmental, and religious—were all presented at the time as attempts to restore lost links with ancient traditions.

RENAISSANCE HUMANISM

During the fifteenth century a few English clerics and government officials had journeyed to Italy and had seen something of the extraordinary cultural and intellectual movement flourishing in the city-states there. That movement, generally known as the Renaissance, involved a rebirth of letters and arts stimulated by the recovery of texts and artifacts from classical antiquity, the development of techniques such as linear perspective, and the creation of powerful new aesthetic practices based on classical models. It also unleashed new ideas and new social, political, and economic forces that gradually displaced the spiritual and communal values of the Middle Ages. To Renaissance intellectuals and artists, the achievements of the pagan philosophers of ancient Greece and Rome came to seem more compelling than the subtle distinctions drawn by medieval Christian theologians. In the brilliant, intensely competitive, and vital world of Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo, the submission of the human spirit to penitential discipline gave way to unleashed curiosity, individual self-assertion, and a powerful conviction that man was the measure of all things. Yet the superb human figure placed at the center of the Renaissance world-view was also seen as remarkably malleable. "We have made thee neither of heaven nor of earth, neither mortal nor immortal," God tells Adam, in the Florentine Pico della Mirandola's Oration on the Dignity of Man (1486), "so that with freedom of choice and with honor, as though the maker and molder of thyself, thou mayest fashion thyself in whatever shape thou shalt prefer." "As though the maker and molder of thyself"; this vision of self-fashioning may be glimpsed in the poetry of Petrarch, the sculpture of Donatello, and the statecraft of Lorenzo de' Medici. But in England it was not until Henry VII's reign brought some measure of political stability that the Renaissance could take root, and it was not until the accession of Henry VIII that it began to flower.

This flowering, when it occurred, came not, as in Italy, in the visual arts and architecture. It came rather in the spiritual and intellectual orientation known as humanism. More's Utopia (1516), with its dream of human existence entirely transformed by a radical change in institutional arrangements, is an extreme instance of a general humanist interest in education: in England and elsewhere, humanism was bound up with struggles over the purposes of education and curriculum reform. The great Dutch humanist Erasmus, who spent some time in England and developed a close friendship with More, was a leader in the assault on what he and others regarded as a hopelessly narrow and outmoded intellectual culture based on scholastic hair-splitting and a dogmatic adherence to the philosophy of Aristotle. English humanists, including John Colet (who, as dean of St. Paul’s Cathedral, recast its grammar school on humanist principles), Roger Ascham (tutor to Princess Elizabeth), and Sir Thomas Elyot, wrote treatises on education to promote the kind of learning they regarded as the most suitable preparation for public service. That education—predominantly male and conducted by tutors in wealthy families or in grammar schools—was still ordered according to the subjects of the medieval trivium (grammar, logic, and rhetoric) and quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music), but its focus shifted from training for the Church to the general acquisition of “literature,” in the sense both of literacy and of cultural knowledge. For some of the more intellectually ambitious humanists, that knowledge extended to ancient Greek, whose enthusiastic adherents began to challenge the entrenched prestige of Latin.

Still, at the core of the curriculum remained the study of Latin, the mastery of which was in effect a prolonged male puberty rite involving pain as well as pleasure. Though some educators counseled mildness, punishment was an established part of the pedagogy of the age, and even gifted students could scarcely have escaped recurrent flogging. The purpose was to train the sons of the nobility and gentry to speak and write good Latin, the language of diplomacy, of the professions, and of all higher learning. Their sisters were always educated at home or in other noble houses. They chiefly learned modern languages, religion, music, and needlework, but they very seldom received the firm grounding in ancient languages and classical literature so central to Renaissance culture. Elizabethan schoolmasters sought to impart facility and rhetorical elegance, but the books their students laboriously pored over were not considered mere exhibitions of literary style: from the Sententiae Pueriles (Maxims for Children) for beginners on Up through the dramatists Terence, Plautus, and Seneca, the poets Virgil and Horace, and the orator Cicero, the classics were also studied for the moral, political, and philosophical truths they contained. Though originating in pagan times, those truths could, in the opinion of many humanists, be reconciled to the moral vision of Christianity. The result, perplexing for some modern readers, is that pagan gods and goddesses flourish on the pages of even such a devoutly Christian poem as Edmund Spenser’s Faerie Queene.

Humanists committed to classical learning were faced with the question of whether to write their own works in Latin or in English. To many learned men, influenced both by the humanist exaltation of the classical languages and by the characteristic Renaissance desire for eternal fame, the national languages seemed relatively unstable and ephemeral. Intellectuals had long shared a pan-European world of scientific inquiry, so that works by such English scientists as William Gilbert, William Harvey, and Francis Bacon easily joined those by Nicolaus Copernicus, Johannes Kepler, and Andreas Vesalius on the common linguistic ground of Latin. But throughout Europe nationalism and the expansion of the reading public were steadily strengthening the power and allure of the vernacular. The famous schoolmaster Richard Mulcaster (ca. 1530—1611), Spenser’s teacher, captured this emergent sense of national identity in singing the praises of his native tongue:
Is it not indeed a marvelous bondage, to become servants to one tongue for learning's sake the most of our time, with loss of most time, whereas we may have the very same treasure in our own tongue, with the gain of more time? our own bearing the joyful title of our liberty and freedom, the Latin tongue remembering us of our thralldom and bondage? I love Rome, but London better; I favor Italy, but England more; I honor the Latin, but I worship the English.

These two impulses—humanist reverence for the classics and English pride in the vernacular language—gave rise to many distinguished translations throughout the century: Homer's Iliad and Odyssey by George Chapman, Plutarch's Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans by Sir Thomas North, and Ovid's Metamorphoses by Arthur Golding. Translators also sought to make available in English the most notable literary works in the modern languages: Castiglione's II Cortegiano by Sir Thomas Hoby, Ariosto's Orlando furioso (Orlando mad) by Sir John Harington, and Montaigne's Essais by John Florio. The London book trade of the sixteenth century was a thoroughly international affair.

THE REFORMATION

There had long been serious ideological and institutional tensions in the religious life of England, but officially at least England in the early sixteenth century had a single religion, Catholicism, whose acknowledged head was the pope in Rome. For its faithful adherents the Roman Catholic Church was the central institution in their lives, a universal infallible guide to human existence from cradle to grave and on into the life to come. They were instructed by its teachings, corrected by its discipline, sustained by its sacraments, and comforted by its promises. At Mass, its most sacred ritual, the congregation could witness a miracle, as the priest held aloft the Host and uttered the words that transformed the bread and wine into the body and blood of God incarnate. A vast system of confession, pardons, penance, absolution, indulgences, sacred relics, and ceremonies gave the unmarried male clerical hierarchy great power, at once spiritual and material, over their largely illiterate flock. The Bible, the liturgy, and most of the theological discussions were in Latin, which few lay people could understand; however, religious doctrine and spirituality were mediated to them by the priests, by beautiful church art and music, and by the liturgical ceremonies of daily life—festivals, holy days, baptisms, marriages, exorcisms, and funerals.

Several of the key doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church had been challenged in fourteenth-century England by the teachings of John Wycliffe and his followers, known as the Lollards. But the heretical challenge had been ruthlessly suppressed, and the embers of dissent lay largely dormant until they were ignited once again in Germany by Martin Luther, an Augustinian monk and professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg. What began in November 1517 as an academic disputation grew with amazing speed into a bitter, far-reaching, and bloody revolt that forever ruptured the unity of Western Christendom.

When Luther rose up against the ancient church, he did so in the name of private conscience enlightened by a personal reading of the Scriptures. A person of formidable intellectual energy, eloquence, and rhetorical violence,
Luther charged that the pope and his hierarchy were the servants of Satan and that the Church had degenerated into a corrupt, worldly conspiracy designed to bilk the credulous and subvert secular authority. Salvation depended upon destroying this conspiracy and enabling all of the people to regain direct access to the word of God by means of vernacular translations of the Bible. The common watchwords of the Reformation, as the movement Luther sparked came to be known, were sola scriptura and sola fide: only the Scriptures (not the Church or tradition or the clerical hierarchy) have authority in matters of religion and should determine what an individual must believe and practice; only the faith of the individual (not good works or the scrupulous observance of religious rituals) can effect a Christian's salvation.

These tenets, heretical in the eyes of the Catholic Church, spread and gathered force, especially in northern Europe, where major leaders like the Swiss pastor Ulrich Zwingli in Zurich and the French theologian John Calvin in Geneva, elaborating various and sometimes conflicting doctrinal principles, organized the populace to overturn the existing church and established new institutional structures. In England, however, the Reformation began less with popular discontent and theological disputation than with dynastic politics and royal greed. Henry VIII, who had received from Pope Leo X the title Defender of the Faith for writing a diatribe against Luther, craved a legitimate son to succeed to the throne, and his queen, Catherine of Aragon, failed to give him one. (Catherine had borne six children, but only a daughter, Mary, survived infancy.) After lengthy negotiations, the pope, under pressure from Catherine's powerful Spanish family, refused to grant the king the divorce he sought in order to marry Anne Boleyn. A series of momentous events followed, as England lurched away from the Church of Rome.

In 1531 Henry forced the entire clergy of England to beg pardon for having usurped royal authority in the administration of canon law (the law that governed such matters as divorce). Two years later Henry's marriage to Catherine was officially declared null and void and Anne Boleyn was crowned queen. The king was promptly excommunicated by the pope, Clement VII. In the following year, a parliamentary Act of Succession required an oath from all adult male subjects confirming the new dynastic settlement. Thomas More and John Fisher, the bishop of Rochester, were among the small number who refused. The Act of Supremacy, passed later in the year, formally declared the king to be "Supreme Head of the Church in England" and again required an oath to this effect. In 1535 and 1536 further acts made it treasonous to refuse the oath of royal supremacy or, as More had tried to do, to remain silent. The first victims were three Carthusian monks who rejected the oath—"How could the king, a layman," said one of them, "be Head of the Church of England?"—and in May 1535 were duly hanged, drawn, and quartered. A few weeks later Fisher and More were convicted and beheaded. Between 1536 and 1539, under the direction of Henry's powerful secretary of state, Thomas Cromwell, England's monasteries were suppressed and their vast wealth seized by the Crown.

Royal defiance of the authority of Rome was a key element in the Reformation but did not by itself constitute the establishment of Protestantism in England. On the contrary, in the same year that Fisher and More were martyred for their adherence to Roman Catholicism, twenty-five Protestants, members of a sect known as Anabaptists, were burned for heresy on a single day. Through most of his reign, Henry remained an equal-opportunity perseitor, pitiless to Catholics loyal to Rome and hostile to many of those who espoused Reformation ideas, though these ideas, aided greatly by the printing press, gradually established themselves on English soil.

Upon Henry's death in 1547, his son, Edward (by his third wife, Jane Seymour), came to the throne. Both the ten-year-old Edward and his successive Protectors, the dukes of Somerset and Northumberland, were staunch Protestants, and reformers hastened to transform the English church accordingly. During Edward's brief reign, Thomas Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, formulated the forty-two articles of religion which became the core of Anglican orthodoxy and wrote the first Book of Common Prayer, which was officially adopted in 1549 as the basis of English worship services.

The sickly Edward died in 1553, only six years after his accession to the throne, and was succeeded by his half-sister Mary (Henry VIII's daughter by his first wife, Catherine), who immediately took steps to return her kingdom to Roman Catholicism. Though she was unable to get Parliament to agree to return church lands seized under Henry VIII, she restored the Catholic Mass, once again affirmed the authority of the pope, and put down a rebellion that sought to depose her. Seconded by her ardently Catholic husband, Philip II, king of Spain, she initiated a series of religious persecutions that earned her (from her enemies) the name Bloody Mary. Hundreds of Protestants took refuge abroad in cities like Calvin's Geneva; almost three hundred less-fortunate Protestants were condemned as heretics and burned at the stake. Yet for thousands of others, Mary's reign came as a liberation; the rapid restoration of old Catholic ornaments to parish churches all over England indicates that they had not in fact been confiscated or destroyed as ordered, but simply hidden away, in hopes of better times.

Mary died childless in 1558, and her younger half-sister, Elizabeth, became queen. Elizabeth's succession had been by no means assured. For if Protestants regarded Henry VIII's marriage to Catherine as invalid and hence deemed Mary illegitimate, so Catholics regarded his marriage to Anne Boleyn as invalid and hence deemed her daughter illegitimate. Henry VIII himself seemed to support both views, since only three years after divorcing Catherine, he beheaded Anne on charges of treason and adultery and urged Parliament to invalidate the marriage. Moreover, though during her sister's reign Elizabeth outwardly complied with the official Catholic religious observance, Mary and her advisers suspected her of Protestant leanings, and the young princess's life was in grave danger. Poised and circumspect, Elizabeth warily evaded the traps that were set for her. When she ascended the throne, her actions were scrutinized for some indication of the country's future course. During her coronation procession, when a girl in an allegorical pageant presented her with a Bible in English translation—banned under Mary's reign—Elizabeth kissed the book, held it up reverently, and laid it to her breast. By this simple yet profound (and carefully choreographed) gesture, Elizabeth signalled England's return to the Reformation.

Many English men and women, of all classes, remained loyal to the old Catholic faith, but English authorities under Elizabeth moved steadily, if cautiously, toward ensuring at least an outward conformity to the official Protestant settlement. Recusants, those who refused to attend regular Sunday services in their parish churches, were heavily fined. Anyone who wished to receive a university degree, to be ordained as a priest in the Church of England, or to be named as an officer of the state had to swear an oath to the royal supremacy. Commissioners were sent throughout the land to confirm that religious services were following the officially approved liturgy and to investigate any reported backsliding into Catholic practice or, alternatively, any attempts to introduce reforms more radical than the queen and her bishops had chosen to embrace. For the Protestant exiles who streamed back were eager not only to undo the damage Mary had done but also to carry the Reformation much further than it had gone. A minority, who would come to be known as Puritans, sought to dismantle the church hierarchy, to purge the calendar of folk customs deemed pagan and the church service of ritual practices deemed superstitious, to dress the clergy in simple garb, and, at the extreme edge, to smash "idolatrous" statues, crucifixes, and altarpieces. Throughout her long reign, however, Elizabeth remained cautiously conservative and determined to hold religious zealotry in check.

In the space of a single lifetime, England had gone officially from Roman Catholicism, to Catholicism under the supreme headship of the English king, to a guarded Protestantism, to a more radical Protestantism, to a renewed and aggressive Roman Catholicism, and finally to Protestantism again. Each of these shifts was accompanied by danger, persecution, and death. It was enough to make people wary. Or skeptical. Or extremely agile.

A FEMALE MONARCH IN A MALE WORLD

In the last year of Mary's reign, the Scottish Calvinist minister John Knox thundered against what he called "the monstrous regiment of women." After the Protestant Elizabeth came to the throne the following year, Knox and his religious brethren were less inclined to denounce all female rulers, but in England, as elsewhere in Europe, there remained a widespread conviction that women were unsuited to wield power over men. Many men seem to have regarded the capacity for rational thought as exclusively male; women, they assumed, were led only by their passions. While gentlemen mastered the arts of rhetoric and warfare, gentlewomen were expected to display the virtues of silence and good housekeeping. Among upper-class males, the will to dominate others was acceptable and indeed admired; the same will in women was condemned as a grotesque and dangerous aberration.

Apologists for the queen countered these prejudices by appealing to historical precedent and legal theory. History offered inspiring examples of just female rulers, notably Deborah, the biblical prophetess who had judged Israel. In the legal sphere, Crown lawyers advanced the theory of "the king's two bodies." As England's crowned head, Elizabeth's person was mystically divided between her mortal "body natural" and the immortal "body politic." While the queen's natural body was inevitably subject to the failings of human flesh, the body politic was timeless and perfect. In political terms, therefore, Elizabeth's sex was a matter of no consequence, a thing indifferent.

Elizabeth, who had received a fine humanist education and an extended, dangerous lesson in the art of survival, made it immediately clear that she intended to rule in more than name only. She assembled a group of trustworthy advisers, foremost among them William Cecil (later created Lord Burghley), but she insisted on making many of the crucial decisions herself. Like many Renaissance monarchs, Elizabeth was drawn to the idea of royal absolutism, the theory that ultimate power was quite properly concentrated in her person and indeed that God had appointed her to be His deputy in the kingdom. Opposition to her rule, in this view, was not only a political act but also a kind of impiety, a blasphemous grudging against the will of God. Supporters of absolutism contended that God commands obedience even to manifestly wicked rulers whom He has sent to punish the sinfulness of humankind. Such arguments were routinely made in speeches and political tracts and from the pulpits of churches, where they were incorporated into the Book of Homilies that clergymen were required to read out to their congregations.

In reality, Elizabeth's power was not absolute. The government had a network of spies, informers, and agents provocateurs, but it lacked a standing army, a national police force, an efficient system of communication, and an extensive bureaucracy. Above all, she had limited financial resources and needed to turn periodically to an independent and often recalcitrant Parliament, which by long tradition had the sole right to levy taxes and to grant subsidies. Members of the House of Commons were elected from their boroughs, not appointed by the monarch, and though the queen had considerable influence over their decisions, she could by no means dictate policy. Under these constraints, Elizabeth ruled through a combination of adroit political maneuvering and imperious command, all the while enhancing her authority in the eyes of both court and country by means of an extraordinary cult of love.

"We all loved her," Elizabeth's godson Sir John Harington wrote, with just a touch of irony, a few years after the queen's death, "for she said she loved us." Ambassadors, courtiers, and parliamentarians all submitted to Elizabeth's cult of love, in which the queen's gender was transformed from a potential liability into a significant asset. Those who approached her generally did so on their knees and were expected to address her with the most extravagant compliments; she in turn spoke, when it suited her to do so, in a comparable language of love. The court moved in an atmosphere of romance, with music, dancing, plays, and the elaborate, fancy-dress entertainments called masques. The queen adorned herself in dazzling clothes and rich jewels. When she went on one of her summer "progresses," ceremonial journeys through her land, she looked like an exotic, sacred image in a religious cult of love, and her noble hosts virtually bankrupted themselves to lavish upon her the costliest pleasures. England's leading artists, such as the poet Edmund Spenser and the painter Nicholas Hilliard, enlisted themselves in the celebration of Elizabeth's mystery, likening her to the goddesses of mythology and the heroines of the Bible: Diana, Astraæa, Cynthia, Deborah. The cultural sources of the so-called "cult of Elizabeth" were both secular (her courtiers could pine for her as the cruelly chaste mistress celebrated in Petrarchan love poetry) and sacred (the veneration that under Catholicism had been due to the Virgin Mary could now be directed toward England's semi-divine queen).

There was a sober, even grim aspect to these poetical fantasies: Elizabeth was brilliant at playing off one dangerous faction against another, now turning her gracious smiles on one favorite, now honoring his hated rival, now suddenly looking elsewhere and raising an obscure upstart to royal favor. And when she was disobeyed or when she felt that her prerogatives had been challenged, she was capable of an anger that, as Harington put it, "left no doubtings whose daughter she was." Thus when Sir Walter Ralegh, one of the queen's glittering favorites, married without her knowledge or consent, he found himself promptly imprisoned in the Tower of London. Or when the Protestant polemicist John Stubbes ventured to publish a pamphlet stridently denouncing the queen’s proposed marriage to the French Catholic duke of Anjou, Stubbes and his publisher were arrested and had their right hands chopped off. (After receiving the blow, the now prudent Stubbes lifted his hat with his remaining hand and cried, ‘God save the Queen!’)

THE KINGDOM IN DANGER

Beset by Catholic and Protestant extremists, Elizabeth contrived to forge a moderate compromise that enabled her realm to avert the massacres and civil wars that poisoned France and other countries on the Continent. But menace was never far off, and there were continual fears of conspiracy, rebellion, and assassination. Suspicion swirled around Mary, Queen of Scots, who had been driven from her own kingdom in 1568 and had taken refuge in England. The presence, under a kind of house arrest, of a Catholic queen with a plausible claim to the English throne was the source of widespread anxiety and helped generate recurrent rumors of plots. Some of these were real enough, others imaginary, still others fabricated by the secret agents of the government’s intelligence service under the direction of Sir Francis Walsingham. Fears of Catholic conspiracies intensified greatly after Spanish imperial armies invaded the Netherlands in order to stamp out Protestant rebels (1567), after the St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre of Protestants (Huguenots) in France (1572), and after the assassination of Europe’s other major Protestant leader, William of Orange (1584).

The queen’s life seemed to be in even greater danger after Pope Gregory XIII’s proclamation in 1580 that the assassination of the great heretic Elizabeth (who had been excommunicated a decade before) would not constitute a mortal sin. The immediate effect of the proclamation was to make life more difficult for English Catholics, most of whom were loyal to the queen but who fell under grave suspicion. Suspicion was heightened by the clandestine presence of English Jesuits, trained at seminaries abroad and smuggled back into England to serve the Roman Catholic cause. When, after several botched conspiracies had been disclosed, Elizabeth’s spymaster Walsingham unearthed another assassination plot in the correspondence between the Queen of Scots and the Catholic Anthony Babington, the wretched Mary’s fate was sealed. After a public display of vacillation and perhaps with genuine regret, Elizabeth signed the death warrant, and her cousin was beheaded.

The long-anticipated military confrontation with Catholic Spain was now unavoidable. Elizabeth learned that Philip II, her former brother-in-law and one-time suitor, was preparing to send an enormous fleet against her island realm. The Armada was to sail first to the Netherlands, where a Spanish army would be waiting to embark and invade England. Barring its way was England’s small fleet of well-armed and highly maneuverable fighting vessels, backed up by ships from the merchant navy. The Invincible Armada reached English waters in July 1588, only to be routed in one of the most famous and decisive naval battles in European history. Then, in what many viewed as an Act of God on behalf of Protestant England, the Spanish fleet was dispersed and all but destroyed by violent storms.

As England braced itself to withstand the invasion that never came, Elizabeth appeared in person to review a detachment of soldiers assembled at Tilbury, on the Thames estuary. Dressed in a white gown and a silver breastplate, she declared that though some among her councilors had urged her not to appear before a large crowd of armed men, she would never fail to trust the loyalty of her faithful and loving subjects. Nor did she fear the Spanish armies. "I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman," Elizabeth declared, "but I have the heart and stomach [i.e., valor] of a king, and of a king of England too." In this celebrated speech, Elizabeth displayed many of her most memorable qualities: her self-consciously theatrical command of grand public occasion, her subtle blending of magniloquent rhetoric and the language of love, her strategic appropriation of traditionally masculine qualities, and her great personal courage. "We princes," she once remarked, "are set on stages in the sight and view of all the world."

THE ENGLISH AND OTHERNESS

In 1485, most English people would have devoted little thought to their national identity. If asked to describe their sense of belonging, they would probably have spoken first of the international community of Christendom, and secondly of their local region, such as Kent or Cumberland. The extraordinary events of the Tudor era, from the encounter with the New World to the break with Rome, made many people newly aware and proud of their Englishness. At the same time, they began to perceive those who lay outside the national community in new (and often negative) ways. Like most national communities, the English defined themselves largely in terms of what or who they were not. In the wake of the Reformation, the most prominent "others" were those who had until recently been more or less the same, that is, the Catholics of western Christendom. But other groups were also instrumental in the project of English self-definition.

Elizabethan London had a large population of resident aliens, mainly artisans and merchants and their families, from Portugal, Italy, Spain, Germany, and, above all, France and the Netherlands. Many of these people were Protestant refugees, and they were accorded some legal and economic protection by the government. But they were not always welcome to the local populace. Throughout the sixteenth century London was the site of repeated demonstrations and, on occasion, bloody riots against the communities of foreign artisans, who were accused of taking jobs away from Englishmen. There was widespread hostility as well toward the Welsh, the Scots, and above all the Irish, whom the English had for centuries been struggling unsuccessfully to subdue. The kings of England claimed to be rulers of Ireland, but in reality they effectively controlled only a small area known as the Pale, extending north from Dublin. The great majority of the population remained stubbornly Catholic and, despite endlessly reiterated English repression, burning of villages, destruction of crops, seizure of land, and massacres, incorrigibly independent.

Medieval England's Jewish population, the recurrent object of persecution, extortion, and massacre, had been officially expelled by King Edward I in 1290, but Elizabethan England harbored a tiny number of Jews or Jewish converts to Christianity. They were the objects of suspicion and hostility. Elizabethans appear to have been fascinated by Jews and Judaism but quite uncertain whether the terms referred to a people, a foreign nation, a set of strange practices, a living faith, a defunct religion, a villainous conspiracy, or a messianic inheritance. Protestant Reformers brooded deeply on the Hebraic origins of Christianity; government officials ordered the arrest of those "suspected to be Jews"; villagers paid pennies to itinerant fortunetellers who claimed to be descended from Abraham or masters of kabbalistic mysteries; and London playgoers enjoyed the spectacle of the downfall of the wicked Barabas in Christopher Marlowe's The Jew of Malta and the forced conversion of Shylock in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. Jews were not officially permitted to resettle in England until the middle of the seventeenth century, and even then their legal status was ambiguous.

Sixteenth-century England also had a small African population whose skin color was the subject of pseudoscientific speculation and theological debate. Some Elizabethans believed that Africans' blackness resulted from the climate of the regions where they lived, where, as one traveler put it, they were "so scorched and vexed with the heat of the sun, that in many places they curse it when it riseth." Others held that blackness was a curse inherited from their forefather Cush, the son of Ham (who had, according to Genesis, wickedly exposed the nakedness of his drunken father, Noah). George Best, a proponent of this theory of inherited skin color, reported that "I myself have seen an Ethiopian as black as coal brought into England, who taking a fair English woman to wife, begat a son in all respects as black as the father was, although England were his native country, and an English woman his mother: whereby it seemeth this blackness proceedeth rather of some natural infection of that man."

As the word 'infection' suggests, Elizabethans frequently regarded blackness as a physical defect, though the black people who lived in England and Scotland throughout the sixteenth century were also treated as exotic curiosities. At his marriage to Anne of Denmark, James VI of Scotland (the son of Mary, Queen of Scots; as James I of England, he succeeded Elizabeth in 1603) entertained his bride and her family by commanding four naked black youths to dance before him in the snow. (The youths died of exposure shortly afterward.) In 1594, in the festivities celebrating the baptism of James's son, a 'Black-Moor' entered pulling an elaborately decorated chariot that was, in the original plan, supposed to be pulled by a lion. In England there was a black trumpeter in the courts of Henry VII and Henry VIII, while Elizabeth had at least two black servants, one an entertainer, the other a page. Africans became increasingly popular as servants in aristocratic and gentle households in the last decades of the sixteenth century.

Some of these Africans were almost certainly slaves, though the legal status of slavery in England was ambiguous. In Cartwright's Case (1569), the court ruled "that England was too Pure an Air for Slaves to breathe in," but there is evidence that black slaves were owned in Elizabethan and Jacobean England. Moreover, by the mid-sixteenth century the English had become involved in the profitable trade that carried African slaves to the New World. In 1562 John Hawkins embarked on his first slaving voyage, transporting some three hundred Africans from the Guinea coast to Hispaniola, where they were sold for ten thousand pounds. Elizabeth is reported to have said that this venture was "detestable, and would call down the Vengeance of Heaven upon the Undertakers." Nevertheless, she invested in Hawkins's subsequent voyages and loaned him ships.

Elizabeth also invested in other enterprises that combined aggressive nationalism and the pursuit of profit. In 1493 the pope had divided the New World between the Spanish and the Portuguese by drawing a line from pole to pole (hence Brazil speaks Portuguese today and the rest of Latin America speaks Spanish): the English were not in the picture. But by the end of Edward VI's the Company of Merchant Adventurers was founded, and Englishmen began to explore Asia and North America. Some of these adventurers turned to piracy, preying on Spanish ships that were returning laden with wealth extracted from their New World possessions. (The pope had ruled that the Indians were human beings—and hence could be converted to Christianity—but the ruling did nothing to prevent their enslavement and brutal exploitation.) English acts of piracy soon became a private undeclared war, with the queen and her courtiers covertly investing in the raids but accepting no responsibility for them. The greatest of many astounding exploits was the voyage of Francis Drake (1577—80): he sailed through the Strait of Magellan, pillaged Spanish towns on the Pacific, reached as far north as San Francisco, crossed to the Philippines, and returned around the Cape of Good Hope; he came back with a million pounds in treasure, and his investors earned a dividend of 5,000 percent. Queen Elizabeth knighted him on the deck of his ship, The Golden Hind.

WRITERS, PRINTERS, AND PATRONS

The association between literature and print, so natural to us, was less immediate in the sixteenth century. Poetry in particular frequently circulated in manuscript, copied by reader after reader into personal anthologies—commonplace books—or reproduced by professional scribes for a fee. The texts that have come down to us in printed form often bear an uncertain relation to authorial manuscripts, and were frequently published only posthumously. The career of professional writer in sixteenth-century England was almost impossible: there was no such thing as author's copyright, no royalties paid to an author according to the sales of his book, and virtually no notion that anyone could make a decent living through the creation of works of literature. Writers sold their manuscripts to the printer or bookseller outright, for what now seem like ridiculously low prices. The churchyard of St. Paul's Cathedral in London was lined with booksellers' shops: dissolved chantries were taken over by booksellers in the 1540s, church officials leased out their residences near the church's north door to members of the Stationers' Company (the guild whose members had the exclusive right to own printing presses), and eventually bookstores even filled the bays between the Cathedral's buttresses, two stories high and more. Paul's was the main center of business in the capital, with the church itself serving as a meeting place, and its columns as notice-boards; publishers would post there, and elsewhere in the city, the title pages of new books as advertisements. Those title pages listed the wholesaler for the work, but customers could have bought popular books at most of the shops in St. Paul's Yard. The publishing business was not entirely contained in that busy space, though: some Stationers were only printers, merely working as contractors for publishers, and their printshops were located all over the city, often in the owner's residence.

Freedom of the press did not exist. Before Elizabeth's reign, state control of printed books was poorly organized, although licensing efforts had been underway since 1538. In 1557, however, the Stationers' Company received its charter, and became responsible for the licensing of books. Two years later, the government commanded the Stationers only to license books that had been approved by either six Privy Councillors or the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London. Despite these seemingly strict regulations, "scandalous, malicious, schismatical, and heretical” works were never effectively suppressed. Though there were occasional show trials and horrendous punishments—the printer William Carter was hanged for treason in 1584 because he had published a Catholic pamphlet; the Protestant separatists John Penry, Henry Barrow, and John Greenwood were executed in 1593 under a statute that made it a capital offense to “devise and write, print or set forth, any manner of book . . . letter, or writing containing false, seditious, and slanderous matter to the defamation of the Queen’s Majesty”—active censorship was not as frequent or thorough as we might expect.

The censors largely focused their attention on works of history, which often had political implications for the present, and on religious treatises. In this, they shared the public’s taste. Plays and secular poetry occasionally sold well (Shakespeare’s Henry IV, Part I was printed 7 times in 25 years), but they could not compete with publishing blockbusters such as The Plain Man’s Pathway (16 editions in 25 years), let alone The Psalms in English Meter, published 124 times between 1583 and 1608. Publishers were largely interested in profit margins, and the predominance of devotional texts among the surviving books from the period attests to their greater marketability. The format in which works of literature were usually published is also telling. We normally find plays and poetry in quartos (or octavos), small volumes which had four (or eight) pages printed on each side of a sheet which was then folded twice (or three times) and stitched together with other such folded sheets to form the book. The more imposing folio format (in which the paper was folded only once, at two pages per side of a sheet) tended to be reserved not just for longer works but for those regarded as meriting especially respectful treatment. In 1577, Raphael Holinshed’s massive history The Chronicles of England, Scotlande, and Irelande appeared in a woodcut-illustrated folio; only ten years later, a second edition was published, again in the large format. In contrast, Edmund Spenser’s huge poem The Faerie Queene was printed as a quarto both in 1590 and in 1596. A decade after his death, though, as the poet’s reputation grew, his epic appeared again (1609), this time as a folio.

Elizabethan writers of exalted social standing, like the earl of Surrey or Sir Philip Sidney, thought of themselves as courtiers, statesmen, and landowners; poetry was for them an indispensable social grace and a deeply pleasurable, exalted form of play. Writers of lower rank, such as Samuel Daniel and Michael Drayton, sought careers as civil servants, secretaries, tutors, and clerics; they might take up more or less permanent residence in a noble household, or, more casually, offer their literary work to actual or prospective patrons, in the hope of protection, career advancement, or financial reward. Ambitious authors eager to rise from threadbare obscurity often looked to the court for livelihood, notice, and encouragement, but their great expectations generally proved chimerical. “A thousand hopes, but all nothing,” wailed John Lyly, alluding to his long wait for the office of Master of the Revels, “a hundred promises but yet nothing.”

Financial rewards for writing prose or poetry came mostly in the form of gifts from wealthy patrons, who sought to enhance their status and gratify their vanity through the achievements and lavish praises of their clients. Some Elizabethan patrons, though, were well-educated humanists motivated by aesthetic interests, and with them, patronage extended beyond financial support to the creation of lively literary and intellectual circles. Poems by Daniel, Ben Jonson, Aemilia Lanyer, and others bear witness to the sustaining intelligence and sophistication, as well as the generosity, of their benefactors. But the experience of Robert Greene is perhaps equally revealing: the fact that he had sixteen different patrons for seventeen books suggests that he did not find much favor or support from any one of them. Indeed, a practice grew up of printing off several dedications to be inserted into particular copies of a book, so that an impecunious author could deceive each of several patrons into thinking that he or she was the uniquely fortunate person to be honored by the volume.

In addition to the court and the great families as dispensers of patronage, the city of London and the two universities also had a substantial impact on the period's literature. London was the center of the book trade, the nursery of a fledgling middle-class reading public, and, most important, the home of the public theaters. Before Elizabeth's time, the universities were mainly devoted to educating the clergy, and that remained an important part of their function. But in the second half of the century, the sons of the gentry and the aristocracy were going in increasing numbers to the universities and the Inns of Court (law schools), not in order to take religious orders or to practice law but to prepare for public service or the management of their estates. Other, less affluent students, such as Marlowe and Spenser, attended Oxford and Cambridge on scholarship. A group of graduates, including Thomas Nashe, Robert Greene, and George Peele, enlivened the literary scene in London in the 1590s, but the precarious lives of these so-called "university wits" testify to the difficulties they encountered in their quixotic attempt to survive by their writing skill. The diary of Philip Henslowe, a leading theatrical manager, has entry after entry showing university graduates in prison or in debt or at best eking out a miserable existence patching plays.

Women had no access to grammar schools, the universities, or the Inns of Court and, when not altogether illiterate, received for the most part only a rudimentary education. While Protestantism, with its emphasis on reading Scripture, certainly helped to improve female literacy in the sixteenth century, girls were rarely encouraged to pursue their studies. Indeed, while girls were increasingly taught to read, they were not necessarily taught to write, for the latter skill in women was considered to be at the very least useless, at the worst dangerous. When the prominent humanist Sir Thomas Smith thought of how he should describe his country's social order, he declared that "we do reject women, as those whom nature hath made to keep home and to nourish their family and children, and not to meddle with matters abroad, nor to bear office in a city or commonwealth." Then, with a kind of nervous glance over his shoulder, he made an exception of those few in whom "the blood is respected, not the age nor the sex": for example, the queen. Every piece of writing by a woman from this period is a triumph over nearly impossible odds.

Renaissance literature is the product of a rhetorical culture, a culture steeped in the arts of persuasion and trained to process complex verbal signals. (The contemporary equivalent would be the ease with which we deal with complex visual signals, effortlessly processing such devices as fade-out, montage, cross-cutting, and morphing.) In 1512, Erasmus published a work called De copia that taught its readers how to cultivate "copiousness," verbal richness, in discourse. The work obligingly provides, as a sample, a list of 144 different ways of saying "Thank you for your letter."

In Renaissance England, certain syntactic forms or patterns of words known as "figures" (also called "schemes") were shaped and repeated in order to confer beauty or heighten expressive power. Figures were usually known by their Greek and Latin names, though in an Elizabethan rhetorical manual, The Arte of English Poesie, George Puttenham made a valiant if short-lived attempt to give them English equivalents, such as "Hyperbole, or the Overreacher" and "Ironia, or the Dry Mock." Those who received a grammar-school education throughout Europe at almost any point between the Roman Empire and the eighteenth century probably knew by heart the names of up to one hundred such figures, just as they knew by heart their multiplication tables. According to one scholar's count, William Shakespeare knew and made use of about two hundred.

As certain grotesquely inflated Renaissance texts attest, lessons from De copia and similar rhetorical guides could encourage prolixity and verbal self-display. Elizabethans had a taste for elaborate ornament in language as in clothing, jewelry, and furniture, and, if we are to appreciate their accomplishments, it helps to set aside the modern preference, particularly in prose, for unadorned simplicity and directness. When, in one of the age's most fashionable works of prose fiction, John Lyly wishes to explain that the vices of his young hero, Euphues, are tarnishing his virtues, he offers a small flood of synonymous images: "The freshest colors soonest fade, the teenest [i.e., keenest] razor soonest turneth his edge, the finest cloth is soonest eaten with moths." Lyly's multiplication of balanced rhetorical figures sparked a small literary craze known as "Euphuism," which was soon ridiculed by Shakespeare and others for its formulaic excesses. Yet the multiplication of figures was a source of deep-rooted pleasure in rhetorical culture, and most of the greatest Renaissance writers used it to extraordinary effect. Consider, for example, the succession of images in Shakespeare's sonnet 73:

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou seest the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west;
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest.
In me thou seest the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well, which thou must leave ere long.

What seems merely repetitious in Lyly here becomes a subtle, poignant amplification of the perception of decay, through the succession of images from winter (or late fall) to twilight to the last glow of a dying fire. Each of these images is in turn sensitively explored, so that, for example, the season is figured by bare boughs that shiver, as if they were human, and then these anthropomorphized tree branches in turn are figured as the ruined choirs of a church where services were once sung. No sooner is the image of singers in a church choir evoked than these singers are instantaneously transmuted back into the songbirds who, in an earlier season, had sat upon the boughs, while these sweet birds in turn conjure up the poet’s own vanished youth. And this nostalgic gaze extends, at least glancingly, to the chancels of the Catholic abbeys reduced to ruins by Protestant iconoclasm and the dissolution of the monasteries. All of this within the first four lines: here and elsewhere Shakespeare, along with other poets of his time, contrives to freight the small compass and tight formal constraints of the sonnet—fourteen lines of iambic pentameter in three principal rhyming patterns—with remarkable emotional intensity, psychological nuance, and imagistic complexity. The effect is what Christopher Marlowe called "infinite riches in a little room.”

Elizabethans were certainly capable of admiring plainness of speech—in King Lear Shakespeare contrasts the severe directness of the virtuous Cordelia to the "glib and oily art" of her wicked sisters—and such poets as George Gascoigne, Thomas Nashe, and, in the early seventeenth century, Ben Jonson wrote restrained, aphoristic, moralizing lyrics in a plain style whose power depends precisely on the avoidance of richly figurative verbal pyrotechnics. This power is readily apparent in the wintry sparestness of Nashe’s "A Litany in Time of Plague," with its grim refrain:

Wit with his wantonness
Tasteth death’s bitterness;
Hell’s executioner
Hath no ears for to hear
What vain art can reply.
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

Here the linguistic playfulness beloved by Elizabethan culture is scorned as an ineffectual "vain art" to which the executioner, death, is utterly indifferent.

But here and in other plain-style poetry, the somber, lapidary effect depends on a tacit recognition of the allure of the suppleness, grace, and sweet harmony that the dominant literary artists of the period so assiduously cultivated. Poetry, writes Puttenham, is "more delicate to the ear than prose is, because it is more current and slipper upon the tongue [i.e., flowing and easily pronounced], and withal tunable and melodious, as a kind of Music, and therefore may be termed a musical speech or utterance." The sixteenth century was an age of superb vocal music. The renowned composers William Byrd, Thomas Morley, John Dowland, and others scarcely less distinguished wrote a rich profusion of madrigals (part songs for two to eight voices, unaccompanied) and airs (songs for solo voice, generally accompanied by the lute). These works, along with hymns, popular ballads, rounds, catches, and other forms of song, enjoyed immense popularity, not only in the royal court, where musical skill was regarded as an important accomplishment, and in aristocratic households, where professional musicians were employed as entertainers, but also in less exalted social circles. In his Plain and Easy Introduction to Practical Music (1597), Morley tells a story of social humiliation at a failure to perform that suggests that a well-educated Elizabethan was expected to be able to sight-sing. Even if this is an exaggeration in the interest of book sales, there is evidence of impressively widespread musical literacy, a literacy reflected in a splendid array of music for the lute, viol, recorder, harp, and virginal, as well as vocal music.

Many sixteenth-century poems were written to be set to music, but even those that were not often aspire in their metrical and syllabic virtuosity to the complex pleasures of madrigals or to the sweet fluency of airs. In poetry and music, as in gardens, architecture, and dance, Elizabethans had a taste for elaborate, intricate, but perfectly regular designs. They admired form, valued the artist's manifest control of the medium, and took pleasure in the highly patterned surfaces of things. Modern responses to art often evidence a suspicion of surfaces, impatience with order, the desire to rip away the mask in order to discover a hidden core of experiential truth: these responses are far less evident in Renaissance aesthetics than is a delight in pattern. Indeed many writers of the time expressed the faith that the universe itself had in its basic construction the beauty, concord, and harmonious order of a poem or a piece of music. "The world is made by Symmetry and proportion," wrote Thomas Campion, who was both a poet and a composer, "and is in that respect compared to Music, and Music to Poetry." The design of an exquisite work of art is deeply linked in this view to the design of the cosmos.

Such an emphasis on conspicuous pattern might seem to encourage an art as stiff as the starched ruffs that ladies and gentlemen wore around their necks, but the period's fascination with order was conjoined with a profound interest in persuasively conveying the movements of the mind and heart. Syntax in the sixteenth century was looser, more flexible than our own and punctuation less systematic. If the effect is sometimes confusing, it also enabled writers to follow the twists and turns of thought or perception. Consider, for example, Roger Ascham's account, in his book on archery, of a day in which he saw the wind blowing the new-fallen snow:

That morning the sun shone bright and clear, the wind was whistling aloft, and sharp according to the time of the year. The snow in the highway lay loose and trodden with horse feet: so as the wind blew, it took the loose snow with it, and made it so slide upon the snow in the field which was hard and crusted by reason of the frost overnight, that thereby I might see very well, the whole nature of the wind as it blew that day. And I had a great delight and pleasure to mark it, which maketh me now far better to remember it. Sometime the wind would be not past two yards broad, and so it would carry the snow as far as I could see. Another time the snow would blow over half the field at once. Sometime the snow would tumble softly, by and by it would fly wonderful fast. And this I perceived also, that the wind goeth by streams and not whole together. . . . And that which was the most marvel of all, at one time two drifts of snow flew, the one of the West into the East, the other out of the North into the East: And I saw two winds by reason of the snow the one cross over the other, as it had been two highways. . . . The more uncertain and deceitable the wind is, the more heed must a wise Archer give to know the guiles of it.

What is delightful here is not only the author's moment of sharpened perception but his confidence that this moment—a glimpse of baffling complexity and uncertainty—can be captured in the restless succession of sentences and then neatly summed up in the pithy conclusion. (This effect parallels that of the couplet that sums up the complexities of a Shakespearean sonnet.) A similar confidence emanates from Sir Walter Raleigh's deeply melancholy, deeply ironic apostrophe to Death at the close of The History of the World, written when he was a prisoner in the Tower:

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! Whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words: Hie jacet! [Here lies]

Death is triumphant here, but so is Ralegh's eloquent, just, and mighty language.

The sense of wonder that animates both of these exuberant prose passages—as if the world were being seen clearly and distinctly for the first time—characterizes much of the period's poetry as well. The mood need not always be solemn. One can sense laughter, for example, rippling just below the surface of Marlowe's admiring description of the beautiful maiden Hero's boots:

Buskins of shells all silvered used she,
And branched with blushing coral to the knee,
Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
Such as the world would wonder to behold;
Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills,
Which, as she went, would chirrup through the bills.

Seashells were beloved by Renaissance collectors because their intricate designs, functionally inexplicable, seemed the works of an ingenious, infinitely playful craftsman. Typically, the shells did not simply stand by themselves in cabinets but were gilded or silvered and then turned into other objects: cups, miniature ships, or, in Marlowe's fantasy, boots further decorated with coral and mechanical sparrows made of conspicuously precious materials and designed, as he puts it deliciously, to "chirrup." The poet knows perfectly well that the boots would be implausible footwear in the real world, but he invites us into an imaginary world of passion, a world in which the heroine's costume includes a skirt "whereon was many a stain, / Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain" and a veil of "artificial flowers and leaves, / Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives." The veil reflects an admiration for an art of successful imitation—after all, bees are said to look in vain for honey amidst the artificial flowers—but it is cunning illusion rather than realism that excites Marlowe's wonder. Renaissance poetry is interested not in representational accuracy but in the magical power of exquisite workmanship to draw its readers into fabricated worlds.

In his Defense of Poesy, the most important work of literary criticism in sixteenth-century England, Sidney claims that this magical power is also a moral power. All other arts, he argues, are subjected to fallen, imperfect nature, but the poet alone is free to range "within the zodiac of his own wit" and create a second nature, superior to the one we are condemned to inhabit: "Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden." The poet's golden world in this account is not an escapist fantasy; it is a model to be emulated in actual life, an ideal to be brought into reality as completely as possible. It is difficult to say, of course, how seriously this project of realization was taken—though the circumstances of Sidney's own death suggest that he may have been attempting to enact on the battlefield an ideal image of Protestant chivalry. A didactic role for poetry is, in any case, urged not by Sidney alone but by most Elizabethan poets. Human sinfulness has corrupted life, robbing it of the sweet wholesomeness that it had once possessed in Eden, but poetry can mark the way back to a more virtuous and fulfilled existence. And not only mark the way: poetry, Sidney and others argue, has a unique persuasive force that shatters inertia and impels readers toward the good they glimpse in its ravishing lines.

This force, attributed to the energy and vividness of figurative language, made poetry a fitting instrument not only for such high-minded enterprises as moral exhortation, prayer, and praise, and for such uplifting narratives as the legends of religious and national heroes, but also for such verbal actions as cursing, lamenting, flattering, and seducing. The almost inexhaustible range of motives was given some order by literary conventions that functioned as shared cultural codes, enabling poets to elicit particular responses from readers and to relate their words to other times, other languages, and other cultures. Among the most prominent of the clusters of conventions in the period were those that defined the major literary modes (or "kinds," as Sidney terms them): pastoral, heroic, lyric, satiric, elegiac, tragic, and comic. They helped to shape subject matter, attitude, tone, and values, and in some cases—sonnet, verse epistle, epigram, funeral elegy, and masque, to name a few—they also governed formal structure, meter, style, length, and occasion. We can glimpse a few of the ways in which these literary codes worked by looking briefly at the two that are, for modern readers, the least familiar: pastoral and heroic.

The conventions of the pastoral mode present a world inhabited by shepherds and shepherdesses who are concerned not just to tend their flocks but to fall in love and to engage in friendly singing contests. The mode celebrated leisure, humility, and contentment, exalting the simple country life over the city and its business, the military camp and its violence, the court and its burdens of rule. Pastoral motifs could be deployed in different genres. Pastoral songs commonly expressed the joys of the shepherd's life or his disappointment in love. Pastoral dialogues between shepherds might conceal serious, satiric comment on abuses in the great world under the guise of homely, local concerns. There were pastoral funeral elegies, pastoral dramas, pastoral romances (prose fiction), and even pastoral episodes within epics. The most famous pastoral poem of the period is Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love," an erotic invitation whose promise of gold buckles, coral clasps, and amber studs serves to remind us that, however much it sings of naïve innocence, the mode is ineradicably sophisticated and urban.

With its rustic characters, simple concerns, and modest scope, the pastoral mode was regarded as situated at the opposite extreme from heroic, with its values of honor, martial courage, loyalty, leadership, and endurance and its glorification of a nation or people. The chief genre here was the epic, typically a long, exalted poem in the high style, based on a heroic story from the nation's distant past and imitating Homer and Virgil in structure and motifs. Renaissance poets throughout Europe undertook to honor their nations and their vernacular languages by writing this most prestigious kind of poetry. In sixteenth-century England the major success in heroic poetry is Spenser's Faerie Queene. Yet the success of The Faerie Queene owes much to the fact that the poem is a generic hybrid, in which the conventions of classical epic mingle with those of romance, medieval allegory, pastoral, satire, mythological narrative, comedy, philosophical meditation, and many others in a strange, wonderful blend. The spectacular mixing of genres in Spenser's poem is only an extreme instance of a general Elizabethan indifference to the generic purity admired by writers, principally on the Continent, who adhered to Aristotle's Poetics. Where such neoclassicists attempted to observe rigid stylistic boundaries, English poets tended to approach the different genres in the spirit of Sidney's inclusivism: "if severed they be good, the conjunction cannot be hurtful."

THE ELIZABETHAN THEATER

If Sidney welcomed the experimental intertwining of genres in both poetry and prose—and his own Arcadia, a prose romance incorporating both pastoral and heroic elements, confirms that he did—there was one place where he found it absurd: the theater. He condemned the conjunction of high and low characters in "mongrel" tragicomedies that mingled "kings and clowns." Moreover, in the spirit of neoclassical advocacy of the "dramatic unities," Sidney disliked the ease with which the action on the bare stage ("where you shall have Asia of the one side, and Afric of the other") violated the laws of time and space. "Now you shall have three ladies walk to gather flowers," he writes in The Defense of Poesy, "and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by we hear news of shipwreck in the same place: and then we are to blame if we accept it not for a rock." The irony is that this mocking account, written probably in 1579, anticipates by a few years the stupendous achievements of Marlowe and Shakespeare, whose plays joyously break every rule that Sidney thought it essential to observe.

A permanent, freestanding public theater in England dates only from Shakespeare's own lifetime. A London playhouse, the Red Lion, is first mentioned in 1567, and James Burbage's playhouse, The Theater, was built in 1576. But it is quite misleading to identify English drama exclusively with the new, specially constructed playhouses, for in fact there was a rich and vital theatrical tradition in England stretching back for centuries. Townspeople in late medieval England mounted elaborate cycles of plays (sometimes called "mystery plays") depicting the great biblical stories, from the creation of the world to Christ's Passion and its miraculous aftermath. Many of these plays have been lost, but those that survive, as the selection in this anthology demonstrates, include magnificent and complex works of art. At once civic and religious festivals, the cycles continued to be performed into the reign of Elizabeth, but their close links to popular Catholic piety led Protestant authorities in the sixteenth century to suppress them.

Early English theater was not restricted to these annual festivals. Performers acted in town halls and the halls of guilds and aristocratic mansions, on scaffolds erected in town squares and marketplaces, on pageant wagons in the streets, and in innyards. By the fifteenth century, and probably earlier, there were organized companies of players traveling under noble patronage. Such companies earned a precarious living providing amusement, while enhancing the prestige of the patron whose livery they wore and whose protection they enjoyed. (Otherwise, by statutes enjoining productive labor, actors without another, ordinary trade could have been classified as vagabonds and whipped or branded.) This practice explains why the professional acting companies of Shakespeare's time, including Shakespeare's own, attached themselves to a nobleman and were technically his servants (the Lord Chamberlain's Men, the Lord Admiral's Men, etc.), even though virtually all their time was devoted to entertaining the public, from whom most of their income derived.

Before the construction of the public theaters, the playing companies often performed short plays called "interludes" that were, in effect, staged dialogues on religious, moral, and political themes. Henry Medwall's Fulgens and Lucrece (ca. 1490—1501), for example, pits a wealthy but dissolute nobleman against a virtuous public servant of humble origins, while John Heywood's
The Play of the Weather (ca. 1525—33) stages a debate among social rivals, including a gentleman, a merchant, a forest ranger, and two millers. The structure of such plays reflects the training in argumentation that students received in Tudor schools and, in particular, the sustained practice in examining both sides of a difficult question. Some of Shakespeare's amazing ability to look at critical issues from multiple perspectives may be traced back to this practice and the dramatic interludes it helped to inspire.

Another major form of theater that flourished in England in the fifteenth century and continued on into the sixteenth was the morality play, a dramatization of the spiritual struggle of the Christian soul. As Everyman (included in "The Middle Ages") demonstrates, these dramas derived their power from the poignancy and terror of an individual's encounter with death. Often this somatic power was supplemented by the extraordinary comic vitality of the evil character, or Vice.

If such plays sound more than a bit like sermons, it is because they were.
The Church was a profoundly different institution from the theater, but its professionals shared some of the same rhetorical skills. It would be grossly misleading to regard churchgoing and playgoing as comparable entertainments, but clerical attacks on the theater sometimes make it sound as if ministers thought themselves to be in direct competition with professional players.
The players, for their part, were generally too discreet to present themselves in a similar light, yet they almost certainly understood their craft as relating to sermons with an uneasy blend of emulation and rivalry. When, in 1610, the theater manager Philip Rosseter was reported to have declared that plays were as good as sermons, he was summoned before the bishop of London to recant; but Rosseter had said no more than what many players must have privately thought.

By the later sixteenth century, many churchmen, particularly those with Puritan leanings, were steadfastly opposed to the theater, but some early Proestant Reformers, such as John Bale, tried their hand at writing plays. Thomas Norton, who with a fellow lawyer, Thomas Sackville, wrote the first English tragedy in blank verse, Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex (1561), was also a translator of the great Reformer John Calvin. There is no evidence that Norton felt a tension between his religious convictions and his theatrical interests, nor was his play a private exercise. The five-act tragedy in blank verse, a grim vision of Britain descending into civil war, was performed at the Inner Temple (one of London's law schools) and subsequently acted before the queen.

Gorboduc was closely modeled on the works of the Roman playwright Seneca, and Senecan influence—including violent plots, resounding rhetorical speeches, and ghosts thirsting for blood—remained pervasive in the Elizabethan period, giving rise to a subgenre of revenge tragedy, in which a wronged protagonist plots and executes revenge, destroying himself (or herself) in the process. An early, highly influential example is Thomas Kyd's Spanish Tragedy (1592), and, despite its unprecedented psychological complexity, Shake-Shakespeare’s Hamlet clearly participates in this kind. A related but distinct kind is the villain tragedy, in which the protagonist is blatantly evil: in his Poetics, Aristotle had advised against attempting to use a wicked person as the hero of a tragedy, but Shakespeare’s Richard III and Macbeth amply justify the general English indifference to classical rules. Some Elizabethan tragedies, such as the fine Arden of Feversham (whose author is unknown), are concerned not with the fall of great men but with domestic violence; others, such as Christopher Marlowe’s Tamburlaine, are concerned with “overreachers,” larger-than-life heroes who challenge the limits of human possibility. Certain tragedies in the period, such as Richard III, intersect with another Elizabethan genre, the history play, in which dramatists staged the great events, most often conspiracies, rebellions, and wars, of the nation. Not all of the events commemorated in history plays were tragic, but they tend to circle back again and again to the act that epitomized what for this period was the ultimate challenge to authority: the killing of a king. When the English cut off the head of their king in 1649, they were performing a deed which they had been rehearsing, literally, for most of a century.

English schoolboys would read and occasionally perform comedies by the great Roman playwrights Plautus and Terence. Shortly before mid-century a schoolmaster, Nicholas Udall, used these as a model for a comedy in English, Ralph Roister Doister. At about the same time, another comedy, Gammar Gurton’s Needle, which put vivid, native English material into classical form, was amusing the students at Cambridge. From the classical models English playwrights derived some elements of structure and content: plots based on intrigue, division into acts and scenes, and type characters such as the rascally servant and the miles gloriosus (cowardly braggart soldier). The latter type appears in Ralph Roister Doister and is a remote ancestor of Shakespeare’s Sir John Falstaff in the two parts of Henry IV and The Merry Wives of Windsor.

Early plays such as Gorboduc and Ralph Roister Doister are rarely performed or read today, and with good reason. In terms of both dramatic structure and style, they are comparatively crude. Take, for example, this clumsy expression of passionate love by the title character in Cambyses, King of Persia, a popular play written around 1560 by a Cambridge graduate, Thomas Preston:

For Cupid he, that eyeless boy, my heart hath so enflamed
With beauty, you me to content the like cannot be named;
For since I entered in this place and on you fixed mine eyes,
Most burning fits about my heart in ample wise did rise.
The heat of them such force doth yield, my corpse they scorch, alas!
And burns the same with wasting heat as Titan doth the grass.
And sith this heat is kindled so and fresh in heart of me,
There is no way but of the same the quencher you much be.

Around 1590, an extraordinary change overcame the English drama, transforming it almost overnight into a vehicle for unparalleled poetic and dramatic expression. Many factors contributed to this transformation, but probably the chief was the eruption onto the scene of Christopher Marlowe. Compare Preston’s couplets, written in a metre called “fourteeners,” with the lines in Marlowe’s Doctor Faustus (ca. 1592—93) with which Faustus greets the conjured figure of Helen of Troy:

http://englishworld20111.wordpress.com/
Was this the face that launched a thousand ships,
And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?
Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss:
Her lips sucks forth my soul, see where it flies!
Come Helen, come, give me my soul again.
Here will I dwell, for heaven be in these lips,
And all is dross that is not Helena! (Scene 12, lines 81—87)

Marlowe has created and mastered a theatrical language—a superb unrhymed iambic pentameter, or blank verse—far more expressive than anything that anyone accustomed to the likes of Preston could have imagined.

Play-acting, whether of tragedies, comedies, or any of the other Elizabethan genres, took its place alongside other forms of public expression and entertainment as well. Perhaps the most important, from the perspective of the theater, were music and dance, since these were directly and repeatedly incorporated into plays. Moreover, virtually all plays in the period, including Shakespeare's, apparently ended with a dance. Brushing off the theatrical gore and changing their expressions from woe to pleasure, the actors in plays like Doctor Faustus and King Lear would presumably have received the audience's applause and then bid for a second round by performing a stately pavane or a lively jig.

Plays, music, and dancing were by no means the only shows in town. There were jousts, tournaments, royal entries, religious processions, pageants in honor of newly installed civic officials or ambassadors arriving from abroad; wedding masques, court masques, and costumed entertainments known as Disguisings or Mumings; juggling acts, fortunetellers, exhibitions of swords-manship, mountebanks, folk healers, storytellers, magic shows; bearbaiting, bullbaiting, cockfighting, and other blood sports; folk festivals such as Maying, the Feast of Fools, Carnival, and WTiitsun Ales. For several years, Elizabethan Londoners were delighted by a trained animal—Banks's Horse—that could, it was thought, do arithmetic and answer questions. And there was always the grim but compelling spectacle of public shaming, mutilation, and execution.

Most English towns had stocks and whipping posts. Drunks, fraudulent merchants, adulterers, and quarrelers could be placed in carts or mounted backward on asses and paraded through the streets for crowds to jeer and throw refuse at. Women accused of being scolds could be publicly muzzled by an iron device called a brank or tied to a "cucking stool" and dunked in the river. Convicted criminals could have their ears cut off, their noses slit, their foreheads branded. Public beheadings and hangings were common. In the worst cases, felons were sentenced to be "hanged by the neck, and being alive cut down, and your privy members to be cut off, and your bowels to be taken out of your belly and there burned, you being alive." In the dismemberment with which Marlowe's Doctor Faustus ends, the audience was witnessing the theatrical equivalent of the execution of criminals and traitors that they could have also watched in the flesh, as it were, nearby.

Doctor Faustus was performed by the Lord Admiral's Men at the Rose Theater, one of four major public playhouses that by the mid-1590s were feverishly competing for crowds of spectators. These playhouses (including Shakespeare's famous Globe Theater, which opened in 1599) each accommodated some two thousand spectators and generally followed the same design: they were oval in shape, with an unroofed yard in the center where stood the groundlings (apprentices, servants, and others of the lower classes) and three rising tiers around the yard for men and women able to pay a higher price for places to sit and a roof over their heads. A large platform stage jutted out into the yard, surrounded on three sides by spectators (see the conjectural drawing of an Elizabethan playhouse in the appendices to this volume). These financially risky ventures relied on admission charges—it was an innovation of this period to have money advanced in the expectation of pleasure rather than offered to servants afterwards as a reward—and counted on habitual playgoing fueled by a steady supply of new plays. The public playhouses were all located outside the limits of the city of London and, accordingly, beyond the jurisdiction of the city authorities, who were generally hostile to dramatic spectacles. Eventually, indoor theaters, artificially lighted and patronized by a more select audience, were also built inside the city, secured under conditions that would allow them some protection from those who wished to shut them down.

Why should what we now regard as one of the undisputed glories of the age have aroused so much hostility? One answer, curiously enough, is traffic: plays drew large audiences, and nearby residents objected to the crowds, the noise, and the crush of carriages. Other, more serious concerns were public health and crime. It was thought that many diseases, including the dreaded bubonic plague, were spread by noxious odors, and the packed playhouses were obvious breeding grounds for infection. (Patrons often tried to protect themselves by sniffing nosegays or stuffing cloves in their nostrils.) The large crowds drew pickpockets, cutpurses, and other scoundrels. On one memorable afternoon a pickpocket was caught in the act and tied for the duration of the play to one of the posts that held up the canopy above the stage. The theater was, moreover, a well-known haunt of prostitutes, and, it was alleged, a place where innocent maids were seduced and respectable matrons corrupted. It was darkly rumored that "chambers and secret places" adjoined the theater galleries, and, in any case, taverns, disreputable inns, and brothels were close at hand.

There were other charges as well. Plays were performed in the afternoon and therefore drew people, especially the young, away from their work. They were schools of idleness, luring apprentices from their trades, law students from their studies, housewives from their kitchens, and potentially pious souls from the sober meditations to which they might otherwise devote themselves. Moralists warned that the theaters were nests of sedition, and religious polemists, especially Puritans, obsessively focusing on the use of boy actors to play the female parts, charged that theatrical transvestism excited illicit sexual desires, both heterosexual and homosexual.

But the playing companies had powerful allies, including Queen Elizabeth herself, and continuing popular support. One theater historian has estimated that between the late 1560s and 1642, when the playhouses were shut down by the English Civil War, well over fifty million visits were paid to the London theater, an astonishing figure for a city that had, by our standards, a very modest population. Plays were performed without the scene breaks and intermissions to which we are accustomed; there was no scenery and few props, but costumes were usually costly and elaborate. The players formed what would now be called repertory companies—that is, they filled the roles of each play from members of their own group, not employing outsiders. They performed a number of different plays on consecutive days, and the principal actors were shareholders in the profits of the company. Boys were apprenticed to actors just as they were apprenticed to master craftsmen in the guilds; they took the women's parts in plays until their voices changed. The plays might be bought for the company from freelance writers, or, as in Shakespeare's company, the group might include an actor-playwright who could supply it with some (though by no means all) of its plays. The script remained the property of the company, but a popular play was eagerly sought by the printers, and the companies, which generally tried to keep their plays from appearing in print, sometimes had trouble guarding their rights. The editors of the earliest collected edition of Shakespeare, the First Folio (1623), complain about the prior publication of "divers stolen and surreptitious copies" of his plays, "maimed and deformed by the frauds and stealths of injurious imposters."

SURPRISED BY TIME

All of the ways we cut up time into units are inevitably distortions. The dividing line between centuries was not, as far as we can tell, a highly significant one for people in the Renaissance, and many of the most important literary careers cross into the seventeenth century without a self-conscious moment of reflection. But virtually everyone must have been aware, by the end of the 1590s, that the long reign of England's Queen Elizabeth was nearing its end, and this impending closure occasioned considerable anxiety. Childless, the last of her line, Elizabeth had steadfastly refused to name a successor. She continued to make brilliant speeches, to receive the extravagant compliments of her flatterers, and to exercise her authority—in 1601, she had her favorite, the headstrong earl of Essex, executed for attempting to raise an insurrection. But, as her seventieth birthday approached, she was clearly, as Ralegh put it, "a lady surprised by time." She suffered from bouts of ill health and melancholy; her godson, Sir John Harington, was dismayed to see her pacing through the rooms of her palace, striking at the tapestries with a sword. Her more astute advisers—among them Lord Burghley's son, Sir Robert Cecil, who had succeeded his father as her principal counsellor—secretly entered into correspondence with the likeliest claimant to the throne, James VI of Scotland. Though the English queen had executed his Catholic mother, Mary, Queen of Scots, the Protestant James had continued to exchange polite letters with Elizabeth. It was at least plausible, as officially claimed, that in her dying breath, on March 24, 1603, Elizabeth designated James as her successor. A jittery nation that had feared a possible civil war at her death lit bonfires to welcome its new king. But in just a very few years, the English began to express nostalgia for the rule of "Good Queen Bess" and to look back on her reign as a magnificent high point in the history and culture of their nation.

JOHN SKELTON
ca. 1460-1529

John Skelton was not a tame poet. There was something wild about him that continues to provoke, baffle, and fascinate readers. It is difficult to fit the varied pieces of his life together: gifted rhetorician, translator, Latin tutor to the young prince who became Henry VIII, disgruntled courtier, political pamphleteer, visionary, biting satirist, and ordained priest. He was also the major poet of the first quarter of the century, with the title of poet laureate from both Oxford and Cambridge. His poetic achievement, remarkable though it is, is equally difficult to place; as C. S. Lewis observes, Skelton had "no real predecessors and no important disciples." His poetry draws, to be sure, on a long tradition of medieval anticlerical satire and carnivalesque parody, but Skelton brings to his mature works a fresh, often extremely eccentric voice.

His early works were more routinely conventional—ornate compliments, dutiful elegies, pious hymns to the Trinity and the like—but in a satire written at the end of the fifteenth century, The Bowge of Court, Skelton gave unusually powerful expression to the anxiety of living in the dangerous, viciously competitive precincts of royal power. (The poem's main character is called "Dread.") A few years later, whether self-exiled or sent away by his enemies, Skelton was living far from the court: about 1503 he became the rector of the parish church at Diss, in Norfolk, where he remained for some eight years. By 1512 he had returned to court, appointed king's orator. He moved to a house in the sanctuary of Westminster Abbey in 1518 and shortly thereafter began vituperative attacks on Cardinal Wolsey, the great prelate-statesman, in a series of satires, including Speak, Parrot; Colin Clout; and Why Come Ye Not to Court (1521—22). Wolsey had Skelton briefly imprisoned but released him and promptly hired his services for himself.

Skelton's poems gain some of their most startling effects by mixing high and low styles and by playing bawdy and scatological verbal games with the Catholic liturgy. The games are not necessarily sacrilegious, for the Catholic Church, as yet unchallenged by the Reformation, was capable of tolerating a wide range of expression, but they seem risk-taking and obstreperous, an impression heightened by the way they are written. In his satires, Skelton rejects the ornate rhetorical devices and aureate language that characterized his period's most ambitious poetry; he writes in short, rhymed lines, having from two to five beats, and the lines can keep on rhyming helter-skelter until the resources of the language give out. To many of his poems, with their aggressive and restless energies, this strange verse form is singularly appropriate. "The Tunning of Elinour Rumming" is, for example, a wonderfully clattering, apparently disordered portrait of an alewife, and the "skeltonics," as this way of writing has come to be called, contribute to the effect of disorder. The voice of the narrator of the satires has a breathless urgency much admired by W. H. Auden, among other modern poets, while to contemporary ears it is strikingly reminiscent of rap.

The English Reformation, which was set in motion shortly after Skelton's death, would drastically alter the context in which his work was received. English Protestants later in the century had trouble knowing what to make of him. On the one hand, his satires of the cardinal made him ripe for inclusion (with Langland and others) in the honor roll of supposedly proto-Protestant poets. Yet as a foul-mouthed and frivolous priest, Skelton could stand for the alleged corruption of the Catholic clergy. He also became associated with various tales and jests that seemed nostalgically to recall the innocence and "merriment" of pre-Reformation England. (In one of these, Skelton proudly ascends the pulpit to show off his naked illegitimate baby to his astonished parishioners.) For English society, as for English poetry, Skelton quickly came to represent the path not taken.*

Mannerly Margery Milk and Ale

Aye, beshrew you, by my fay.°
These wanton clerks be nice alway,
Avaunt, avaunt, my popagay!°
What, will ye do nothing but play?

Tilly vally straw, let be I say!
Gup,° Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery milk and ale.

By God, ye be a pretty pode,
And I love you an whole cartload.*

Straw, James Foder, ye play the fode,°
I am no hackney° for your rod:°
Go watch a bull, your back is broad!
Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery milk and ale.

Ywis° ye deal uncourteously;
What, would ye frumple° me? now fie!
"What, and ye shall not be my pigsnay?"°
By Christ, ye shall not, no hardly:
I will not be japed° bodily!

Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery milk and ale.

"Walk forth your way, ye cost me naught;
Now have I found that I have sought:
The best cheap flesh that ever I bought."

Yet, for his love that hath all wrought,
Wed me, or else I die for thought.
Gup, Christian Clout, your breath is stale!
Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery milk and ale.

With lullay, lullay, like a child,
Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.°
"My darling dear, my daisy flower,
Let me," quod° he, "lie in your lap."

"Lie still," quod she, "my paramour,°"

1. The poem is a song for three voices. The seducer's lines are in quotation marks; Margery sings the rest, except the chorus, which is sung by a bass.
2. Educated men: students, scholars, clergymen.
3. Popinjay, parrot—i.e., vain fellow.
4. "Go on!" (usually applied to horses).
5. Pig's eye. Here used as a (rough) term of endearment.
Lie still, hardly, and take a nap."
His head was heavy, such was his hap,
All drowsy dreaming, drowned in sleep,
That of his love he took no keep.

10 With hey lullay, lullay, like a child,
Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.

With ba, ba, bal and bas, bas, bas!
She cherished him, both cheek and chin,
That he wist never where he was;

15 He had forgotten all deadly sin.
He wanted wit her love to win,
He trusted her payment and lost all his prey;
She left him sleeping and stale away,

With hey lullay, lullay, like a child,

20 Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.

The rivers rowth, the waters wan,
She spared not to wet her feet;
She waded over, she found a man
That halsed her heartily and kissed her sweet—

25 Thus after her cold she caught a heat.
"My lief," she said, "routeth in his bed;
Ywis he hath an heavy head."
With hey lullay, lullay, like a child,

20 Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.

What dreamest thou, drunkard, drowsy pate?
Thy lust and liking is from thee gone.
Thou blinkard blowboll, thou wakest too late:
Behold thou Iiest, Iuggard, alone!

35 To deal with her so cowardly.
Ywis, pole-hatchet, she bleared thine eye.

1. Kiss, kiss, kiss. "Ba": the "by" of lullaby.
2. Lacked sufficient intelligence.
3. Your pleasure and enjoyment.
4. Blink-eyed drunkard.
5. Deceived you. "Pole-hatchet": a soldier who carried a poleax.

1. This rowdy poem—whose heroine really did keep an alehouse in Surrey—recounts Elinour's brewing practices ("tunning") and the social life in her establishment.
2. Second Section (Latin).
My ale for nought,
By Him that me bought."
With, "Hey, dog, hey,

And sometime she blens
The dung of her hens
And the ale together;
And saith, "Gossip,* come hither,
This ale shall be thicker,
And flower° the more quicker;
For I may tell you,
I learned it of a Jew,
When I began to brew,
And I have found it true;
Drink now while it is new;
And ye may it brook,°
It shall make you look Younger than ye be,
Years two or three,
For ye may prove it by me.

3. Go to the dais—i.e., take the best place.

SIR THOMAS MORE
1478-1535

Sir Thomas More is one of the most brilliant, compelling, and disturbing figures of the English Renaissance. He has been the hero of people who, given the chance, would (and on occasion did) tear each other apart: the Catholic Church made him a saint; leading Communists celebrated his book Utopia as a visionary forerunner of their plan to abolish private property; and middle-class liberals have admired his vision of free public education, careers open to talents, and freedom of thought. But at the same time each of these groups has been deeply troubled by aspects of More’s life and writings: the Catholic bishops of sixteenth-century Spain and Portugal placed Utopia on their list of prohibited books; Karl Marx reserved his most bitter scorn for those impractical socialists he branded as “utopian”; and liberals have noticed uneasily that More embraced the idea of the forced labor camp.

More was born in London, the son of a prominent lawyer. As a boy he served as a page in the grand household of the archbishop of Canterbury, John Morton, who was also King Henry VII’s lord chancellor; it is reported that at Christmastime, when wandering actors would perform plays at the archbishop's palace, young More would step in among the players and improvise a part for himself. This early talent for improvisation characterized More throughout his life, as did a lingering sense that he was never quite at home in any of the parts he played. (The famous portrait of More by Hans Holbein the Younger is included in the color insert in this volume.)

He studied at Oxford and at the Inns of Court, but he did not automatically follow in his father's footsteps. He was torn between a career as a lawyer, with its promise of wealth and access to power, and a life of religious devotion. For some four years, according to one of his early biographers, he lived as a layman among the ascetic monks in London's Charterhouse, but deciding that he wanted to marry, he turned toward a secular career in public affairs. Still, amid his law practice, his position as undersheriff of London, his participation in Parliament and on the king's council, his service in diplomatic and commercial negotiations, and ultimately his three tumultuous years as lord chancellor, More constantly showed signs of reserving some part of himself for other realms. One of those realms was his growing family, to whom he was a devoted and loving father, but he himself spoke of his familial concerns as a kind of business that took him away from the life of the mind. Shortly after his law studies, he gave a series of public lectures on Saint Augustine's monumental work, The City of God, and theological and moral arguments continued to fascinate him until his death. He also had a passion for Greek and Latin literature, a passion he shared with his close friend, Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam (ca. 1466—1536), the greatest humanist scholar of the Northern Renaissance.

Erasmus and More shared not only the profound classical learning that lay at the heart of the humanist movement but also an ardent Christian piety, a suspicion of scholastic hair-splitting, a delight in rhetoric, a taste for the ancient satirist Lucian, and a lively interest in experimental, unsettling wit. For Erasmus this interest bore fruit in his most enduring work, The Praise of Folly, which he composed as a guest in More's London house and dedicated to him. For More the love of playful, subversive wit culminated in Utopia, which he began in 1515 while in the Netherlands on a diplomatic mission for Henry VIII and completed the next year. Both works, written in Latin and quickly circulated among humanists throughout Europe, are daring intellectual games that call into question the period's most cherished assumptions. Utopia displays the strong influence of Plato's Republic, with its radically communalistic reimagining of society, but it is also shaped by more contemporary influences: monastic communities, which forbade private property and required everyone to labor; emerging market societies, with their emphasis on education and social mobility over hereditary privilege, and their dislike of the old warrior aristocracy; the recurrent outcries of peasant rebels demanding a more just distribution of wealth; and, explicitly, Amerigo Vespucci's published accounts of his voyages to the newly discovered lands across the Atlantic Ocean. Those voyages disclosed a whole world organized on principles utterly unlike those that governed European societies, a world seemingly free of the inequality, economic exploitation, dynastic squabbles, and legal chicanery that More observed everywhere around him.

Vespucci's letters, part sober reportage, part wild fantasy, helped More imagine an alternative to the world he inhabited. Book 2 of Utopia (the part of the work More composed first) describes in detail the laws and customs of a country that bears some striking physical resemblances to England. But, in other ways, how unlike England it is! The abolition of money and private property has prevented any neurotic attachment to goods and status, and the parasitic classes—nobles, lawyers, idle priests, rapacious soldiers—have been eliminated. In Utopia, a well-ordered political democracy, education is free and universal. Instead of the misery of oppressed peasants, there are prosperous collective farms. Instead of stench and suffering in crowded, crooked streets, there are gleaming, rational cities, with free hospitals and child care. Since everyone works, no one is overburdened; and there is ample time for all citizens to pursue the arts of peace and the pleasures of the mind and the body.
The picture of England in Book 1 of Utopia—beggars in the streets, convicted petty thieves hanging from the gibbets, hungry farmers displaced from lands fenced off for more profitable sheep-rearing, cynical flatterers encouraging the king to embark on imperialistic wars—makes the sharpest contrast imaginable with the ordered and peaceable state described in Book 2. Yet Book I is not, or not directly, a call for revolutionary social reform. It is rather a meditation, in the form of a dialogue, on the question of whether intellectuals should involve themselves in politics. The two speakers in the dialogue are a traveler named Raphael Hythloday and someone named Thomas More, who closely resembles but perhaps should not be identified precisely with the real More. More argues that Hythloday with his extraordinary learning, experience, and high principles, should offer his services as a councilor to one of the great monarchs of Europe. Hythloday counters that kings, who only desire flattery from their councilors, would never dream of adopting the radical policies, such as the abandonment of warfare and the abolition of private property, which alone might lead to a good society. In the dialogue, Hythloday is the aloof idealist, unwilling to dirty his hands in a pointless cause; More is the sincere pragmatist, prepared to compromise with the system and seek to change it from within rather than give up on any possibility of action. In Book I, the debate between Hythloday and More has no clear winner; but not long after completing Utopia, the real Thomas More entered the council of Henry VIII.

Book 2, Hythloday’s narrative of his visit to Utopia, is also in some sense a dialogue, a complex, often ambiguous meditation on the nature of the ideal commonwealth. The dialogue form not only allows the actual Thomas More some rhetorical cover for caustic critiques in both books of the social policy of his own country, but also encourages the reader to register the disturbing underside of More’s island commonwealth: Utopia is a society that rests upon slavery, including enslavement for social deviance. There is no variety in dress or housing or cityscape, no privacy. Citizens are encouraged to value pleasure, but they are constantly monitored, lest their pursuit of pleasure pass the strict bounds set by “nature” or “reason.” There is nominal freedom of thought, and toleration of religious diversity is built into the Utopian constitution, but still the priests can punish people for “impiety.” The Utopians officially despise war, but they nevertheless appear to fight a good many of them. It is very difficult to gauge More’s attitude toward his imaginary commonwealth; perhaps he himself could not have said with any absolute certainty what it was.

If there is deep ambivalence in More’s attitude toward Utopia, there is no comparable ambivalence in the other great work he wrote at approximately the same time, The History of King Richard III. In More’s influential account, Richard III, the last Yorkist king, was an unmitigated monster, twisted in mind and body, subtle, hypocritical, and murderous. This account, obviously appealing to the Tudors whose dynasty was founded upon Richard’s overthrow, was incorporated verbatim into several sixteenth-century chronicles and so came down to Shakespeare, whose Richard III (ca. 1592) fixed the portrait of Richard as a deformed, homicidal tyrant.

More wrote Utopia in Latin for an international audience of humanist intellectuals; he wrote Richard III, which he left unfinished, in both Latin and English versions. The English text, in prose of great energy and suppleness, suggests that he may with this highly charged account of the recent past have been trying to reach a different readership, more national in scope and interests. In his subsequent works, he continued to address both audiences on the matters that most concerned him, but he never repeated the mode of either playful speculation or historical narrative. Instead he focussed on theology, moral philosophy, and religious controversy, and though his wit and irony are everywhere evident in these writings, they are yoked to the service of an increasingly desperate struggle.

The struggle was against Lutheranism, which began to make inroads into England precisely during the period of More’s rise to great power. More, an ardent Catholic, hated the central tenets of the Protestant Reformation and fought its adherents with every means at his disposal, including book burning's, imprisonment, and execution. As Henry VIII's confidant and, finally, lord chancellor (1529-32), he played for a time a significant role in the war on heresy, but he resigned his high office when the king, seeking a divorce in order to marry Anne Boleyn, broke with the Roman Catholic Church. When More was required to take the oath for the Act of Succession and the Act of Supremacy, affirming that the king rather than the pope was the supreme head of the church in England, he declined. He attempted to remain silent, but the king treated his silence as a refusal and deemed this refusal to be treason. Against the pleadings of his family, More maintained his silence, choosing, as he put it, "to die the king's good servant, but God's first." In 1535 he was beheaded. Four hundred years later he was Canonized by the Catholic Church as Saint Thomas More.

Utopia

CONCERNING THE BEST STATE OF A COMMONWEALTH AND THE NEW ISLAND OF UTOPIA

A Truly Golden Handbook No Less Beneficial Than Entertaining by the Most Distinguished and Eloquent Author THOMAS MORE Citizen and Undersheriff of the Famous City of London

Thomas More to Peter Giles, Greetings

My very dear Peter Giles, I am almost ashamed to be sending you after a full year's time this little book about the Utopian commonwealth, which I'm sure you expected in less than six weeks. For, as you were well aware, I faced no problem in finding my materials, and had no reason to labor over the arrangement of them. All I had to do was repeat what you and I together heard Raphael describe. There was no occasion, either, for fine or far-fetched language, since what he said, being extempore and informal, couldn't be couched in fancy terms. And besides, as you know, he's a man better versed in Greek than in Latin; so that my language would be nearer the truth, the closer it approached to his casual simplicity. Truth in fact is the only quality at which I should have aimed, or did aim, in writing this book.

I confess, friend Peter, that having all these materials ready to hand made my own contribution so slight that there was hardly anything at all for me to do. Thinking up a topic like this from scratch and disposing it in proper order

1. More coined the word "Utopia" from Greek ou ("not") + topos ("place"); "Noplace"; perhaps with a pun on ou + topos. "Happy" or "Fortunate" Place. The book was written in Latin and published—elaborately titled, as below—on the European continent under the supervision of More's friend the great Dutch humanist Desiderius Erasmus (ca. 1466-1536). Our translation is by Robert M. Adams, as published in the Norton Critical Edition of Utopia (2nd ed., 1992), with revisions by George M. Logan.
2. As an undersheriff, More's principal duty was to serve as a judge in the Sheriff's Court, a city court that heard a wide variety of cases.
3. Giles (ca. 1486–1533) was both a humanistic scholar and a practical man of affairs, city clerk of Antwerp. Erasmus had recommended him and More to each other, and they met in Antwerp in the summer of 1515 (see below, p. 524); Utopia seems to have originated in conversations between them. In the first edition of the book, this letter is called its Preface.
4. I.e., the fictitious character Raphael Hythloday. His given name associates him with the archangel Raphael, traditionally a guide and healer.
might have demanded a lot of time and work even if a man were gifted with talent and learning. And then if the matter had to be set forth with eloquence, not just bluntly and factually, there’s no way I could have done that, however hard I worked, for however long a time. But now when I was relieved of all these problems, over which I could have sweated forever, there was nothing for me to do but simply write down what I had heard. Well, little as it was, that task was rendered almost impossible by my many other obligations. Most of my day is given to the law—listening to some cases, pleading others, compromising others, and deciding still others. I have to visit this man because of his official position and that man because of his lawsuit; and so almost the whole day is devoted to other people’s business and what’s left over to my own; and then for myself—that is, my studies—there’s nothing left.

For when I get home, I have to talk with my wife, chatter with my children, and consult with the servants. All these matters I consider part of my business, since they have to be done, unless a man wants to be a stranger in his own house. Besides, a man is bound to bear himself as agreeably as he can toward those whom nature or chance or his own choice has made the companions of his life. But of course he mustn’t spoil them with his familiarity, or by over-indulgence turn the servants into his masters. And so, amid these concerns, the day, the month, and the year slip away.

What time do I find to write, then? especially since I still have taken no account of sleeping or even of eating, to which many people devote as much time as to sleep itself, which devours almost half of our lives.\(^5\) My own time is only what I steal from sleeping and eating. It isn’t very much, but it’s something, and so I’ve finally been able to finish Utopia, even though belatedly, and I’m sending it to you now. I hope, my dear Peter, that you’ll read it over and let me know if you find anything that I’ve overlooked. Though I’m not really afraid of having forgotten anything important—I wish my judgment and learning were up to my memory, which isn’t half bad—still, I don’t feel so sure of it that I would swear I’ve missed nothing.

For my servant John Clement\(^6\) has raised a great doubt in my mind. As you know, he was there with us, for I always want him to be present at conversations where there’s profit to be gained. (And one of these days I expect we’ll get a fine crop of learning from this young sprout, who’s already made excellent progress in Greek as well as Latin.) Anyhow, as I recall matters, Hythloday said the bridge over the Anyder at Amaurot\(^7\) was five hundred yards long; but my John says that is two hundred yards too much—that in fact the river is barely three hundred yards wide there. So I beg you, consult your memory. If your recollection agrees with his, I’ll yield to the two of you, and confess myself mistaken. But if you don’t recall the point, I’ll follow my own memory and keep my present figure. For, as I’ve taken particular pains to avoid untruths in the book, I’d rather make an honest mistake than say what I don’t believe. In short, I’d rather be truthful than correct.

But the whole matter can be cleared up if you’ll ask Raphael about it—either directly, if he’s still in your neighborhood, or else by letter. And I’m

5. More’s sixteenth-century biographer Thomas Stapleton says he slept four or five hours a night, rising at 2 A.M.
6. Clement (d. 1572) had entered More’s household by 1514, as servant and pupil. He later became a respected physician.
7. "Amaurot": "made dark or dim"; "Anyder": "waterless" (Greek). "Hythloday": its first root is surely Greek ὑθλός, "nonsense"; the second part is probably from διαίδειν, "to distribute"—hence, together, "nonsense-peddler."
afraid you must do this anyway, because of another problem that has cropped up—whether through my fault, or yours, or Raphael’s, I’m not sure. For it didn’t occur to us to ask, nor to him to say, in what area of the New World Utopia is to be found. I wouldn’t have missed hearing about this for a sizable sum of money, for I’m quite ashamed not to know even the name of the ocean where this island lies about which I’ve written so much. Besides, there are various people here, and one in particular, a devout man and a professor of theology, who very much wants to go to Utopia. His motive is not by any means idle curiosity, but rather a desire to foster and further the growth of our religion, which has made such a happy start there. To this end, he has decided to arrange to be sent there by the pope, and even to be named bishop to the Utopians. He feels no particular scruples about intriguing for this post, for he considers it a holy project, rising not from motives of glory or gain, but simply from religious zeal.\(^8\)

Therefore I beg you, my dear Peter, to get in touch with Hythloday—in person if you can, or by letters if he’s gone—and make sure that my work contains nothing false and omits nothing true. It would probably be just as well to show him the book itself. If I’ve made a mistake, there’s nobody better qualified to correct me; but even he cannot do it, unless he reads over my book. Besides, you will be able to discover in this way whether he’s pleased or annoyed that I have written the book. If he has decided to write out his own story for himself, he may be displeased with me; and I should be sorry, too, if, in publicizing Utopia, I had robbed him and his story of the flower of novelty.

But to tell the truth, I’m still of two minds as to whether I should publish the book or not. For men’s tastes are so various, the tempers of some are so severe, their minds so ungrateful, their judgments so foolish, that there seems no point in publishing something, even if it’s intended for their advantage, that they will receive only with contempt and ingratitude. Better simply to follow one’s own natural inclinations, lead a merry, peaceful life, and ignore the vexing problems of publication. Most people know nothing of learning; many despise it. The clod rejects as too difficult whatever isn’t cloddish. The pedant dismisses as mere trifling anything that isn’t stuffed with obsolete words. Some readers approve only of ancient authors; most men like their own writing best of all. Here’s a man so solemn he won’t allow a shadow of levity, and there’s one so insipid of taste that he can’t endure the salt of a little wit. Some dullards dread satire as a man bitten by a hydrophobic dog dreads water; some are so changeable that they like one thing when they’re seated and another when they’re standing.

Those people lounge around the taverns, and as they swill their ale pass judgment on the intelligence of writers. With complete assurance they condemn every author by his writings, just as they think best, plucking each one, as it were, by the beard. But they themselves remain safely under cover and, as the proverb has it, out of harm’s way. No use trying to lay hold of them; they’re shaved so close, there’s not so much as the hair of an honest man to catch them by.

Finally, some people are so ungrateful that even though they’re delighted with a work, they don’t like the author any better because of it. They are like rude, ungrateful guests who, after they have stuffed themselves with a splendid dinner, go off, carrying their full bellies homeward without a word of thanks to the host who invited them. A fine task, providing at your own expense a banquet for men of such finicky palates, such various tastes, and such rude, ungracious tempers!

At any rate, my dear Peter, will you take up with Hythloday the points I spoke of? After I've heard from him, I'll take a fresh look at the whole matter. But since I've already taken the pains to write up the subject, it's too late to be wise. In the matter of publication, I hope we can have Hythloday's approval; after that, I'll follow the advice of my friends—and especially yours. Farewell, my dear Peter Giles. My regards to your excellent wife. Love me as you have always done; I remain more fond of you than ever.

Book 1

The most invincible king of England, Henry, the eighth of that name, a prince adorned with the royal virtues beyond any other, had recently some differences of no slight import with Charles, the most serene prince of Castille, and sent me into Flanders as his spokesman to discuss and settle them. I was companion and associate to that incomparable man Cuthbert Tunstall, whom the king has recently created Master of the Rolls, to everyone's great satisfaction. I will say nothing in praise of this man, not because I fear the judgment of a friend might be questioned, but because his learning and integrity are greater than I can describe and too well known everywhere to need my commendation—unless I would, according to the proverb, "Light up the sun with a lantern."

Those appointed by the prince to deal with us, all excellent men, met us at Bruges by prearrangement. Their head and leader was the margrave, so called, of Bruges, a most distinguished person. But their main speaker and guiding spirit was Georges de Themscke, the provost of Cassel, a man eloquent by nature as well as by training, very learned in the law, and most skillful in diplomatic affairs through his ability and long practice. After we had met several times, certain points remained on which we could not come to agreement; so they adjourned the meetings and went to Brussels for some days to consult their prince in person.

Meanwhile, since my business permitted it, I went to Antwerp. Of those who visited me while I was there, Peter Giles was more welcome to me than any of the others. He was a native of Antwerp, a man of high reputation, already appointed to a good position and worthy of the very best: I hardly know a young man more learned or of better character. Apart from being cultured, virtuous, and courteous to all, with his intimates he is so open, trustworthy, loyal, and affectionate that it would be hard to find another friend like him anywhere. No one is more modest or more frak; none better combines simplicity with wisdom. His conversation is so merry, and so witty without malice, that the ardent desire I felt to see my native country, my wife, and my children

2. An admired scholar and influential cleric, Tunstall (1474—1559) was appointed ambassador to Brussels in May 1515, and a year later became Master of the Rolls (principal clerk of the Chancery Court).

(from whom I had been separated more than four months) was much eased by his agreeable company and pleasant talk.

One day after I had heard mass at Nôtre Dame, the most beautiful and most popular church in Antwerp, I was about to return to my quarters when I happened to see him talking with a stranger, a man of quite advanced years. The stranger had a sunburned face, a long beard, and a cloak hanging loosely from his shoulders; from his appearance and dress, I took him to be a ship’s captain. When Peter saw me, he approached and greeted me. As I was about to return his greeting, he drew me aside, and, indicating the stranger, said, "Do you see that man? I was just on the point of bringing him to you."

"He would have been very welcome on your behalf," I answered.

"And on his own too, if you knew him," said Peter, "for there is no mortal alive today can tell you so much about unknown peoples and lands; and I know that you’re always greedy for such information."

"In that case," said I, "my guess wasn’t a bad one, for at first glance I supposed he was a skipper."

"Then you’re far off the mark," he replied, "For his sailing has not been like that of Palinurus, but more that of Ulysses, or rather of Plato.4 This man, who is named Raphael—his family name is Hythloday—knows a good deal of Latin, and is particularly learned in Greek. He studied Greek more than Latin because his main interest is philosophy, and in that field he found that the Romans have left us nothing very valuable except certain works of Seneca and Cicero.5 Being eager to see the world, he left to his brothers the patrimony to which he was entitled at home (he is a native of Portugal), and took service with Amerigo Vespucci.6 He accompanied Vespucci on the last three of his four voyages, accounts of which are now common reading everywhere; but on the last voyage, he did not return home with the commander. After much persuasion and expostulation he got Amerigo’s permission to be one of the twenty-four men who were left in a fort at the farthest point of the last voyage.7 Being marooned in this way was altogether agreeable to him, as he was more anxious to pursue his travels than afraid of death. He would often say, ‘The man who has no grave is covered by the sky,’ and ‘The road to heaven is equally short from all places.’8 Yet this frame of mind would have cost him dear, if God had not been gracious to him. After Vespucci’s departure, he traveled through many countries with five companions from the fort. At last, by strange good fortune, he got, via Ceylon, to Calicut, where by good luck he found some Portuguese ships; and so, beyond anyone’s expectation, he returned to his own country.9"

When Peter had told me this, I thanked him for his kindness in wishing to introduce me to a man whose conversation he hoped I would enjoy, and then

The two 1518 editions of Utopia included this woodcut by Ambrosius Holbein (brother of the more famous Hans Holbein the Younger), showing Hythloday and More seated on the turf-covered bench described in the text. Peter Giles and More’s pupil-servant John Clement, who is bringing refreshments, complete the scene.

I turned to Raphael. After greeting one another and exchanging the usual civilities of strangers upon their first meeting, we all went to my house. There in the garden we sat down on a bench covered with turf to talk together.

He told us that when Vespucci sailed away, he and his companions who had stayed behind in the fort often met with the people of the countryside, and by ingratiating speeches gradually won their friendship. Before long they came to dwell with them safely and even affectionately. The prince also gave them his favor (I have forgotten his name and that of his country), furnishing Raphael and his five companions not only with ample provisions, but with means for traveling—rafts when they went by water, wagons when they went by land. In addition, he sent with them a most trusty guide, who was to introduce and recommend them to such other princes as they wanted to visit. After many days’ journey, he said, they came to towns and cities, and to commonwealths that were both populous and not badly governed.

To be sure, under the equator and as far on both sides of the line as the sun moves, there lie vast empty deserts, scorched with perpetual heat. The whole region is desolate and squalid, grim and uncultivated, inhabited by wild beasts, serpents, and also by men no less wild and dangerous than the beasts themselves. But as they went on, conditions gradually grew milder. The heat was less fierce, the earth greener, men and even beasts less savage. At last they reached people, cities, and towns which not only traded among themselves and with their neighbors but even carried on commerce by sea and land with remote countries. After that, he said, they were able to visit different lands in every direction, for he and his companions were welcome as passengers aboard any ship about to make a journey.

The first vessels they saw were flat-bottomed, he said, with sails made of papyrus-reeds and wicker, or occasionally of leather. Farther on, they found ships with pointed keels and canvas sails, very much like our own. The seamen were skilled in managing wind and water; but they were most grateful to him, Raphael said, for showing them the use of the compass, of which they had been ignorant. For that reason, they had formerly sailed with great timidity, and only in summer. Now they have such trust in the compass that they no longer fear winter at all, and tend to be overconfident rather than cautious. There is some danger that through their imprudence, this discovery, which they thought would be so advantageous to them, may become the cause of much mischief.

It would take too long to repeat all that Raphael told us he had observed, nor would it make altogether for our present purpose. Perhaps on another occasion we shall tell more about the things that are most profitable, especially the wise and sensible institutions that he observed among the civilized nations. We asked him many eager questions about such things, and he answered us willingly enough. We made no inquiries, however, about monsters, which are the routine of travelers' tales. Scyllas, ravenous Celaenos, people-eating Lestrygonians and that sort of monstrosity you can hardly avoid, but governments solidly established and sensibly ruled are not so common. While he told us of many ill-considered usages in these new-found nations, he also described quite a few other customs from which our own cities, nations, races, and kingdoms might take example in order to correct their errors. These I shall discuss in another place, as I said. Now I intend to relate only what he told us about the manners and laws of Utopians, first explaining the occasion that led him to speak of that commonwealth. Raphael had been talking very wisely about the many errors and also the wise institutions found both in that hemisphere and this (as many of both sorts in one place as in the other), speaking as shrewdly about the manners and governments of each place he had visited briefly as though he had lived there all his life. Peter was amazed.

"My dear Raphael," he said, "I'm surprised that you don't enter some king's service; for I don't know of a single prince who wouldn't be eager to employ you. Your learning and your knowledge of various countries and peoples would entertain him, while your advice and your supply of examples would be very helpful in the counsel chamber. Thus you might advance your own interests and be useful at the same time to all your relatives and friends."

"I am not much concerned about my relatives and friends," he replied, "because I consider that I have already done my duty by them. While still young and healthy, I distributed among my relatives and friends the possessions that most men do not part with till they are old and sick (and then only reluctantly, because they can no longer keep them). I think they should be content with this gift of mine, and not expect that for their sake I should enslave myself to any king whatever."

1. As a matter of fact, the native Americans, when they traveled by water, used canoes made from hollowed logs. In general, More's depiction is fanciful.
2. Scylla and the Lestrygonians were Homeric bogeys: the former, a six-headed sea monster (Odyssey 12.79ff.), the latter, giant cannibals (Odyssey 10.76ff.). Celaeno, one of the Harpies (birds with women's faces), appears in the Aeneid (3.20ff.).
3. As J. H. Hexter argues (More's "Utopia": lite Biography of an Idea [1952], pp. 18-21), it is almost certain that at this point More opened a seam in the original version of Utopia—which evidently included only the account of the Utopian commonwealth (now Book 2) and the opening pages of what is now Book 1—to insert the additions that constitute the remainder of Book 1.
"Well said," Peter replied; 'but I do not mean that you should be in servitude to any king, only in his service."

'The difference is only a matter of one syllable,' Raphael replied.

'All right,' said Peter, 'but whatever you call it, I do not see any other way in which you can be so useful to your friends or to the general public, in addition to making yourself happier.'

'Happier indeed!' exclaimed Raphael. 'Would a way of life so absolutely repellent to my spirit make my life happier? As it is now, I live as I please, and I fancy very few courtiers, however splendid, can say that. As a matter of fact, there are so many men soliciting favors from the powerful that it will be no great loss if they have to do without me and a couple of others like me.'

Then I said, 'It is clear, my dear Raphael, that you want neither wealth nor power, and indeed I value and revere a man of such a disposition as much as I do the mightiest persons in the world. Yet I think if you would devote your time and energy to public affairs, you would do a thing worthy of a generous and philosophical nature, even if you did not much like it. You could best perform such a service by joining the council of some great prince, whom you would incite to noble and just actions. I am sure you would do this if you held such an office, and your influence would be felt, because a people's welfare or misery flows in a stream from their prince, as from a never-failing spring. Your learning is so full, even if it weren't combined with experience, and your experience is so great, even apart from your learning, that you would be an extraordinary counselor to any king in the world.'

'You are twice mistaken, my dear More,' he replied, 'first in me and then in the situation itself. I don't have the capacity you ascribe to me, and if I had it in the highest degree, the public would not be any better off through the sacrifice of my peace. In the first place, most princes apply themselves to the arts of war, in which I have neither ability nor interest, instead of to the good arts of peace. They are generally more set on acquiring new kingdoms by hook or by crook than on governing well those that they already have. Moreover, the counselors of kings are all so wise already that they need no other knowledge (or at least that's the way they see it). At the same time, they approve and even flatter the most absurd statements of favorites through whose influence they seek to stand well with the prince. It is only natural, of course, that each man should think his own opinions best: the crow loves his fledgling, and the ape his cub. Now in a court composed of people who envy everyone else and admire only themselves, if a man should suggest something he had read of in other ages or seen in far places, the other counselors would think their reputation for wisdom was endangered, and they would look like simpletons, unless they could find fault with his proposal. If all else failed, they would take refuge in some remark like this: 'The way we're doing it was good enough for our ancestors, and I only hope we're as wise as they were.' And with this deep thought they would take their seats, as though they had said the last word on the subject—implying, of course, that it would be a very dangerous matter if anyone were found to be wiser in any point than his ancestors were. As a matter of fact, we quietly neglect the best examples they have left us; but if something better is proposed, we seize the excuse of reverence for times past and cling to it desperately. Such proud, obstinate, ridiculous judgments I have encountered many times, and once even in England.'

'What!' I asked. 'Were you ever in my country?'

'Yes,' he answered, 'I spent several months there. It was not long after the revolt of the Cornishmen against the king had been put down, with great slaughter of the poor folk involved in it.\(^4\) During my stay I was deeply beholden to the reverend prelate John Cardinal Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, and in addition at that time lord chancellor of England.\(^5\) He was a man, my dear Peter (for More knows about him, and can tell what I’m going to say), as much respected for his wisdom and virtue as for his authority. He was of medium height, not bent over despite his years; his looks inspired respect rather than fear. In conversation, he was not forbidding, though serious andgrave. When suitors came to him on business, he liked to test their spirit and presence of mind by speaking to them sharply, though not rudely. He liked to uncover these qualities, which were those of his own nature, as long as they were not carried to the point of effrontery; and he thought such men were best qualified to carry on business. His speech was polished and pointed; his knowledge of the law was great; he had a vast understanding and a prodigious memory, for he had improved extraordinary natural abilities by constant study and practice.
At the time when I was in England, the king relied heavily on his advice, and he seemed the chief support of the nation as a whole. He had left school for court when scarcely more than a boy, had devoted all his life to important business, and had acquired from many changes of fortune and at great cost a supply of wisdom, which is not soon lost when so purchased.

\(^4\) One day when I was dining with him, there was present a layman, learned in the laws of your country, who for some reason took occasion to praise the rigid execution of justice then being practiced upon thieves. They were being executed everywhere, he said, with as many as twenty at a time being hanged on a single gallows. And then he declared that he could not understand how so many thieves sprang up everywhere, when so few of them escaped hanging.
I ventured to speak freely before the cardinal, and said, ‘There is no need to wonder: this way of punishing thieves goes beyond the call of justice, and is not, in any case, for the public good. The penalty is too harsh in itself, yet it isn’t an effective deterrent. Simple theft\(^6\) is not so great a crime that it ought to cost a man his head, yet no punishment however severe can withhold a man from robbery when he has no other way to eat. In this matter not only you in England but a good part of the world seem to imitate bad schoolmasters, who would rather whip their pupils than teach them. Severe and terrible punishments are enacted against theft, when it would be much better to enable every man to earn his own living, instead of being driven to the awful necessity of stealing and then dying for it.’

\(^5\) ‘Oh, we’ve taken care of that,’ said the fellow. ‘There are the trades and there is farming, by which men may make a living unless they choose deliberately to be rogues.’

\(^6\) ‘Oh no you don’t,’ I said, ‘you won’t get out of it that way. We may disregard for the moment the cripples who come home from foreign and civil wars, as lately from the Cornish battle and before that from your wars with France.
These men, wounded in the service of king and country, are too badly crippled to follow their old trades, and too old to learn new ones. But since wars occur

\(^4\) Angered by the greedy taxation of Henry VII, an army of Cornishmen marched on London in 1497, but were defeated at the battle of Blackheath.

\(^5\) Morton (1420-1500) was a distinguished prelate, statesman, and administrator. More’s father, following the custom of the age, sent his son to serve as a page for two years (1490—92) in the cardinal’s household; the seventy-year-old Morton is said to have been so impressed with the twelve-year-old More that he arranged for his education at Oxford.

\(^6\) Theft is simple when not accompanied by vioence or intimidation.
only from time to time, let us, I say, disregard these men, and consider what happens every day. There are a great many noblemen who live idly like drones off the labor of others, their tenants whom they bleed white by constantly raising their rents. (This is the only instance of their tightfistedness, because they are prodigal in everything else, ready to spend their way to the poorhouse.) These noblemen drag around with them a great train of idle servants, who have never learned any trade by which they could earn a living. As soon as their master dies, or they themselves fall ill, they are promptly turned out of doors, for lords would rather support idlers than invalids, and the son is often unable to maintain as big a household as his father had, at least at first. Those who are turned off soon set about starving, unless they set about stealing. What else can they do? Then when a wandering life has left their health impaired and their clothes threadbare, when their faces look pinched and their garments tattered, men of rank will not want to engage them. And country people dare not do so, for they don't have to be told that one who has been raised softly to idle pleasures, who has been used to swaggering about with sword and buckler, is likely to look down on the whole neighborhood and despise everybody as beneath him. Such a man can't be put to work with spade and mattock; he will not serve a poor man faithfully for scant wages and sparse diet.'

"But we ought to encourage these men in particular," said the lawyer. 'In case of war the strength of our army depends on them, because they have a bolder and nobler spirit than workmen and farmers have.'

'You may as well say that thieves should be encouraged for the sake of wars,' I answered, 'since you will never lack for thieves as long as you have men like these. Just as some thieves are not bad soldiers, some soldiers turn out to be pretty good robbers, so nearly are these two ways of life related. But the custom of keeping too many retainers is not peculiar to this nation; it is common to almost all of them. France suffers from an even more grievous plague. Even in peacetime—if you can call it peace—the whole country is crowded with foreign mercenaries, hired on the same principle that you've given for your noblemen keeping idle servants. Wise fools have a saying that the public safety depends on having ready a strong army, preferably of veteran soldiers. They think inexperienced men are not reliable, and they sometimes hunt out pretexts for war, just so they may have trained soldiers and experienced cut-throats—or, as Sallust neatly puts it, that "hand and spirit may not grow dull through lack of practice." But France has learned to her cost how pernicious it is to feed such beasts. The examples of the Romans, the Carthaginians, the Syrians, and many other peoples show the same thing; for not only their governments but their fields and even their cities were ruined more than once by their own standing armies. Besides, this preparedness is unnecessary: not even the French soldiers, practiced in arms from their youth, can boast of having often got the best of your raw recruits.' I shall say no more on

7. Some of these were household servants; others were the last vestiges of the private armies by which, under feudalism, every lord was followed.
8. Charles VII of France (reigned 1422—61) had tried to establish a national army, but his successors reverted to mercenaries, mostly Swiss infantrymen.
9. Paraphrasing the Catiline (16.3) of the Roman historian Sallust (86—35 B.C.E.). this point, lest I seem to flatter present company. At any rate, neither your town workmen nor your rough farm laborers seem to be much afraid of the idle pensioners of gentlemen, as long as they're not weakened by some accident or cowed by extreme poverty. So you need not fear that retainers, one strong and vigorous (for that's the only sort gentlemen deign to corrupt), but now soft and flabby because of their idle, effeminate life, would be weakened if they were taught practical crafts to earn their living, and trained to manly labor. Anyway, I cannot think it's in the public interest to maintain for the emergency of war such a vast multitude of people who trouble and disturb the peace. You never have war unless you choose it, and peace is always more to be considered than war. Yet this is not the only circumstance that makes thieving necessary. There is another one, peculiar (as I see it) to the English people alone.'

"'What is that?' asked the Cardinal.

"'Your sheep,' I replied, 'that used to be so meek and eat so little. Now they are becoming so greedy and wild that they devour human beings themselves, as I hear. They devastate and pillage fields, houses, and towns. For in whatever parts of the land the sheep yield the softest and most expensive wool, there the nobility and gentry, yes, and even some abbots—holy men—are not content with the old rents that the land yielded to their predecessors. Living in idleness and luxury, without doing any good to society, no longer satisfies them; they have to do positive evil. For they leave no land free for the plow:
they enclose every acre for pasture; they destroy houses and abolish towns, keeping only the churches, and those for sheep-barns. And as if enough of your land were not already wasted on woods and game-preserves, these worthy men turn all human habitations and cultivated fields back to wilderness. Thus one greedy, insatiable glutton, a frightful plague to his native country, may enclose many thousand acres of land within a single hedge. The tenants are dismissed and compelled, by trickery or brute force or constant harassment, to sell their belongings. By hook or by crook these miserable people—men, women, husbands, wives, orphans, widows, parents with little children, whole families (poor but numerous, since farming requires many hands)—are forced to move out. They leave the only homes familiar to them, and they can find no place to go. Since they cannot afford to wait for a buyer, they sell for a pittance all their household goods, which would not bring much in any case.
When that little money is gone (and it's soon spent in wandering from place to place), what remains for them but to steal, and so be hanged—justly, you'd say!—or to wander and beg? And yet if they go tramping, they are jailed as sturdy beggars. They would be glad to work, but they can find no one who will hire them. There is no need for farm labor, in which they have been trained, when there is no land left to be plowed. One herdsman or shepherd can look after a flock of beasts large enough to stock an area that would require many hands if it were plowed and harvested.

"'This enclosing has had the effect of raising the price of grain in many places. In addition, the price of raw wool has risen so much that poor people who used to make cloth are no longer able to buy it, and so great numbers are forced from work to idleness. One reason is that after the enlarging of the

http://englishworld20111.wordpress.com/
pasture-land, rot killed a great number of sheep—as though God were punishing greed by sending upon the animals a murrain, which in justice should have fallen on the owners! But even if the number of sheep should increase greatly, their price will not fall a penny. The reason is that the wool trade, though it can’t be called a monopoly because it isn’t in the hands of one single person, is concentrated in few hands (an oligopoly, you might say), and these so rich that the owners are never pressed to sell until they have a mind to, and that is only when they can get their price.

"For the same reason other kinds of livestock also are priced exorbitantly, and this is all the easier because, with so many cottages being pulled down, and farming in a state of decay, there are not enough people to look after the breeding of animals. These rich men will not breed calves as they do lambs, but buy them lean and cheap, fatten them in their own pastures, and then sell them at a high price. I don’t think the full impact of this bad system has yet been felt. We know these dealers raise prices where the fattened cattle are sold. But when, over a period of time, they keep buying beasts from other localities faster than they can be bred, then as the supply gradually diminishes where they are purchased, a widespread shortage is bound to ensue. So your island, which seemed especially fortunate in this matter, will be ruined by the crass avarice of a few. For the high price of grain causes rich men to dismiss as many retainers as they can from their households; and what, I ask, can these men do, but rob or beg? And a man of courage is more likely to steal than to cringe.

"To make this hideous poverty worse, it exists side by side with wanton luxury. Not only the servants of noblemen, but tradespeople, farmers, and people of every social rank are given to ostentatious dress and gluttonous greed. Look at the eating houses, the bawdy houses, and those other places just as bad, the taverns, wine-shops, and alehouses. Look at all the crooked games of chance like dice, cards, backgammon, tennis, bowling, and quoits, in which money slips away so fast. Don’t all these lead their habitues straight to robbery? Banish these blights, make those who have ruined farms and villages restore them, or rent them to someone who will rebuild. Restrict the right of the rich to buy up anything and everything, and then to exercise a kind of monopoly. Let fewer people be brought up in idleness. Let agriculture be restored and the wool manufacture revived, so there will be useful work for the whole crowd of those now idle—whether those whom poverty has already made into thieves, or those whom vagabondage and habits of lazy service are converting, just as surely, into the robbers of the future.

"If you do not find a cure for these evils, it is futile to boast of your severity in punishing theft. Your policy may look superficially like justice, but in reality it is neither just nor practical. If you allow young folk to be abominably brought up and their characters corrupted, little by little, from childhood; and if then you punish them as grownups for committing crime to which their early training has inclined them, what else is this, I ask, but first making them thieves and then punishing them for it?"

As I was speaking thus, the lawyer had made ready his answer, choosing the solemn, formal style of disputants who are better at summing up than at

4. Luxurious living was not, in fact, characteristic of the reign of the parsimonious Henry VII (when Hythloday is supposed to be addressing Cardinal Morton). More is projecting onto the earlier period, perhaps unconsciously, a kind of extravagant display that began in 1509 with the accession of Henry VIII.
replying, and who like to show off their memory. So he said to me, 'You have talked very well for a stranger, but you have heard about more things than you have been able to understand correctly. I will make the matter clear to you in a few words. First, I will repeat in order what you have said; then I will show how you have been misled by ignorance of our customs; finally, I will demolish all your arguments and reduce them to rubble. And so to begin where I promised, on four points you seemed to me—'

"'Hold your tongue,' said the Cardinal, 'for you won't be finished in a few words, if this is the way you start. We will spare you the trouble of answering now, and reserve the pleasure of your reply till our next meeting, which will be tomorrow, if your affairs and Raphael's permit it. Meanwhile, my dear Raphael, I am eager to hear why you think theft should not be punished with death, or what other punishment you think would be more in the public interest. For I'm sure even you don't think it should go unpunished entirely. Even as it is, the fear of death does not restrain evildoers; once they were sure of their lives, as you propose, what force or fear could restrain them? They would look on a lighter penalty as an open invitation to commit more crimes—it would be like offering them a reward.'

"'It seems to me, most kind and reverend father,' I said, 'that it's altogether unjust to take someone's life for taking money. Nothing in the world that fortune can bestow is equal in value to a human life. If they say the thief suffers not for the money, but for violation of justice and transgression of laws, then this extreme justice should really be called extreme injury. We ought not to approve of these fierce Manlian edicts5 that invoke the sword for the smallest violations. Neither should we accept the Stoic view that considers all crimes equal,6 as if there were no difference between killing a man and taking a coin from him. If equity means anything, there is no proportion or relation at all between these two crimes. God has said, "Thou shalt not kill"; shall we kill so readily for the theft of a bit of small change? Perhaps it will be argued that God's law against killing does not apply where human laws allow it. But then what prevents men from making other laws in the same way—perhaps even laws legalizing rape, adultery, and perjury? God has taken from each person the right not only to kill another, but even to kill himself. If mutual consent to human laws on manslaughter entitles men freely to exempt their agents from divine law and allows them to kill where he has given no example, what is this but preferring the law of man to the law of God? The result will be that in every situation men will decide for themselves how far it suits them to observe the laws of God. The law of Moses is harsh and severe, as for an enslaved and stubborn people, but it punishes theft with a fine, not death.7 Let us not think that in his new law of mercy, where he treats us with the tenderness of a father, God has given us greater license to be cruel to one another.

"These are the reasons why I think it is wrong to put thieves to death. But everybody knows how absurd and even harmful to the public welfare it is to punish theft and murder alike. If theft carries the same penalty as murder, the

5. Manlian edicts (like those imposed by the Roman consul Titus Manlius in the fourth century B.C.E.) are proverbially strict. Manlius executed his own son for disobeying one of them.

6. This view was in fact maintained by some of the ancient Stoic philosophers.

7. The Mosaic law is that spelled out in the first verses of Exodus 22. It provides various penalties for theft, but nowhere death. This is contrasted with the "new law" of Christ, under which England is supposed to be operating.
thief will be encouraged to kill the victim whom otherwise he would only have robbed. When the punishment is the same, murder is safer, since one conceals both crimes by killing the witness. Thus while we try to terrify thieves with extreme cruelty, we really invite them to kill the innocent.

" ‘Now since you ask what better punishment can be found, in my judgment it would be much easier to find a better one than a worse. Why should we question the value of the punishments long used by the Romans, who were most expert in the arts of government? They condemned those convicted of heinous crimes to work, shackled, for life, in stone quarries and mines. But of all the alternatives, I prefer the method which I observed in my Persian travels among the people commonly called the Polylerites. They are a sizable nation, not badly governed, free and subject only to their own laws, except that they pay annual tribute to the Persian Shah. Living far from the sea, they are nearly surrounded by mountains. Being contented with the products of their own land, which is by no means unfruitful, they have little to do with any other nation, nor are they much visited. According to their ancient customs, they do not try to enlarge their boundaries, and easily protect themselves behind their mountains by paying tribute to their overlord. Thus they have no wars and live in a comfortable rather than a glorious manner, more contented than ambitious or famous. Indeed, I think they are hardly known by name to anyone but their next-door neighbors.

" ‘In their land, whoever is found guilty of theft must make restitution to the owner, not (as elsewhere) to the prince; they think the prince has no more right to the stolen goods than the thief. If the stolen property has disappeared, the value of the thief's property is estimated, and restitution is made from it. All the rest is handed over to the thief's wife and children, while the thief himself is sentenced to hard labor.

" ‘Unless their crimes were compounded with atrocities, thieves are neither imprisoned nor shackled, but go freely and unguarded about their work on public projects. If they shirk and do their jobs slackly, they are not chained, but they are whipped. If they work hard, they are treated without any insults, except that at night after roll call they are locked up in their dormitories. Apart from constant work, they undergo no discomfort in living. As they work for the state, they are decently fed out of the public stores, though arrangements vary from place to place. In some districts they are supported by alms. Unreliable as this support may seem, the Polylerites are so charitable that no way is found more rewarding. In other places, public revenues are set aside for their support, or a special tax is levied; and sometimes they do not do public work, but anyone in need of workmen can go to the market and hire a convict by the day at a set rate, a little less than that for free men. If they are lazy, it is lawful to whip them. Thus they never lack for work, and each one of them brings a little profit into the public treasury beyond the cost of his keep.

" ‘They are all dressed in clothes of the same distinctive color. Their hair is not shaved but trimmed close about the ears, and the tip of one ear is cut off. Their friends are allowed to give them food, drink, or clothing, as long as it is of the proper color; but to give them money is death, both to the giver and to the taker. It is just as serious a crime for any free man to take money from them for any reason whatever; and it is also a capital crime for any of these slaves (as the condemned are called) to carry weapons. In each district of the country they are required to wear a special badge. It is a capital crime to throw away the badge, to go beyond one’s own district, or to talk with a slave of another district. Plotting escape is no more secure than escape itself: it is death for any other slave to know of a plot to escape, and slavery for a free man. On the other hand, there are rewards for informers—money for a free man, freedom for a slave, and for both of them pardon and amnesty. Thus it can never be safer for them to persist in a plan of escape than to renounce it.

6. From Greek: 'the People of Much Nonsense.'

"Thus I’ve described their policies in this matter. It is clear how mild and practical they are, for the aim of the punishment is to destroy vices and save men. The criminals are treated so that they see the necessity of being honest, and for the rest of their lives they atone for the wrong they have done before. There is so little danger of relapse that travelers going from one part of the country to another think slaves the most reliable guides, changing them at the boundary of each district. The slaves have no means of committing robbery, since they are unarmed, and any money in their possession is evidence of a crime. If caught, they would be instantly punished, and there is no hope of escape anywhere. Since every bit of a slave’s clothing is unlike the usual clothing of the country, how could a slave escape, unless he fled naked? Even then his cropped ear would give him away at once. Might not the slaves form a conspiracy against the government? Perhaps. But the slaves of one district could hardly expect to succeed unless they first involved in their plot the slave-gangs of many other districts. And that is impossible, since they are not allowed to meet or talk together or even to greet one another. No one would risk a plot when they all know joining is so dangerous to the participant and betrayal so profitable to the informer. Besides, no one is quite without hope of gaining his freedom eventually if he accepts his punishment in the spirit of obedience and patience, and gives promise of future good conduct. Indeed, every year some are pardoned as a reward for their submissive behavior.’

"When I had finished this account, I added that I saw no reason why this system could not be adopted even in England, and with much greater advantage than the justice’ which my legal antagonist had praised so highly. But the lawyer replied that such a system could never be adopted in England without putting the whole nation in serious peril. And so saying, he shook his head, made a wry face, and fell silent. And all the company signified their agreement in his opinion.

"Then the Cardinal remarked, ‘It is not easy to guess whether this scheme would work well or not, since nobody has yet tried it out. But perhaps when the death sentence has been passed on a thief, the king might reprieve him for a time without right of sanctuary,’ and thus see how the plan worked. If it turned out well, then he might establish it by law; if not, he could execute immediate punishment on the man formerly condemned. This would be no more inconvenient or unjust than if the condemned man had been put to death before, yet the experiment would involve no risk. I think vagabonds too might be treated this way, for though we have passed many laws against them, they have had no real effect as yet.’

"When the Cardinal had concluded, they all began praising enthusiastically ideas which they had received with contempt when I suggested them; and they particularly liked the idea about vagabonds, because it was the Cardinal’s addition.

'I don’t know whether it is worthwhile telling what followed, because it was silly, but I'll tell it anyhow, for it's not a bad story and it bears on our subject. There was a hanger-on standing around, who was so good at playing the fool that you could hardly tell him from the real thing. He was constantly making jokes, but so awkwardly that we laughed more at him than at them; yet sometimes a rather clever thing came out, confirming the old proverb that a man who throws the dice often will sooner or later make a lucky cast. One of the company happened to say, 'Well, Raphael has taken care of the thieves, and the Cardinal has taken care of the vagabonds, so now all we have to do is take care of the poor whom sickness or old age has kept from earning a living.'

"Leave that to me," said the fool, 'and I'll set it right at once. These are people I'm eager to get out of my sight, having been so often vexed with them and their woeful complaints. No matter how pitifully they beg for money, they've never whined a single penny out of my pocket. Either I don't want to give them anything, or I haven't anything to give them—it's one of the two. Now they're getting wise; they know me so well, they don't waste their breath, but let me pass without a word or a hope—no more, by heaven, than if I were a priest. But I would make a law sending all these beggars to Benedictine monasteries, where the men could become lay brothers, as they're called, and the women could be nuns.'

'The Cardinal smiled and passed it off as a joke; the rest took it seriously. But a certain friar, a theologian, took such pleasure in this jest at the expense of priests and monks that he too began to make merry, though generally he was grave to the point of sourness. 'You will not get rid of the beggars,' he began, 'unless you take care of us friars too.'

"You have been taken care of already,' retorted the fool. 'The Cardinal provided for you splendidly when he said vagabonds should be arrested and put to work, for you friars are the greatest vagabonds of all.'

"When the company, watching the Cardinal closely, saw that he admitted this jest like the other, they all took it up with vigor—except for the friar. He, as you can easily imagine, was stung by the vinegar, and flew into such a rage that he could not keep from abusing the fool. He called him a knave, a slanderer, a ribald, and a 'son of perdition,' quoting the meanwhile terrible denunciations from Holy Writ. Now the joker began to jest in earnest, for he was clearly on his own ground.

"Don't get angry, good friar,' he said, 'for it is written, "In your patience possess ye your souls."' 15

"In reply, the friar said, and I quote his very words: 'I am not angry, you gallows-bird, or at least I do not sin, for the psalmist says, "Be ye angry, and sin not."' 16

"At this point the Cardinal gently cautioned the friar to calm down, but he answered: 'No, my lord, I speak only from great zeal, as I ought to. For holy men have had great zeal. That is why Scripture says, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," and we sing in church, "those who mocked Elisha for being bald, as he went up to the house of God, felt the effects of his zeal." so this mocker, this rascal, this ribald fellow may very well feel it.'

"Perhaps you mean well," said the Cardinal, "but you would act in a more holy, and certainly in a wiser way, if you didn’t set your wit against a fool’s wit and try to spar with a professional jester."

"No, my lord," he replied, "I would not act more wisely. For Solomon himself, the wisest of men, said, "Answer a fool according to his folly," and that’s what I’m doing now. I am showing him the pit into which he will fall if he does not take care. For if the many mockers of Elisha, who was only one bald man, felt the effects of his zeal, how much more effect shall be felt by a single mocker of many friars, who include a great many bald-heads! And besides, we have a papal bull, by which all who mock us are excommunicated."

"When the Cardinal saw there was no end to the matter, he nodded to the fool to leave, and turned the conversation to another related subject. Soon after, he rose from table, and, going to hear petitioners, dismissed us."

"Look, my dear More, what a long story I have inflicted on you. I would be quite ashamed, if you had not yourself asked for it, and seemed to listen as if you did not want to miss any of it. Though I might have shortened my account somewhat, I have told it in full, so you might see how those who rejected what I said at first approved of it immediately afterward, when they saw the Cardinal did not disapprove. In fact they went so far in their flattery that they applauded in good earnest ideas that he tolerated only as the jesting of a fool. From this episode you can see how little courtiers would value me or my advice."

To this I answered, "You have given me great pleasure, my dear Raphael, for everything you’ve said has been both wise and witty. As you spoke, I seemed to be a child and in my own native land once more, through the pleasant recollection of that Cardinal in whose court I was brought up as a lad. Dear as you are to me on other accounts, you cannot imagine how much dearer you are because you honor his memory so highly. Still, I don’t give up my former opinion: I think if you could overcome your aversion to court life, your advice to a prince would be of the greatest advantage to mankind. This, after all, is the chief duty of every good man, including you. Your friend Plato thinks that commonwealths will become happy only when philosophers become kings or kings become philosophers. No wonder we are so far from happiness when philosophers do not condescend even to assist kings with their counsels."

"They are not so ungracious," Raphael replied, "but that they would gladly do it; in fact, they have already done it in a great many published books, if the rulers would only read their good advice. But doubtless Plato was right in foreseeing that unless kings became philosophical themselves, they would never take the advice of real philosophers, drenched as they are and infected with false values from boyhood on. Plato certainly had this experience with Dionysius of Syracuse. If I proposed wise laws to some king, and tried to root out of his soul the seeds of evil and corruption, don’t you suppose I would be either banished forthwith, or treated with scorn?"

"Imagine, if you will, that I am at the court of the king of France. Suppose out of the woods, and they tore the bad children to pieces: 2 Pangs 23—24.

I were sitting in his royal council, meeting in secret session, with the king himself presiding, and all the cleverest councillors were hard at work devising a set of crafty machinations by which the king might keep hold of Milan, recover Naples, which has proved so slippery; fifth then overthrow the Venetians and subdue all Italy; next add Flanders, Brabant, and the whole of Burgundy to his realm, besides some other nations he had in mind to invade. One man urges him to make an alliance with the Venetians for just as long as the king finds it convenient—perhaps to develop a common strategy with them, and even allow them some of the loot, which can be recovered later when things work out according to plan. While one recommends hiring German mercenaries, his neighbor proposes paying the Swiss to stay neutral. A fourth voice suggests soothing the Emperor’s wounded pride with a lavish and agreeable lotion of gold. Still another, who is of a different mind, thinks a settlement should be made with the lung of Aragon, and that, to cement the peace, he should be allowed to take Navarre from its proper ruler. Meanwhile, someone suggests snaring the prince of Castille into a marriage alliance—a first step would be to buy up some nobles of his court with secret pensions.

The hardest problem of all is what to do about England. They all agree that the alliance, which is weak at best, should be strengthened as much as possible; but while the English are being treated as friends, they should also be suspected as enemies. And so the Scots must be kept in constant readiness, poised to attack the English in case they stir ever so little. Also a banished nobleman with some pretensions to the English throne must be secretly encouraged (there are treaties against doing it openly), and in this way pressure can be brought to bear on the English Icing, and a ruler kept in check who can’t really be trusted.

‘Now in a meeting like this one, where so much is at stake, where so many brilliant men are competing to think up intricate strategies of war, what if an insignificant fellow like me were to get up and advise going on another tack entirely? Suppose I said the king should leave Italy alone and stay at home, because the single kingdom of France all by itself is almost too much for one man to govern, and the king should not dream of adding others to it? Then imagine I told about the decrees of the Achorians, who live off the island of Utopia toward the southeast. Long ago, these people went to war to gain another realm for their king, who had inherited an ancient claim to it through marriage. When they had conquered it, they soon saw that keeping it was going to be as hard as getting it had been. Their new subjects were continually rebelling or being attacked by foreign invaders, the Achorians had to be constantly at war for them or against them, and they saw no hope of ever being

VIII (d. 1498) or Louis XII (d. 1515). All three were would-be imperialists with hereditary claims to Milan and Naples, and all three bogged down in the intricacies of Italian political intrigue.
5. France gained Milan in 1499, lost it in 1512, and regained it at the battle of Marignano in September 1515. Naples was won in 1495, lost in 1496, won again in 1501, and lost again in 1504.

8. Navarre was a small independent enclave astride the Pyrenees, long disputed between Spain and France.
9. The future emperor Charles V was a great matrimonial and diplomatic catch. (Before he was twenty, he had been engaged ten different times.) The question of a French marriage that would unite the two greatest Continental and Catholic powers was continually in the air.

able to disband their army. In the meantime, they were being heavily taxed, money flowed out of their kingdom, their blood was being shed for the advantage of others, and peace was no closer than it had ever been. The war corrupted their own citizens by encouraging lust for robbery and murder; and the laws fell into contempt because their king, distracted with the cares of two kingdoms, could give neither one his proper attention.

When they saw that the list of these evils was endless, the Achorians took counsel together and very courteously offered their king his choice of keeping whichever of the two kingdoms he preferred, because he couldn’t rule them both. They were too numerous a people, they said, to be ruled by half a king; and they added that a man would not even hire a muledriver, if he had to divide his services with somebody else. The worthy king was thus obliged to be content with his own realm and give his new one to a friend, who before long was driven out.

"Finally, suppose I told the French king’s council that all this war-mongering, by which so many different nations were kept in turmoil as a result of one man’s connivings, would certainly exhaust his treasury and demoralize his people, and yet in the end come to nothing, through some mishap or other. And therefore he should look after his ancestral kingdom, improve it as much as he could, cultivate it in every conceivable way. He should love his people and be loved by them; he should live among them, govern them kindly, and let other kingdoms alone, since his own is big enough, if not too big, for him.

How do you think, my dear More, the other councillors would take this speech of mine?"

"Not very well, I’m sure," said I.

"Well, let’s go on," he said. "Suppose the councillors of some other king are discussing various schemes for raising money to fill his treasury. One man recommends increasing the value of money when the king pays his debts and devaluing it when he collects his revenues. Thus he can discharge a huge debt with a small payment, and collect a large sum when only a small one is due him. Another suggests a make-believe war, so that money can be raised under pretext of carrying it on; then, when the money is in, he can conclude a ceremonious peace treaty—which the deluded common people will attribute to the piety of their prince and his careful compassion for the lives of his subjects. Another councillor calls to mind some old moth-eaten laws, antiquated by long disuse, which no one remembers being made and consequently everyone has transgressed. By imposing fines for breaking these laws, the Icing will get great sums of money, as well as credit for upholding law and order, since the whole procedure can be made to look like justice. Another recommendation is that he forbid under particularly heavy fines a lot of practices that are contrary to the public interest; afterward, he can dispense with his own rules for large sums of money. Thus he pleases the people and makes a double profit, one from the heavy fines imposed on lawbreakers, and the other from selling dispensations. Meanwhile he seems careful of his people’s wel-

5. Both Henry VII and (after Utopia was written) Henry VIII fiddled with the English currency in ways like those suggested here.
6. Something like this happened in 1492, when King Henry VII not only pretended war with France on behalf of Brittany and levied taxes for the war (which was hardly fought), but collected a bribe from Charles VIII for not fighting it.

fare, since it is plain he will not allow private citizens to do anything contrary to the public interest, except for a huge price.

"Another councillor proposes that he work on the judges so that they will decide every case in favor of the king. They should be summoned to court often, and invited to debate his affairs in the royal presence. However unjust his claims, one or another of the judges, whether from love of contradiction, or desire to seem original, or simply to serve his own interest, will be bound to find some way of twisting the law in the king's favor. If the judges can be brought to differ, then the clearest matter in the world will be obscured, and the truth itself brought into question. The king is given leverage to interpret the law as he will, and everyone else will acquiesce from shame or fear. The judges will have no hesitations about supporting the royal interest, for there are always plenty of pretexts for giving judgment in favor of the king. Either equity is on his side, or the letter of the law happens to make for him, or the words of the law can be twisted into obscurity—or, if all else fails, he can appeal above the law to the royal prerogative, which is a never-failing argument with judges who know their 'duty.'

"Then all the councillors agree with the famous maxim of Crassus: a king can never have too much gold, because he must maintain an army. Further, that a king, even if he wants to, can do no wrong, for all property belongs to the king, and so do his subjects themselves; a man owns nothing but what the king, in his goodness, sees fit to leave him. The king should in fact leave his subjects as little as possible, because his own safety depends on keeping them from growing insolent with wealth and freedom. For riches and liberty make people less patient to endure harsh and unjust commands, whereas meager poverty blunts their spirits, makes them docile, and grinds out of the oppressed the lofty spirit of rebellion.

"Now at this point, suppose I were to get up again and declare that all these counsels are both dishonorable and ruinous to the king? Suppose I said his honor and his safety alike rest on the people's resources, rather than his own? Suppose I said that people choose a king for their own sake, not for his, so that by his efforts and troubles they may live in comfort and safety? This is why, I would say, it is the king's duty to take more care of his people's welfare than of his own, just as it is the duty of a shepherd who cares about his job to feed his sheep rather than himself."

"They are absolutely wrong when they say that the people's poverty safeguards public peace—experience shows the contrary. Where will you find more squabbling than among beggars? Who is more eager for revolution than the man who is most discontented with his present position? Who is more reckless about creating disorder than the man who knows he has nothing to lose and thinks he may have something to gain? If a king is so hated or despised by his subjects that he can rule them only by mistreatment, plundering, confiscation, and pauperization of his people, then he'd do much better to abdicate his throne—for under these circumstances, though he keeps the name of authority, he loses all the majesty of a king. A king has no dignity when he exercises authority over beggars, only when he rules over prosperous and happy subjects. This was certainly what that noble and lofty spirit Fabricius meant when he said he would rather be a ruler of rich men than be rich himself.1

8. Adapted from Cicero, On Moral Obligation I.8.25. Crassus was a rich Roman who joined with Pompey and Caesar to form the First Triumvirate (60 B.C.E.). A vindictive Parthian is said to have disproved his maxim by pouring molten gold down his throat.

"A solitary ruler who enjoys a life of pleasure and self-indulgence while all about him are grieving and groaning is acting like a jailer, not a king. Just as an incompetent doctor can cure his patient of one disease only by throwing him into another, so it's an incompetent king who can rule his people only by depriving them of all life's pleasures. Such a king openly confesses that he does not know how to rule free men.

"A king of this stamp should correct his own sloth or arrogance, because these are the vices that cause people to hate or despise him. Let him live on his own income without wronging others, and limit his spending to his income. Let him curb crime, and by wise training of his subjects, keep them from misbehavior, instead of letting it breed and then punishing it. Let him not suddenly revive antiquated laws, especially if they have been long forgotten and never missed. And let him never take money as a fine when a judge would regard an ordinary subject as a low fraud for claiming it.

"Suppose I should then describe for them the law of the Macarians,2 a people who also live not far from Utopia? On the day that their king first assumes office, he must take an oath confirmed by solemn ceremonies that he will never have in his treasury at any one time more than a thousand pounds of gold, or its equivalent in silver. They say this law was made by an excellent king, who cared more for his country's prosperity than for his own wealth; he established it as a barrier against any king heaping up so much money as to impoverish his people.3 He thought this sum would enable the king to put down rebellions or repel hostile invasions, but would not tempt him into aggressive adventures. His law was aimed chiefly at keeping the king in check, but he also wanted to ensure an ample supply of money for the daily business transactions of the citizens. Besides, a king who has to distribute all his excess money to the people will not be much disposed to oppress them. Such a king will be both a terror to evil-doers and beloved by the good.—Now, don't you suppose if I set ideas like these before men strongly inclined to the contrary, they would turn deaf ears to me?"

"Stone deaf, indeed, there's no doubt about it," I said, "and no wonder! To tell you the truth, I don't think you should offer advice or thrust on people ideas of this sort that you know will not be listened to. What good will it do? When your listeners are already prepossessed against you and firmly convinced of opposite opinions, how can you win over their minds with such out-of-the-way speeches? This academic philosophy is quite agreeable in the private conversation of close friends, but in the councils of kings, where grave matters are being authoritatively decided, there is no place for it.'

"That is just what I was saying," Raphael replied. 'There is no place for philosophy in the councils of kings.'

"Yes, there is," I said, "but not for this school philosophy which supposes that every topic is suitable for every occasion. There is another philosophy that is better suited for political action, that takes its cue, adapts itself to the drama in hand, and acts its part neatly and well. This is the philosophy for you to use. When a comedy of Plautus is being played, and the household slaves are cracking trivial jokes together, you propose to come on stage in the garb of a philosopher and repeat Seneca’s speech to Nero from the Octavia. Wouldn’t it be better to take a silent role than to say something wholly inappropriate, and thus turn the play into a tragicomedy? You pervert and ruin a play when you add irrelevant speeches, even if they are better than the original. So go through with the drama in hand as best you can, and don’t spoil it all simply because you happen to think another one would be better.

“That’s how things go in the commonwealth, and in the councils of princes. If you cannot pluck up bad ideas by the root, if you cannot cure long-standing evils as completely as you would like, you must not therefore abandon the commonwealth. Don’t give up the ship in a storm because you cannot direct the winds. And don’t arrogantly force strange ideas on people who you know have set their minds on a different course from yours. You must strive to influence policy indirectly, handle the situation tactfully, and thus what you cannot turn to good, you may at least make as little bad as possible. For it is impossible to make everything good unless you make all men good, and that I don’t expect to see for a long time to come.”

“The only result of this,” he answered, “will be that while I try to cure others of madness, I’ll be raving along with them myself. If I am to speak the truth, I will simply have to talk in the way I have described. For all I know, it may be the business of a philosopher to tell lies, but it isn’t mine. Though my advice may be repugnant and irksome to the king’s councillors, I don’t see why they should consider it eccentric to the point of folly. What if I told them the kind of thing that Plato advocates in his republic, or that the Utopians actually practice in theirs? However superior those institutions might be (and as a matter of fact they are), yet here they would seem inappropriate because private property is the rule here, and there all things are held in common.

“People who have made up their minds to rush headlong down the opposite road are never pleased with the man who calls them back and tells them they are on the wrong course. But, apart from that, what did I say that could not and should not be said anywhere and everywhere? If we dismiss as out of the question and absurd everything which the perverse customs of men have made to seem unusual, we shall have to set aside most of the commandments of Christ even in a community of Christians. Yet he forbade us to dissemble them, and even ordered that what he had whispered to his disciples should be preached openly from the housetops. Most of his teachings differ more radically from the common customs of mankind than my discourse did. But preachers, like the crafty fellows they are, have found that people would rather not change their lives to conform to Christ’s rule, and so, just as you suggest, they have accommodated his teaching to the way people live, as if it were a leaden yardstick. At least in that way they can get the two things to correspond

4. Most of the plays of the Roman comic dramatist Plautus (ca. 250–184 B.C.E.) involve low intrigue: needy young men, expensive prostitutes, senile moneybags, and clever slaves, in predictable combinations. The tragedy Octavia, involving Seneca as a character and long supposed to have been written by him, is full of high seriousness. In the speech More refers to (lines 440–592), Seneca lectures Nero on the abuses of power.
6. A flexible measuring rod of lead was particularly useful in the sort of ancient building style known as the “Lesbian” mode, because of the great number of curved moldings. Aristotle in Nicomachean Ethics 5.10.7 uses it as a metaphor for adaptable moral standards.
on one level or another. The only real thing they accomplish that I can see is to make people feel more secure about doing evil.

"And this is all that I could accomplish in a prince's court. For either I would have different ideas from the others, and that would come to the same thing as having no ideas at all, or else I would agree with them, and that, as Mitio says in Terence, would merely confirm them in their madness.7 When you say I should 'influence policy indirectly,' I simply don’t know what you mean; remember, you said I should try hard to handle the situation tactfully, and what can’t be made good I should try to make as little bad as possible. In a council, there is no way to dissemble, no way to shut your eyes to things.
You must openly approve the worst proposals, and consent to the most vicious decisions. A man who went along only halfheartedly even with the worst decisions would immediately get himself a name as a spy and perhaps a traitor.
How can one individual do any good when he is surrounded by colleagues who would sooner corrupt the best of men than do any reforming of themselves? Either they will seduce you, or, if you keep yourself honest and innocent, you will be made a screen for the knavery and madness of others.
Influencing policy indirectly! You wouldn’t have a chance.

"This is why Plato in a very fine comparison declares that wise men are right in keeping clear of public business.4 They see the people swarming through the streets and getting soaked with rain, and they cannot persuade them to go indoors and get out of the wet. They know if they go out themselves, they can do no good but only get drenched with the rest. So they stay indoors and are content to keep themselves dry, since they cannot remedy the folly of everyone else.

"But as a matter of fact, my dear More, to tell you what I really think, as long as you have private property, and as long as money is the measure of all things, it is really not possible for a nation to be governed justly or happily.
For justice cannot exist where all the best things in life are held by the worst citizens; nor can anyone be happy where property is limited to a few, since those few are always uneasy and the many are utterly wretched.

"So I reflect on the wonderfully wise and sacred institutions of the Utopians, who are so well governed with so few laws. Among them virtue has its reward, yet everything is shared equally, and everyone lives in plenty. I contrast them with the many other nations which are constantly passing new ordinances and yet can never order their affairs satisfactorily. In these other nations, whatever a man can get he calls his own private property; but all the mass of laws old and new don’t enable him to secure his own, or defend it, or even distinguish it from someone else's property. Different men lay claim, successively or all at once, to the same property; and thus arise innumerable and interminable lawsuits—fresh ones every day. When I consider all these things, I become more sympathetic to Plato and do not wonder that he declined to make laws for any people who refused to share their goods equally.4 Wisest of men, he easily perceived that the one and only road to the welfare of all lies through the absolute equality of goods. I doubt whether such equality can ever be achieved where property belongs to individuals. However abundant goods may be, when every man tries to get as much as he can for his own exclusive use, a handful of men end up sharing the whole thing, and the rest are left in poverty. The result generally is two sorts of people whose fortunes ought to be interchanged: the rich are rapacious, wicked, and useless, while the poor are unassuming, modest men who work hard, more for the benefit of the public than of themselves.

"Thus I am wholly convinced that unless private property is entirely done away with, there can be no fair or just distribution of goods, nor can the business of mortals be happily conducted. As long as private property remains, by far the largest and the best part of the human race will be oppressed by a heavy and inescapable burden of cares and anxieties. This load, I admit, may be lightened to some extent, but I maintain it cannot be entirely removed. Laws might be made that no one should own more than a certain amount of land or receive more than a certain income. Or laws might be passed to prevent the prince from becoming too powerful and the populace too unruly. It might be made unlawful for public offices to be solicited, or put up for sale, or made burdensome for the officeholder by great expense. Otherwise, officeholders are tempted to get their money back by fraud or extortion, and only rich men can afford to seek positions which ought to be held by the wise. Laws of this sort, I agree, may have as much effect as poultices continually applied to sick bodies that are past cure. The social evils I mentioned may be alleviated and their effects mitigated for a while, but so long as private property remains, there is no hope at all of effecting a cure and restoring society to good health. While you try to cure one part, you aggravate the disease in other parts. Suppressing one symptom causes another to break out, since you cannot give something to one person without taking it away from someone else."

"But I don't see it that way," I replied. "It seems to me that people cannot possibly live well where all things are in common. How can there be plenty of commodities where every man stops working? The hope of gain will not spur him on; he will rely on others, and become lazy. If a man is driven by want of something to produce it, and yet cannot legally protect what he has gained, what can follow but continual bloodshed and turmoil, especially when respect for magistrates and their authority has been lost? I for one cannot conceive of authority existing among men who are equal to one another in every respect."

"I'm not surprised," said Raphael, "that you think of it this way, since you have no idea, or only a false idea, of such a commonwealth. But you should have been with me in Utopia, and seen with your own eyes their manners and customs as I did—for I lived there more than five years, and would never have left, if it had not been to make that new world known to others. If you had seen them, you would frankly confess that you had never seen a people so well governed as they are."

"You will have a hard time persuading me," said Peter Giles, "that people in that new land are better governed than in the world we know. Our minds are not inferior to theirs, and our governments, I believe, are older. Long experience has helped us develop many conveniences of life, and by good luck we have discovered many other things which human ingenuity could never hit on."

"As for the relative ages of the governments," Raphael replied, "you might judge more accurately if you had read their histories. If we believe these records, they had cities before there were even people here. What ingenuity has discovered or chance hit upon could have turned up just as well in one place as the other. As a matter of fact, I believe we surpass them in natural intelligence, but they leave us far behind in their diligence and zeal to learn.

"According to their chronicles, they had heard nothing of ultra-equatorials (that's their name for us) until we arrived, except that once, some twelve hundred years ago, a ship which a storm had blown toward Utopia was wrecked on their island. Some Romans and Egyptians were cast ashore, and never departed. Now note how the Utopians profited, through their diligence, from this one chance event. They learned every single useful art of the Roman civilization either directly from their guests, or indirectly from hints and surmises on which they based their own investigations. What benefits from the mere fact that on a single occasion some Europeans landed there! If a similar accident has hitherto brought anyone here from their land, the incident has been completely forgotten, as it will be forgotten in time to come that I was ever in their country. From one such accident they made themselves masters of all our useful inventions, but I suspect it will be a long time before we accept any of their institutions, which are better than ours. This willingness to learn, I think, is the really important reason for their being better governed and living more happily than we do, though we are not inferior to them in brains or resources."

"Then let me implore you, my dear Raphael," said I, "to describe that island to us. Do not try to be brief, but explain in order everything relating to their land, their rivers, towns, people, manners, institutions, laws—everything, in short, that you think we would like to know. And you can take it for granted that we want to know everything that we don't know yet."

"There's nothing I'd rather do," he replied, "for these things are fresh in my mind. But it will take quite some time."

"In that case,' I said, 'let's first go to lunch. Afterward, we shall have all the time we want.'

'Agreed,' he said. So we went in and had lunch. Then we came back to the same spot, and sat down on the bench. I ordered my servants to take care that no one should interrupt us. Peter Giles and I urged Raphael to keep his promise. When he saw that we were eager to hear him, he sat silent and thoughtful a moment, and then began as follows.

Book 2

The island of the Utopians is two hundred miles across in the middle part, where it is widest, and is nowhere much narrower than this except toward the two ends. These ends, drawn toward one another as if in a five-hundred-mile circle, make the island crescent-shaped, like a new moon. Between the horns of the crescent, which are about eleven miles apart, the sea enters and spreads into a broad bay. Being sheltered from the wind by the surrounding land, the bay is never rough, but quiet and smooth instead, like a big lake. Thus nearly the whole inner coast is one great harbor, across which ships pass in every direction, to the great advantage of the people. What with shallows on one side and rocks on the other, the entrance into the bay is perilous. Near the middle of the channel, there is one rock that rises above the water, and so presents no danger in itself; on top of it a tower has been built, and there a garrison is kept. Since the other rocks lie under water, they are very dangerous to navigation. The channels are known only to the Utopians, so hardly any strangers enter the bay without one of their pilots; and even they themselves could not enter safely if they did not direct themselves by some landmarks on the coast. If these landmarks were shifted about, the Utopians could lure to destruction an enemy fleet coming against them, however big it was.

On the outer side of the island there are likewise occasional harbors; but the coast is rugged by nature, and so well fortified that a few defenders could beat off the attack of a strong force. They say (and the appearance of the place confirms this) that their land was not always an island. But Utopus, who conquered the country and gave it his name (it had previously been called Abraxa), and who brought its rude and uncouth inhabitants to such a high level of culture and humanity that they now excel in that regard almost every other people, also changed its geography. After winning the victory at his first landing, he cut a channel fifteen miles wide where their land joined the continent, and caused the sea to flow around the country. He put not only the natives to work at this task, but all his own soldiers too, so that the vanquished would not think the labor a disgrace. With the work divided among so many hands, the project was finished quickly, and the neighboring peoples, who at first had laughed at his folly, were struck with wonder and terror at his success.

There are fifty-four cities on the island, all spacious and magnificent, identical in language, customs, institutions, and laws. So far as the location permits, all of them are built on the same plan, and have the same appearance. The nearest are at least twenty-four miles apart, and the farthest are not so remote that a person cannot go on foot from one to the other in a day. Once a year each city sends three of its old and experienced citizens to Amaurot to consider affairs of common interest to the island. Amaurot lies at the navel of the land, so to speak, and is convenient to every other district, so it acts as a capital. Every city has enough ground assigned to it so that at least twelve miles of farm land are available in every direction, though where the cities are farther apart, they have much more land. No city wants to enlarge its boundaries, for the inhabitants consider themselves good tenants rather than landlords. At proper intervals all over the countryside they have built houses and furnished them with farm equipment. These houses are inhabited by citizens who come to the country by turns to occupy them. No rural house has fewer than forty men and women in it, besides two slaves. A master and mistress, serious and mature persons, are in charge of each household. Over every thirty households is placed a single phylarch. Each year twenty persons from each rural household move back to the city, after completing a two-year stint in the country. In their place, twenty others are sent out from town, to learn farm work from those who have already been in the country for a year, and who are better skilled in farming. They, in turn, will teach those who come the following year. If all were equally unskilled in farm work, and new to it, they might harm the crops out of ignorance. This custom of alternating farm workers is solemnly established so that no one will have to do such hard work unwillingly for more than two years; but many of them, who take a natural pleasure in farm life, are allowed to stay longer.

The farm workers till the soil, feed the animals, hew wood, and take it to the city by land or by water, as is more convenient. They breed an enormous number of chickens by a marvelous method. The farmers, not hens, hatch the eggs by keeping them in a warm place at an even temperature. As soon as they come out of the shell, the chicks recognize the humans, follow them around, and are devoted to them instead of to their mothers.

2. The Greek Gnostic Basilides (2nd century C.E.) postulated 365 heavens, and gave the name "Abraxas" to the highest of them. The Greek letters that constitute the word have numerical equivalents summing to 365, but what the word "Abraxas" actually means, nobody knows.
3. Each consisting of a central metropolis and the surrounding countryside, the loosely federated Utopian cities recall the ancient Greek city-states.
4. From Greek phylarchos, ruler of a tribe.
They raise very few horses, and these full of mettle, which they keep only to exercise the young people in the art of horsemanship. For the heavy work of plowing and hauling they use oxen, which they agree are inferior to horses over the short haul, but which can hold out longer under heavy burdens, are less subject to disease (as they suppose), and so can be kept with less cost and trouble. Moreover, when oxen are too old for work, they can be used for meat. Grain they use only to make bread. They drink wine, apple or pear cider, or simple water, which they sometimes mix with honey or licorice, of which they have an abundance. Although they know very well, down to the last detail, how much grain each city and its surrounding district will consume, they produce much more grain and cattle than they need for themselves, and share the surplus with their neighbors. Whatever goods the folk in the country need which cannot be produced there, they request of the town magistrates, and since there is nothing to be paid or exchanged, they get what they want at once, without any haggling. They generally go to town once a month in any case, to observe the holy days. When harvest time approaches, the phylarchs in the country notify the town magistrates how many hands will be needed. Crews of harvesters come just when they're wanted, and in one day of good weather they can usually get in the whole crop.

THEIR CITIES, ESPECIALLY AMAUROT

If you know one of their cities, you know them all, for they're exactly alike, except where geography itself makes a difference. So I'll describe one of them, and no matter which. But what one rather than Amaurot, the most worthy of all:—since its eminence is acknowledged by the other cities which send representatives to the annual meeting there; besides which, I know it best, because I lived there for five full years.

Well, then, Amaurot lies up against a gently sloping hill; the town is almost square in shape. From a little below the crest of the hill, it runs down about two miles to the river Anyder, and then spreads out along the river bank for a somewhat greater distance. The Anyder rises from a small spring about eighty miles above Amaurot, but other streams flow into it, two of them being pretty big, so that, as it runs past Amaurot, the river has grown to five hundred yards. It continues to grow even larger until at last, sixty miles farther along, it is lost in the ocean. In all this stretch between the sea and the city, and also for some miles above the city, the river is tidal, ebbing and flowing every six hours with a swift current. When the tide comes in, it fills the whole Anyder with salt water for about thirty miles, driving the fresh water back. Even above that for several miles farther, the water is brackish; but a little higher up, as it runs past the city, the water is always fresh, and when the tide ebbs, the water runs clean and sweet all the way to the sea.

The two banks of the river at Amaurot are linked by a bridge, built not on wooden piles but on remarkable stone arches. It is placed at the upper end of the city, farthest removed from the sea, so that ships can sail along the entire length of the city quays without obstruction. There is also another stream, not particularly large, but very gentle and pleasant, which rises out of the hill,

5. In fact, horses did not exist in the New World until Europeans imported them.
6. I.e., they don't, like the English, use it to make beer and ale.
7. Many of the details of Amaurot—its situation on a tidal river, its stone bridge (below), though not the location of that bridge—are reminiscent of London.
flows down through the center of town, and into the Anyder. The inhabitants have walled around the source of this river, which takes its rise a little outside the town, and joined it to the town proper so that if they should be attacked, the enemy would not be able to cut off the stream or divert or poison it. Water from the stream is carried by tile piping into various sections of the lower town. Where the terrain makes this impractical, they collect rain water in cisterns, which serve just as well.

The town is surrounded by a thick, high wall, with many towers and bastions. On three sides it is also surrounded by a dry ditch, broad and deep and filled with thorn hedges; on its fourth side the river itself serves as a moat. The streets are conveniently laid out for use by vehicles and for protection from the wind. Their buildings are by no means paltry; the unbroken rows of houses facing each other across the streets through the different wards make a fine sight. The streets are twenty feet wide. Behind each row of houses—at the center of every block and extending the full length of the street—there are large gardens.

Every house has a door to the street and another to the garden. The doors, which are made with two leaves, open easily and swing shut automatically, letting anyone enter who wants to—and so there is no private property. Every ten years, they change houses by lot. The Utopians are very fond of these gardens of theirs. They raise vines, fruits, herbs, and flowers, so well cared for and flourishing that I have never seen any gardens more productive or elegant than theirs. They keep interested in gardening, partly because they delight in it, and also because of the competition between different streets, which challenge one another to produce the best gardens. Certainly you will find nothing else in the whole city more useful or more pleasant to the citizens. And this gives reason to think that the founder of the city paid particular attention to the siting of these gardens.

They say that in the beginning the whole city was planned by King Utopus himself, but that he left to posterity matters of adornment and improvement such as could not be perfected in one man's lifetime. Their records begin 1,760 years ago with the conquest of the island, and are carefully preserved in writing. From these records it appears that the first houses were low, like cabins or peasant huts, built out of any sort of timber, with mud-plastered walls and steep roofs, ridged and thatched with straw. But now their houses are all three stories high and handsomely constructed; the fronts are faced with stone, stucco, or brick, over rubble construction. The roofs are flat, and are covered with a kind of plaster that is cheap but fireproof, and more weather-resistant even than lead. Glass is very generally used in windows to keep out the weather; and they also use thin linen cloth treated with oil or gum so that it lets in more light and keeps out more wind.

Once a year, every group of thirty households elects an official, formerly called the syphogrant, but now called the phylarch. Over every group of ten syphogrants with their households there is another official, once called the tranibor but now known as the head phylarch. All the syphogrants, two hun-

9. During More's day in England window glass was not common; oiled cloth and lattices of wicker or wood were more frequent.
1. "Syphogrant" appears to be constructed from Greek sophos ("wise")—or perhaps syphos ("of the sty")—plus gerontes ("old men"). For "tranibor" (below), the etymology seems to be tranos or tranis ("clear, "plain," "distinct") plus boros ("devouring," "gluttonous"). There is no explanation of why Hythloday consistently uses the "older" form of the titles.
dred in number, are brought together to elect the governor. They take an oath to choose the man they think best qualified; and then by secret ballot they elect the governor from among four men nominated by the people of the four sections of the city. The governor holds office for life, unless he is suspected of aiming at a tyranny. Though the tranibors are elected annually, they are not changed for light or casual reasons. All their other officials hold office for a single year only.

The tranibors meet to consult with the prince every other day, and more often if necessary: they discuss affairs of state, and settle the occasional disputes between private parties (if there are any, and there are in any case very few), acting as quickly as possible. The tranibors always invite two syphogrants to the senate chamber, different ones every day. There is a rule that no decision can be made on a matter of public business unless it has been discussed in the senate on three separate days. It is a capital offense to make plans about public business outside of the senate or the popular assembly. The purpose of these rules, they say, is to prevent the governor and the tranibors from conspiring together to alter the government and enslave the people. Therefore all matters which are considered important are first laid before the popular assemby of the syphogrants. They talk the matter over with the households they represent, debate it with one another, then report their recommendation to the senate. Sometimes the question is brought before the general council of the whole island.

The senate has a standing rule never to discuss a matter on the same day when it was first introduced; all new business is deferred to the next meeting.
They do this so that a man will not blurt out the first thought that occurs to him, and then devote all his energies to defending those foolish impulses, instead of considering impartially the public good. They know that some men would rather jeopardize the general welfare than admit to having been heedless and shortsighted—so perverse and preposterous is their sense of pride. They should have had enough foresight at the beginning to speak with prudence rather than haste.

THEIR OCCUPATIONS

Agriculture is the one occupation at which everyone works, men and women alike, with no exceptions. They are trained in it from childhood, partly in the schools, where they learn theory, and partly through field trips to nearby farms, which make something like a game of practical instruction. On these trips they not only watch the work being done, but frequently pitch in and get a workout by doing the jobs themselves.

Besides farm work (which, as I said, everybody performs), each person is taught a particular trade of his own, such as wool-working, linen-making, masonry, metal-work, or carpentry. There is no other craft that is practiced by any considerable number of them. ² Throughout the island people wear, and down through the centuries they have always worn, the same style of clothing, except for the distinction between the sexes, and between married and unmar-rried persons. Their clothing is attractive, does not hamper bodily movement, and serves for warm as well as cold weather; what is more, each household can make its own.

² One would have thought that considerable numbers would also have been employed making such things as pottery, harness, bread, and books, and in mining and the merchant marine.
Every person (and this includes women as well as men) learns a second trade, besides agriculture. As the weaker sex, women practice the lighter crafts, such as working in wool or linen; the heavier jobs are assigned to the men. As a rule, the son is trained to his father’s craft, for which most feel a natural inclination. But if anyone is attracted to another occupation, he is transferred by adoption into a family practicing the trade he prefers. When anyone makes such a change, both his father and the authorities make sure that he is assigned to a grave and responsible householder. After someone has learned one trade, if he wants to learn another, he gets the same permission. When he has learned both, he pursues whichever he likes better, unless the city needs one more than the other.

The chief and almost the only business of the syphogrants is to manage matters so that no one sits around in idleness, and assure that everyone works hard at his trade. But no one has to exhaust himself with endless toil from early morning to late at night, as if he were a beast of burden. Such wretchedness, really worse than slavery, is the common lot of workmen almost everywhere except Utopia. Of the day’s twenty-four hours, the Utopians devote only six to work. They work three hours before noon, when they go to lunch. After lunch they rest for a couple of hours, then go to work for another three hours. Then they have supper, and at eight o’clock (counting the first hour after noon as one), they go to bed and sleep eight hours.

The other hours of the day, when they are not working, eating, or sleeping, are left to each person’s individual discretion, provided that free time is not wasted in roistering or sloth, but used properly in some chosen occupation. Generally these periods are devoted to intellectual activity. For they have an established custom of giving public lectures before daybreak; attendance at these lectures is required only of those who have been specially chosen to devote themselves to learning, but a great many other people, both men and women, choose voluntarily to attend. Depending on their interests, some go to one lecture, some to another. But if anyone would rather devote his spare time to his trade, as many do who don’t care for the intellectual life, this is not discouraged; in fact, such persons are commended as especially useful to the commonwealth.

After supper, they devote an hour to recreation, in their gardens when the weather is fine, or during winter weather in the common halls where they have their meals. There they either play music or amuse themselves with conversation. They know nothing about gambling with dice, or other such foolish and ruinous games. They do play two games not unlike our own chess. One is a battle of numbers, in which one number captures another. The other is a game in which the vices fight a battle against the virtues. The game is set up to show how the vices oppose one another, yet readily combine against the virtues; then, what vices oppose what virtues, how they try to assault them openly or undermine them insidiously; how the virtues can break the strength of the vices or turn their purposes to good; and finally, by what means one side or the other gains the victory.

But in all this, you may get a wrong impression, if we don’t go back and consider one point more carefully. Because they allot only six hours to work, you might think the necessities of life would be in scant supply. This is far

3. Renaissance universities got under way early: first lecture was between five and seven A.M. 4. Moral games of this general character were popular with Renaissance educators.
Their working hours are ample to provide not only enough but more than enough of the necessities and even the conveniences of life. You will easily appreciate this if you consider how large a part of the population in other countries exists without doing any work at all. In the first place, hardly any of the women, who are a full half of the population, work; or, if they do, then as a rule their husbands lie snoring in bed. Then there is a great lazy gang of priests and so-called religious. Add to them all the rich, especially the landlords, who are commonly called gentlemen and nobility. Include with them their retainers, that mob of swaggering bullies. Finally, reckon in with these the sturdy and lusty beggars, who go about feigning some disease as an excuse for their idleness. You will certainly find that the things which satisfy our needs are produced by far fewer hands than you had supposed.

And now consider how few of those who do work are doing really essential things. For where money is the standard of everything, many vain, superfluous trades are bound to be carried on simply to satisfy luxury and licentiousness. Suppose the multitude of those who now work were limited to a few trades, and set to producing just those conveniences and commodities that nature really requires. They would be bound to produce so much that the prices would drop, and the workmen would be unable to gain a living. But suppose again that all the workers in useless trades were put to useful ones, and that all the idlers (who now guzzle twice as much as the workingmen who make what they consume) were assigned to productive tasks—well, you can easily see how little time would be enough and more than enough to produce all the goods that human needs and conveniences require—yes, and human pleasure too, as long as it’s true and natural pleasure.

The experience of Utopia makes this perfectly apparent. In each city and its surrounding countryside barely five hundred of those men and women whose age and strength make them fit for work are exempted from it. Among these are the syphogrants, who by law are free not to work; yet they don’t take advantage of the privilege, preferring to set a good example to their fellow-citizens. Some others are permanently exempted from work so that they may devote themselves to study, but only on the recommendation of the priests and through a secret vote of the syphogrants. If any of these scholars disappoints their hopes, he becomes a workman again. On the other hand, it happens from time to time that a craftsman devotes his leisure so earnestly to study, and makes such progress as a result, that he is relieved of manual labor, and promoted to the class of learned men. From this class of scholars are chosen ambassadors, priests, tranibors, and the governor himself, who used to be called Barzanes, but in their modern tongue is known as Ademus. Since all the rest of the population is neither idle nor occupied in useless trades, it is easy to see why they produce so much in so short a working day.

Apart from all this, in several of the necessary crafts their way of life requires less total labor than does that of people elsewhere. In other countries, building and repairing houses requires the constant work of many men, because what

5. A strange statement, in view of the fact that women had the same, or heavier, domestic duties in the 16th century as in the 21st. In Utopia, they are responsible for at least some of these duties—cooking, childcare—in addition to practicing a craft and taking their turn at farm work.
6. I.e., members of the various religious orders.
7. Two hundred of these are syphogrants; presumably the governor, the twenty tranibors, and the thirteen priests (below, p. 563) are also exempt. The rest must be scholars (below), and the ambassadors drawn from their ranks.
a father has built, his thriftless heir lets fall into ruin; and then his successor has to repair, at great expense, what could easily have been maintained at a very small charge. Further, even when a man has built a splendid house at vast cost, someone else may think he has finer taste, let the first house fall to ruin, and then build another one somewhere else for just as much money. But among the Utopians, where everything has been well ordered, and the commonwealth properly established, building a brand-new home on a new site is a rare event. They are not only quick to repair damage, but foresighted in preventing it. The result is that their buildings last for a very long time with minimal repairs; and the carpenters and masons sometimes have so little to do that they are set to hewing timber and cutting stone in case some future need for it should arise.

Consider, too, how little labor their clothing requires. Their work clothes are loose garments made of leather which last as long as seven years. When they go out in public, they cover these rough working-clothes with a cloak. Throughout the entire island, these cloaks are of the same color, which is that of natural wool. As a result, they not only need less wool than people in other countries, but what they do need is less expensive. They use linen cloth most, because it requires least labor. They like linen cloth to be white and wool cloth to be clean; but they put no price on fineness of texture. Elsewhere a man is not satisfied with four or five woolen cloaks of different colors and as many silk shirts, or if he’s a clothes-horse, even ten of each are not enough. But a Utopian is content with a single cloak, and generally wears it for two years. There is no reason at all why he should want any others, for if he had them, he would not be better protected against the cold, nor would he appear in any way better dressed.

When there is an abundance of everything, as a result of everyone working at useful trades and nobody consuming to excess, then great numbers of the people often go out to work on the roads, if any of them need repairing. And when there is no need even for this sort of public work, then the officials very often proclaim a shorter work day, since they never force their citizens to perform useless labor. The chief aim of their constitution is that, whenever public needs permit, all citizens should be free, so far as possible, to withdraw their time and energy from the service of the body and devote themselves to the freedom and culture of the mind. For in that, they think, is the real happiness of life.

SOCIAL RELATIONS

Now I must explain the social relations of these folk, the way the citizens behave toward one another, and how they distribute their goods within the society.

Each city, then, consists of households, the households consisting generally of blood-relations. When the women grow up and are married, they move into their husbands’ households. On the other hand, male children and after them grandchildren remain in the family, and are subject to the oldest member, unless his mind has started to fail, in which case the next oldest takes his place. To keep the cities from becoming too large or too small, they have decreed that there shall be no more than six thousand households in each (exclusive of the surrounding countryside), each family containing between ten and sixteen adults. They do not, of course, try to regulate the number of minor children in a family. The limit on adults is easily observed by transferring individuals from a household with too many into a household with not enough. Likewise if a city has too many people, the extra persons serve to make up a shortage of population in other cities. And if the population throughout the entire island exceeds the quota, then they enroll citizens out of every city and plant a colony under their own laws on the mainland near them, wherever the natives have plenty of unoccupied and uncultivated land. Those natives who want to live with the Utopian settlers are taken in. When such a merger occurs, the two peoples gradually and easily blend together, sharing the same way of life and customs, much to the advantage of both. For by their policies the Utopians make the land yield an abundance for all, though previously it had seemed too barren and paltry even to support the natives. But if the natives will not join in living under their laws, the Utopians drive them out of the land they claim for themselves, and if they resist make war on them. The Utopians say it's perfectly justifiable to make war on people who leave their land idle and waste, yet forbid the use of it to others who, by the law of nature, ought to be supported from it.

If for any reason one of their cities shrinks so sharply in population that it cannot be made up from other cities without bringing them too under proper strength, then the population is restored by bringing people back from the colonies. This has happened only twice, they say, in their whole history, both times as a result of a frightful plague. They would rather that their colonies dwindled away than that any of the cities on their island should get too small.

But to return to their manner of living. The oldest of every household, as I said, is the ruler. Wives are subject to their husbands, children to their parents, and generally the younger to their elders. Every city is divided into four equal districts, and in the middle of each district is a market for all kinds of commodities. Whatever each household produces is brought here and stored in warehouses, each kind of goods in its own place. Here the head of each household looks for what he or his family needs, and carries off what he wants without any sort of payment or compensation. Why should anything be refused him? There is plenty of everything, and no reason to fear that anyone will claim more than he needs. Why would anyone be suspected of asking for more than is needed, when everyone knows there will never be any shortage? Fear of want, no doubt, makes every living creature greedy and avaricious—and, in addition, man develops these qualities out of sheer pride, pride which glories in getting ahead of others by a superfluous display of possessions. But this kind of vice has no place whatever in the Utopian way of life.

Next to the marketplace of which I just spoke are the food markets, where people bring all sorts of vegetables, fruit, and bread. Fish, meat, and poultry are also brought there from designated places outside the city, where running water can carry away all the blood and refuse. Slaves do the slaughtering and cleaning in these places: citizens are not allowed to do such work. The Utopians feel that slaughtering our fellow creatures gradually destroys the sense of compassion, which is the finest sentiment of which our human nature is capable. Besides, they don’t allow anything dirty or filthy to be brought into the city, lest the air become tainted by putrefaction and thus infectious.

Each ward has its own spacious halls, equally distant from one another, and each known by a special name. In these halls live the syphogrants. Thirty families are assigned to each hall, to take their meals in common—fifteen live on one side of the hall, fifteen on the other. The stewards of each hall meet at a fixed time in the market and get food according to the number of persons for whom each is responsible.

In distributing food, first consideration goes to the sick, who are cared for in public hospitals. Every city has four of these, built at the city limits, slightly outside the walls, and spacious enough to appear like little towns. The hospitals are large for two reasons: so that the sick, however numerous they may be, will not be packed closely and uncomfortably together, and also so that those who have a contagious disease, such as might pass from one to the other, may be isolated. The hospitals are well ordered and supplied with everything needed to cure the patients, who are nursed with tender and watchful care. Highly skilled physicians are in constant attendance. Consequently, though nobody is sent there against his will, there is hardly anyone in the city who would not rather be treated for an illness at the hospital than at home.

When the hospital steward has received the food prescribed for the sick by their doctors, the rest is fairly divided among the halls according to the number in each, except that special regard is paid to the governor, the high priest, and the tranibors, as well as to ambassadors and foreigners, if there are any. In fact, foreigners are very few; but when they do come, they have certain furnished houses assigned to them.

At the hours of lunch and supper, a brazen trumpet summons the entire syphogranty to assemble in their hall, except for those who are bedridden in the hospitals or at home. After the halls have been served with their quotas of food, nothing prevents an individual from taking food home from the marketplace. They realize that no one would do this without good reason. For while it is not forbidden to eat at home, no one does it willingly, because it is not thought proper; and besides, it would be stupid to take the trouble of preparing a worse meal at home when there is an elegant and sumptuous one near at hand in the hall.

In the syphogrant’s hall, slaves do all the particularly dirty and heavy work. But planning the meal, as well as preparing and cooking the food, is carried out by the women alone, with each family taking its turn. Depending on their number, they sit down at three or more tables. The men sit with their backs to the wall, the women on the outside, so that if a woman has a sudden qualm or pain, such as occasionally happens during pregnancy, she may get up without disturbing the others and go off to the nurses. A separate dining room is assigned to the nurses and infants, with a plentiful supply of cradles, clean water, and a warm fire. Thus the nurses may lay the infants down, change them, dress them, and let them play before the fire. Each child is nursed by its own mother, unless death or illness prevents. When that happens, the wife of the syphogrant quickly finds a suitable nurse. The problem is not difficult. Any woman who can gladly volunteers for the job, since all the Utopians

1. The institution of the common messes has precedents in ancient Sparta, and in the designs for an ideal commonwealth by Plato (Republic 3.416E) and Aristotle (Politics 7.10.10). It has also been a feature of other communities with a utopian bent, e.g., the Israeli kibbutzim.
applaud her kindness, and the child itself regards its new nurse as its natural mother.

Children under the age of five sit together in the nursery. All other minors, both boys and girls up to the age of marriage, either wait on table, or, if not old and strong enough for that, stand by in absolute silence. They eat whatever is handed to them by those sitting at the table, and have no other set time for their meals.

The syphogrant with his wife sits in the middle of the first table, at the highest part of the dining hall. This is the place of greatest honor, and from this table, which is placed crosswise to the other tables, the whole gathering can be seen. Two of the eldest sit with them, for they always sit in groups of four; if there is a church in the district, the priest and his wife sit with the syphogrant, and preside with him. On both sides of them sit younger people, next to them older people again, and so through the hall those of about the same age sit together, yet are mingled with others of a different age. The reason for this, as they explain it, is that the dignity of the aged, and the respect due them, may restrain the younger people from improper freedom of words and gestures, since nothing said or done at table can pass unnoticed by the old, who are present on every side.

Dishes of food are not served down the tables in order from top to bottom, but all the old persons, who are seated in conspicuous places, are served with the best food; and then equal shares are given to the rest. The old people, as they feel inclined, give their neighbors a share of those delicacies which are not plentiful enough to be served to everyone. Thus due respect is paid to seniority, but everyone enjoys some of the benefits.

They begin every lunch and supper with some reading on a moral topic, but keep it brief lest it become a bore. Taking that as an occasion, the elders introduce topics of conversation, which they try not to make gloomy or dull. They never monopolize the conversation with long monologues, but are ready to hear what the young people say. In fact, they deliberately draw them out in order to discover the natural temper and quality of each one's mind, as revealed in the freedom of mealtime talk.

Their lunches are light, their suppers rather more elaborate, because lunch is followed by work, supper by rest and a night's sleep, which they think particularly helpful to good digestion. Never a meal passes without music, and the dessert course is never scanted; during the meal, they burn incense and scatter perfume, omitting nothing which will make the occasion festive. For they are somewhat inclined to think that no kind of pleasure is forbidden, provided harm does not come of it.

This is the ordinary pattern of life in the city; but in the country, where they are farther removed from neighbors, they all eat in their own homes. No family lacks for food, since, after all, whatever the city-dwellers eat comes originally from those in the country.

The Travels of the Utopians

Any individuals who want to visit friends living in another city, or simply to see the place itself, can easily obtain permission from syphogrants and 2. Humanists were fond of this social custom, the origins of which were part monastic, part classical. 3. In fact this long section covers more than travel: the Utopians' trade; their treatment of gold and silver; their philosophy.
tranibors, unless for some special occasion they are needed at home. They travel together in groups, taking a letter from the governor granting leave to travel and fixing a day of return. They are given a wagon and a public slave to drive the oxen and look after them, but unless women are in the company they usually dispense with the wagon as an unnecessary bother. Wherever they go, though they take nothing with them, they never lack for anything, because they are at home everywhere. If they stay more than a day in one place, each one practices his trade there in the shop of the local artisans, by whom he is kindly received.

Anyone who takes upon himself to leave his district without permission, and is caught without the governor’s letter, is treated with contempt, brought back as a runaway, and severely punished. If he is bold enough to try it a second time, he is made a slave. Anyone who wants to stroll about and explore the extent of his own district is not prevented, provided he first obtains his father’s permission and his spouse’s consent. But wherever he goes in the countryside, he gets no food until he has completed either a morning’s or an afternoon’s stint of work. On these terms, he may go where he pleases within his own district, yet be just as useful to the community as if he were at home.

So you see there is no chance to loaf or kill time, no pretext for evading work; no taverns, or alehouses, or brothels; no chances for corruption; no hiding places; no spots for secret meetings. Because they live in the full view of all, they are bound to be either working at their usual trades or enjoying their leisure in a respectable way. Such customs must necessarily result in plenty of life’s good things, and since they share everything equally, it follows that no one can ever be reduced to poverty or forced to beg.

In the annual gathering at Amaurot (to which, as I said before, three representatives come from each city), they survey the island to find out where there are shortages and surpluses, and promptly satisfy one district’s shortage with another’s surplus. These are outright gifts; those who give receive nothing in return from those to whom they give. Though they give freely to one city, they get freely from another to which they gave nothing; and thus the whole island is like a single family.

After they have accumulated enough for themselves—and this they consider to be a full two-years’ store, because next year’s crop is always uncertain—then they export their surpluses to other countries. They sell abroad great quantities of grain, honey, wool, flax, timber, scarlet and purple dye-stuffs, hides, wax, tallow, and leather, as well as livestock. One-seventh of their cargo they give freely to the poor of the importing country, and the rest they sell at moderate prices. In exchange they receive not only such goods as they lack at home (in fact, the one important thing they lack is iron) but immense quantities of silver and gold. They have been carrying on trade for a long time now, and have accumulated a greater supply of the precious metals than you would believe possible. As a result, they now care very little whether they sell for cash or credit, and most payments to them actually take the form of promissory notes. However, in all such transactions, they never trust individuals but insist that the foreign city become officially responsible. When the day of payment comes, the city collects the money due from private debtors, puts it into the treasury, and enjoys the use of it till the Utopians claim payment. Most of it, in fact, is never claimed. The Utopians think it hardly right to take what they don’t need away from people who do need it. But if they want to lend the money to some other nation, then they call it in—as they do also when they must wage war. This is the only reason that they keep such an immense treasure at home, as a protection against extreme peril or sudden emergency. They use it above all to hire, at extravagant rates of pay, foreign mercenaries, whom they would much rather risk in battle than their own citizens. They know very well that for large enough sums of money many of the enemy's soldiers can themselves be bought off or set at odds with one another, either secretly or openly.

For this reason, therefore, they have accumulated a vast treasure; but they do not keep it like a treasure. I'm really quite ashamed to tell you how they do keep it, because you probably won't believe me. I would not have believed it myself if someone had just told me about it; but I was there, and saw it with my own eyes. It is a general rule that the more different anything is from what people are used to, the harder it is to accept. But, considering that all their other customs are so unlike ours, a sensible judge will perhaps not be surprised that they treat gold and silver quite differently from the way we do. After all, they never do use money among themselves, but keep it only for a contingency which may or may not actually arise. So in the meanwhile they take care that no one shall overvalue gold and silver, of which money is made, beyond what the metals themselves deserve. Anyone can see, for example, that iron is far superior to either; men could not live without iron, by heaven, any more than without fire or water. But Nature granted to gold and silver no function with which we cannot easily dispense. Human folly has made them precious because they are rare. Like a most wise and generous mother, Nature has placed the best things out in the open, like air, water, and the earth itself; but she has hidden away in remote places all vain and unprofitable things.

If in Utopia gold and silver were kept locked up in some tower, foolish heads among the common people might well concoct a story that the governor and the senate were out to cheat ordinary folk and get some advantage for themselves. They might indeed put the gold and silver into beautiful plate-ware and rich handiwork, but then in case of necessity the people would not want to give up such articles, on which they had begun to fix their hearts, only to melt them down for soldiers' pay. To avoid all these inconveniences, they thought of a plan which conforms with their institutions as clearly as it contrasts with our own. Unless one has actually seen it working, their plan may seem incredible, because we prize gold so highly and are so careful about protecting it. With them it's just the other way. While they eat from pottery dishes and drink from glass cups, well made but inexpensive, their chamber pots and all their humblest vessels, for use in the common halls and even in private homes, are made of gold and silver. The chains and heavy fetters of slaves are also made of these metals. Finally, criminals who are to bear through life the mark of some disgraceful act are forced to wear golden rings on their ears, golden bands on their fingers, golden chains around their necks, and even golden crowns on their heads. Thus they hold gold and silver up to scorn in every conceivable way. As a result, when they have to part with these metals, which other nations give up with as much agony as if they were being disemboweled, the Utopians feel it no more than the loss of a penny.

They pick up pearls by the seashore, diamonds and garnets in certain cliffs, but never go out of set purpose to look for them. If they happen to find some, they polish them, and give them to the children, who, when they are small, feel proud and pleased with such gaudy decorations. But after, when they grow a bit older, and notice that only babies like such toys, they lay them aside.
Their parents don’t have to say anything; the children simply put these trifles away out of a shamefaced sense that they’re no longer suitable, just as our children when they grow up put away their rattles, marbles, and dolls.

Different customs, different feelings: I never saw the adage better illustrated than in the case of the Anemolian ambassadors, who came to Amaurot while I was there. Because they came to discuss important business, the senate had assembled ahead of time, three citizens from each city. The ambassadors from nearby nations, who had visited Utopia before and knew something of their customs, realized that fine clothing was not much respected in that land, silk was despised, and gold was a badge of contempt; and therefore they came in the very plainest of their clothes. But the Anemolians, who lived farther off and had had fewer dealings with the Utopians, had heard only that they all dressed alike, and very simply; so they took for granted that their hosts had nothing to wear that they didn’t put on. Being themselves rather more proud than wise, they decided to dress as resplendently as the very gods, and dazzle the eyes of the poor Utopians by the glitter of their garb.

Consequently the three ambassadors made a grand entry with a suite of a hundred attendants, all in clothing of many colors, and most in silk. Being noblemen at home, the ambassadors were arrayed in cloth of gold, with heavy gold chains on their necks, gold rings on their ears and fingers, and sparkling strings of pearls and gems on their caps. In fact, they were decked out in all the articles which in Utopia are used to punish slaves, shame wrongdoers, or pacify infants. It was a sight to see how they strutted when they compared their finery with the dress of the Utopians, who had poured out into the street to see them pass. But it was just as funny to see how wide they fell of the mark, and how far they were from getting the consideration they wanted and expected. Except for a very few Utopians who for some special reason had visited foreign countries, all the onlookers considered this pomp and splendor a mark of disgrace. They therefore bowed to the humblest servants as lords, and took the ambassadors, because of their golden chains, to be slaves, passing them by without any reverence at all. You might have seen children, who had themselves thrown away their pearls and gems, nudge their mothers when they saw the ambassadors’ jeweled caps, and say:

"Look at that big lummox, mother, who’s still wearing pearls and jewels as if he were a little boy!"

But the mother, in all seriousness, would answer:

"Hush, son, I think he is one of the ambassador’s fools."

Others found fault with the golden chains as useless, because they were so flimsy any slave could break them, and so loose that he could easily shake them off and run away whenever he wanted. But after the ambassadors had spent a couple of days among the Utopians, they learned of the immense amounts of gold which were as thoroughly despised there as they were prized at home. They saw too that more gold and silver went into making the chains and fetters of a single runaway slave than into costuming all three of them. Somewhat crestfallen, then, they put away all the finery in which they had strutted so arrogantly; but they saw the wisdom of doing so after they had talked with the Utopians enough to learn their customs and opinions.

4. From Greek anemolios, “windy.” The story of the Anemolian ambassadors owes something to "The Wisdom of Nigrinus," a dialogue by the Greek satirist Lucian (2nd century C.E.), in which a rich Roman makes a fool of himself by stalking around Athens in a purple robe.
They marvel that any mortal can take pleasure in the weak sparkle of a little gem or bright pebble, when he has a star, or the sun itself, to look at. They are amazed at the foolishness of any man who considers himself a nobler fellow because he wears clothing of specially fine wool. No matter how delicate the thread, they say, a sheep wore it once, and still was nothing but a sheep. They are surprised that gold, a useless commodity in itself, is everywhere valued so highly that man himself, who for his own purposes conferred this value on it, is far less valuable. They do not understand why a dunderhead with no more brains than a post, and who is as depraved as he is foolish, should command a great many wise and good people simply because he happens to have a great pile of gold. Yet if this booby should lose his money to the lowest rascal in his household (as can happen by chance, or through some legal trick—for the law can produce reversals as violent as luck itself), he would promptly become one of the fellow's scullions, as if he were personally attached to the coin, and a mere appendage to it. Even more than this, the Utopians are appalled at those people who practically worship a rich man, though they neither owe him anything nor are obligated to him in any way. What impresses them is simply that the man is rich. Yet all the while they know he is so mean and grasping that as long as he lives not a single penny out of that great mound of money will ever come their way.

These and the like attitudes the Utopians have picked up partly from their upbringing, since the institutions of their society are completely opposed to such folly, and partly from instruction and their reading of good books. For though not many people in each city are excused from labor and assigned to scholarship full time (these are persons who from childhood have given evidence of unusual intelligence and devotion to learning), every child gets an introduction to good literature, and throughout their lives a large part of the people, men and women alike, spend their leisure time in reading. They can study all the branches of learning in their native tongue, which is not deficient in terminology or unpleasant in sound, and adapts itself fluently to the expression of thought. Just about the same language is spoken throughout that entire area of the world, though elsewhere it is somewhat more corrupt, depending on the district.

Before we came there, the Utopians had never so much as heard about a single one of those philosophers whose names are so celebrated in our part of the world. Yet in music, dialectic, arithmetic, and geometry they have found out just about the same things as our great men of the past. But while they equal the ancients in almost all other subjects, they are far from matching the inventions of our modern logicians. In fact they have not discovered even one of those elaborate rules about restrictions, amplifications, and suppositions which our own schoolboys study in the Little Logicbook. They are so far from being able to speculate on “second intentions” that not one of them was able to conceive of “man-in-general,” though I pointed straight at him with my finger, and he is, as you well know, bigger than any giant, maybe even a colossus. On the other hand, they have learned to plot expertly the courses of the stars and the movements of the heavenly bodies. They have devised a number of different instruments by which they compute with the greatest exactness the course of the sun, the moon, and the other stars that are visible in their area of the sky. As for the friendly and hostile influences of the planets, and that whole deceitful business of divination by the stars, they have never so much as dreamed of it. From long experience in observation, they are able to forecast rains, winds, and other changes in the weather. But as to the causes of the weather, of the flow of the sea and its saltiness, and the origins and nature of the heavens and the universe, they have various opinions. They agree with our ancient philosophers on some matters, but on others, just as the ancients disagreed with one another, so the Utopians differ from all the ancients and yet reach no consensus among themselves.

In matters of moral philosophy, they carry on much the same arguments as we do. They inquire into the nature of the good, distinguishing goods of the body from goods of the mind and external goods. They ask whether the name of "good" may be applied to all three, or applies only to goods of the mind. They discuss virtue and pleasure, but their chief concern is what to think of human happiness, and whether it consists of one thing or of more. They seem overly inclined to the view of those who think that all or most human happiness consists of pleasure. And what is more surprising, they seek support for this comfortable opinion from their religion, which is serious and strict, indeed almost stern and forbidding. For they never discuss happiness without joining to their philosophic rationalism certain principles drawn from religion. Without these religious principles, they think that reason by itself is weak and defective in its efforts to investigate true happiness.

Their religious principles are of this nature: that the soul of man is immortal, and by God's goodness born for happiness; that after this life, rewards are appointed for our virtues and good deeds, punishments for our sins. Though these are indeed religious beliefs, they think that reason leads men to believe and accept them. And they add unhesitatingly that if these beliefs were rejected, no one would be so stupid as not to feel that he should seek pleasure, regardless of right and wrong. His only care would be to keep a lesser pleasure from standing in the way of a greater one, and to avoid pleasures that are inevitably followed by pain. They think you would have to be actually crazy to pursue harsh and painful virtue, give up the pleasures of life, and suffer pain from which you can expect no advantage. For if there is no reward after death, you have no compensation for having passed your entire existence without pleasure, that is, miserably.

To be sure, they believe happiness is found, not in every kind of pleasure, but only in good and honest pleasure. Virtue itself, they say, draws our nature to this kind of pleasure, as to the supreme good. There is an opposed school which declares that virtue is itself happiness. They define virtue as living according to nature; and God, they say, created

8. This threefold classification of goods is associated especially with Aristotle (Nicomachean Ethics 1.8.2, Politics 7.1.3-4).
9. I.e., the Utopians' primary affinity in moral philosophy is with the hedonistic school founded by Epicurus (341-271 B.C.E.).
1. These rules for choosing among pleasures are attributed to Epicurus—who, contrary to popular opinion, did not mean, by the pursuit of pleasure, mere undiscriminating sensual indulgence. Like the Utopians, he placed primary emphasis on the pleasures of a virtuous, rational life.
2. This is the position of the Stoics, who declared that virtue constitutes happiness whether or not it leads to pleasure. The definition of virtue as "living according to nature" (below) is also Stoic.
us to that end. When an individual obeys the dictates of reason in choosing one thing and avoiding another, he is following nature. Now the first rule of reason is to love and venerate the Divine Majesty to whom we owe our existence and every happiness of which we are capable. The second rule of nature is to lead a life as free of anxiety and as full of joy as possible, and to help all one’s fellow men toward that end. The most hard-faced eulogist of virtue and the grimmest enemy of pleasure, while they invite us to toil and sleepless nights and self-laceration, still admonish us to relieve the poverty and misfortune of others as best we can. It is especially praiseworthy, they tell us, when we provide for our fellow creatures’ comfort and welfare. Nothing is more humane (and humanity is the virtue most proper to human beings) than to relieve the misery of others, assuage their griefs, and, by removing all sadness from their lives, to restore them to enjoyment, that is, pleasure. Well, if this is the case, why doesn’t nature equally invite us to do the same thing for ourselves? Either a joyful life (that is, one of pleasure) is a good thing or it isn’t. If it isn’t, then you should not help anyone to it—indeed, you ought to take it away from everyone you can, as harmful and deadly to them. But if such a life is good, and if we are supposed, indeed obliged, to help others to it, why shouldn’t we first of all seek it for ourselves, to whom we owe no less charity than to anyone else? When nature prompts us to be kind to our neighbors, she does not mean that we should be cruel and merciless to ourselves. Thus they say that nature herself prescribes for us a joyous life, in other words, pleasure, as the goal of our actions; and living according to her prescriptions is to be defined as virtue. And as nature bids mortals to make one another’s lives merrier, to the extent that they can, so she warns us constantly not to seek our own advantages so avidly that we cause misfortune to our fellows. And the reason for this is an excellent one; for no one is placed so far above the rest that he is nature’s sole concern; she cherishes alike all those living beings to whom she has granted the same form.

Consequently, the Utopians maintain that one should not only abide by private agreements but also obey all those public laws which control the distribution of vital goods, such as are the very substance of pleasure. Any such laws, provided they have been properly promulgated by a good king, or ratified by a people free of force and fraud, should be observed; and as long as they are observed, to pursue your own interests is prudent; to pursue the public interest as well is pious; but to pursue your own pleasure by depriving others of theirs is unjust. On the other hand, deliberately to decrease one’s own pleasure in order to augment that of others is a work of humanity and benevolence which never fails to benefit the doer more even than he benefits others. You may be repaid for your kindness; and in any case you are conscious of having done a good deed. Your mind draws more joy from recalling the gratitude and good will of those whom you have benefited than your body would have drawn pleasure from the things you gave away. Finally, they believe (as religion easily persuades a well-disposed mind to believe) that God will recompense us, for surrendering a brief and transitory pleasure, with immense and neverending joy in heaven. And so they conclude, after carefully considering and weighing the matter, that all our actions and the virtues exercised within them look toward pleasure and happiness as their ultimate end.

By pleasure they understand every state or movement of body or mind in which we naturally find delight. They are right in considering our appetites natural. By simply following our senses and right reason\(^3\) we may discover what is pleasant by nature: it is a delight that does not injure others, that does not preclude a greater pleasure, and that is not followed by pain. But a pleasure which is against nature, and which men call 'delightful' only by the emptiest of fictions (as if one could change the real nature of things just by changing their names), does not really make for happiness; in fact, they say, it destroys happiness. And the reason is that men whose minds are filled with false ideas of pleasure have no room left for true and genuine delight. As a matter of fact, there are a great many things which have no sweetness in them, but are mainly or entirely bitter, yet which through the perverse enticements of evil lusts are considered very great pleasures, and even the supreme goals of life.

Among the devotees of this false pleasure, they include those whom I mentioned before, the people who think themselves finer fellows because they wear finer clothes. These people are twice mistaken: first in thinking their clothes better than anyone else’s, and then in thinking themselves better because of their clothes. As far as a coat’s usefulness goes, what does it matter if it was woven of thin thread or thick? Yet they act as if they were set apart by nature herself, rather than their own fantasies; they strut about, and put on airs. Because they have a fancy suit, they think themselves entitled to honors they would never have expected if they were dressed in homespun, and they grow indignant if someone passes them by without showing special respect. It is the same kind of absurdity to be pleased by empty, ceremonial honors. What true and natural pleasure can you get from someone’s bent knee or bared head? Will the creaks in your own knees be eased thereby, or the madness in your head? The phantom of false pleasure is illustrated by others who run mad with delight over their own blue blood, plume themselves on their nobility, and applaud themselves for all their rich ancestors (the only ancestors that count nowadays), and all their ancient family estates. Even if they don’t have the shred of an estate themselves, or if they’ve squandered every penny of their inheritance, they don’t consider themselves a bit less noble.

In the same class they put those people I described before, who are mad for jewelry and gems, and think themselves divinely happy if they find a good specimen, especially of the sort that happens to be fashionable in their country at the time—for stones vary in value from one market to another. The collector will not make an offer for the stone till it’s taken out of its setting, and even then he will not buy unless the dealer guarantees and gives security that it is a true and genuine stone. What he fears is that his eyes will be deceived by a counterfeit. But if you consider the matter, why should a counterfeit give any less pleasure, when your eyes cannot distinguish it from a real gem? Both should be of equal value to you—as they would be, in fact, to a blind man.\(^4\)

What about those who pile up money not because they want to do anything with the heap but so they can sit and look at it? Is that true pleasure they experience, or aren’t they simply cheated by a show of pleasure? Or what of those with the opposite vice, who hide away money they will never use and perhaps never even see again? In their anxiety to hold onto their money, they actually lose it. For what else happens when you deprive yourself, and perhaps other people too, of a chance to use money, by burying it in the ground? And \(^3\) The power, thought to have been implanted by God in all humankind, to apprehend truth and moral law: conscience.

\(^4\) In The Praise of Folly, Erasmus tells a story about More giving his wife a false gem and then teasing her at being disappointed when its falsity was revealed to her.
yet when the miser has hidden his treasure, he exults over it as if his mind were now free to rejoice. Suppose someone stole it, and the miser died ten years later, knowing nothing of the theft. During all those ten years, what did it matter whether the money was stolen or not? In either case, it was equally useless to the owner.

To these false and foolish pleasures they add gambling, which they have heard about, though they've never tried it, as well as hunting and hawking. What pleasure can there be, they wonder, in throwing dice on a table? If there were any pleasure in the action, wouldn't doing it over and over again quickly make one tired of it? What pleasure can there be in listening to the barking and yelping of dogs—isn't that rather a disgusting noise? Is there any more real pleasure when a dog chases a rabbit than when a dog chases a dog? If what you like is fast running, there's plenty of that in both cases; they're just about the same. But if what you really want is slaughter, if you want to see a living creature torn apart under your eyes, then the whole thing is wrong. You ought to feel nothing but pity when you see the hare fleeing from the hound, the weak creature tormented by the stronger, the fearful and timid beast brutalized by the savage one, the harmless hare killed by the cruel dog. The Utopians, who regard this whole activity of hunting as unworthy of free men, have assigned it, accordingly, to their butchers, who, as I said before, are all slaves. In their eyes, hunting is the lowest thing even butchers can do. In the slaughterhouse, their work is more useful and honest, since there they kill animals only from necessity; but hunters seek merely their own pleasure from the killing and mutilating of some poor little creature. Taking such relish in the sight of death, even if only of beasts, reveals, in their opinion, a cruel disposition. Or if he isn't cruel to start with, the hunter quickly becomes so through the constant practice of such brutal pleasures.

Common opinion considers these activities, and countless others like them, to be pleasures; but the Utopians say flatly they have nothing at all to do with real pleasure, since there's nothing naturally pleasant about them. They often please the senses, and in this they are like pleasure, but that does not alter their basic nature. The enjoyment doesn't arise from the experience itself, but only from the perverse habits of the mob, as a result of which they mistake the bitter for the sweet, just as pregnant women, whose taste has been turned awry, sometimes think pitch and tallow taste sweeter than honey. A person's taste may be similarly depraved by disease or by custom, but that does not change the nature of pleasure, or of anything else.

They distinguish several different classes of true pleasure, some being pleasures of the mind and others pleasures of the body. Those of the mind are knowledge and the delight which rises from contemplating the truth, also the gratification of looking back on a well-spent life and the unquestioning hope of happiness to come.

Pleasures of the body they also divide into two classes. The first is that which fills the senses with immediate delight. Sometimes this happens when organs that have been weakened by natural heat are restored with food and drink; sometimes it happens when we eliminate some excess in the body, as when we move our bowels, generate children, or relieve an itch somewhere by rubbing or scratching it. Now and then pleasure arises, not from restoring a deficiency or discharging an excess, but from something that excites our senses with a hidden but unmistakable force, and attracts them to itself. Such is the power of music.
The second kind of bodily pleasure they describe as nothing but the calm and harmonious state of the body, its state of health when undisturbed by any disorder. Health itself, when not oppressed by pain, gives pleasure, without any external excitement at all. Even though it appeals less directly to the senses than the gross gratifications of eating and drinking, many consider this to be the greatest pleasure of all. Most of the Utopians regard this as the foundation of all the other pleasures, since by itself alone it can make life peaceful and desirable, whereas without it there is no possibility of any other pleasure. Mere absence of pain, without positive health, they regard as insensibility, not pleasure.

Some have maintained that a stable and tranquil state of health is not really a pleasure, on the grounds that the presence of health cannot be felt except through some external stimulus. The Utopians (who have considered the matter thoroughly) long ago rejected this opinion. On the contrary, they nearly all agree that health is the greatest of bodily pleasures. Since pain is inherent in disease, they argue, and pain is the bitter enemy of pleasure, while disease is the enemy of health, then pleasure must be inherent in quiet good health. You may say pain is not the disease itself, simply an accompanying effect; but they argue that that makes no difference. For whether health is itself a pleasure or is merely the cause of pleasure (as fire is the cause of heat), the fact remains that those who have stable health must also have pleasure.

When we eat, they say, what happens is that health, which was starting to fade, takes food as its ally in the fight against hunger. While our health gains strength, the simple process of returning vigor gives us pleasure and refreshment. If our health feels delight in the struggle, will it not rejoice when the victory has been won? When at last it is restored to its original strength, which was its aim all through the conflict, will it at once become insensible, and fail to recognize and embrace its own good? The idea that health cannot be felt they consider completely wrong. Every man who's awake, they say, feels that he's in good health—unless he isn't. Is any one so torpid and dull that he won't admit health is delightfully agreeable to him? And what is delight except pleasure under another name?

Of all the different pleasures, they seek primarily those of the mind, and prize them most highly. The foremost mental pleasures, they believe, arise from the practice of the virtues and the consciousness of a good life. Among the pleasures of the body, they give the first place to health. As for eating and drinking and other delights of the same sort, they consider these bodily pleasures desirable, but only for the sake of health. They are not pleasant in themselves, but only as ways to withstand the insidious attacks of sickness. A wise man would rather escape sickness altogether than have a good cure for it; he would rather prevent pain than find a palliative for it. And so it would be better not to need this kind of pleasure at all than to be assuaged by it.

Anyone who thinks happiness consists of this sort of pleasure must confess that his ideal life would be one spent in an endless round of hunger, thirst, and itching, followed by eating, drinking, scratching, and rubbing. Who fails to see that such an existence is not only disgusting but miserable? These pleasures are certainly the lowest of all, as they are the most adulterate—for they never occur except in connection with the pains that are their contraries. Hunger, for example, is linked to the pleasure of eating, and far from equally,

5. This is, especially, the position of Plato, e.g., Republic 9.583C—585A.
since the pain is sharper and lasts longer; it precedes the pleasure, and ends only when the pleasure ends with it. So they think pleasures of this sort should not be much valued, except as they are necessary to life. Yet they enjoy these pleasures too, and acknowledge gratefully the kindness of Mother Nature, who coaxes her children with allurements and cajolery to do what from hard necessity they must always do. How wretched life would be if the daily diseases of hunger and thirst had to be overcome by bitter potions and drugs, like some other diseases that afflict us less often!

Beauty, strength, and agility, as special and pleasant gifts of nature, they joyfully accept. The pleasures of sound, sight, and smell they also accept as the special seasonings of life, recognizing that nature intended these delights to be the particular province of man. No other kind of animal contemplates the shape and loveliness of the universe, or enjoys odors, except in the way of searching for food, or distinguishes harmonious from dissonant sounds. But in all their pleasures, the Utopians observe this rule, that the lesser pleasure must not interfere with the greater, and that no pleasure shall carry pain with it as a consequence. If a pleasure is false, they think it will inevitably lead to pain.

Moreover, they think it is crazy for a man to despise beauty of form, to impair his own strength, to grind his energy down to lethargy, to exhaust his body with fasts, to ruin his health, and to scorn natural delights, unless by so doing he can better serve the welfare of others or the public good. Then indeed he may expect a greater reward from God. But otherwise, such a man does no one any good. He gains, perhaps, the empty and shadowy reputation of virtue; and no doubt he hardens himself against fantastic adversities which may never occur. But such a person the Utopians consider absolutely crazy—cruel to himself, as well as most ungrateful to Nature—as if, to avoid being in her debt, he were to reject all her gifts.

This is the way they think about virtue and pleasure. Human reason, they think, can attain to no surer conclusions than these, unless a revelation from heaven should inspire men with holier notions. In all this, I have no time now to consider whether they are right or wrong, and don’t feel obliged to do so. I have undertaken only to describe their principles, not to defend them. But of this I am sure, that whatever you think of their ideas, there is not a happier people or a better commonwealth anywhere in the whole world.

In body they are active and lively, and stronger than you would expect from their stature, though they’re by no means tiny. Their soil is not very fertile, nor their climate of the best, but they protect themselves against the weather by temperate living, and improve their soil by industry, so that nowhere do grain and cattle flourish more plentifully, nowhere are people more vigorous, and liable to fewer diseases. There you can not only observe that they do all the things that farmers usually do to improve poor soil by hard work and technical knowledge, but you can see a forest which they tore up by the roots with their own hands and moved to another site. They did this not so much for the sake of better growth but to make transportation easier, in order to have wood closer to the sea, the rivers, or the cities themselves. For grain is easier than wood to transport over a long distance, especially by land.

The people in general are easygoing, cheerful, clever, and fond of leisure. When they must, they can stand heavy labor, but otherwise they are not much given to it. In intellectual pursuits, they are tireless. When they heard from us about the literature and learning of the Greeks (for we thought there was nothing in Latin except the historians and poets that they would enjoy), it was wonderful to behold how eagerly they sought to be instructed in Greek. We therefore began to study a little of it with them, at first more to avoid seeming lazy than out of any expectation that they would profit by it. But after a short trial, their diligence convinced us that our efforts would not be wasted. They picked up the forms of the letters so easily, pronounced the language so aptly, memorized it so quickly, and began to recite so accurately that it seemed like a miracle. Most of our pupils were established scholars, of course, picked for their unusual ability and mature minds; and they studied with us, not just of their own free will, but at the command of the senate. Thus in less than three years they had perfect control of the language and could read the best Greek authors fluently, unless the text was corrupt. I suspect they picked up Greek more easily because it was somewhat related to their own tongue. Though their language resembles the Persian in most respects, I suspect them of deriving from Greece because their language retains quite a few vestiges of Greek in the names of cities and in official titles.

Before leaving on the fourth voyage, I placed on board, instead of merchandise, a good-sized packet of books; for I had resolved not to return at all rather than to come home soon. Thus they received from me most of Plato’s works and many of Aristotle’s, as well as Theophrastus’s book On Plants, though the latter, I’m sorry to say, was somewhat mutilated. During the voyage I left it lying around, a monkey got hold of it, and out of sheer mischief ripped a few pages here and there. Of the grammarians they have only Lascaris, for I did not take Theodorus with me, nor any dictionary except that of Hesychius; and they have Dioscorides. They are very fond of Plutarch’s writings, and delighted with the witty persiflage of Lucian. Among the poets they have Aristophanes, Homer, and Euripides, together with Sophocles in the small Aldine edition. Of the historians they possess Thucydides and Herodotus, as well as Herodian.

As for medical books, a comrade of mine named Tricius Apinatus brought with him some small treatises by Hippocrates, and the Microtechne of Galen. They were delighted to have these books because they consider medicine one of the finest and most useful parts of knowledge, even though there’s hardly a country in the world that needs doctors less. They think that when they thus explore the secrets of nature they are gratifying not only themselves but the author and maker of nature. They suppose that, like other artists, he created this visible mechanism of the world to be admired—and by whom, if not by

6. Theophrastus, Aristotle’s pupil, was studied in the Renaissance not as a quaint curiosity but because his views were still current in botanical studies.
7. Constantine Lascaris and Theodore of Gaza wrote Renaissance grammar of Greek. The Greek dictionary of Hesychius of Alexandria (5th century C.E.) was first printed in 1514. Dioscorides (1st century C.E.) wrote a treatise on drugs and herbs (not properly a dictionary), which was printed in 1499.
8. The Syrian-born ironist Lucian (2nd century C.E.) was admired, translated, and imitated by both More and Erasmus. Cf. above, p. 52 for “Plutarch’s writings” presumably include the Moral Essays of Plutarch (ca. 46–ca. 120 C.E.) in addition to his Parallel Lives of eminent Greeks and Romans.
9. The first modern edition of Sophocles was that of Aldus Manutius in 1502. The house of Aldus, established in Venice toward the end of the fifteenth century, was not only the first establishment to print Greek texts in Greek type but was responsible for some of the best-designed books in the history of the art.
1. Thucydides and Herodotus (both 5th century B.C.E.) are the greatest historians of classical Greece. Herodian (ca. 175—250 C.E.) wrote a history of the Roman emperors of the 2nd and 3rd centuries C.E.
2. A learned joke based on a passage in the Roman poet Martial (1st century C.E.), who says of one set of his Epigrams that “Non aphrodisia tria tue; ‘They’re trifles and toys’ (14.1).
3. Hippocrates (5th century B.C.E.) and Galen (2nd century C.E.) were the most influential Greek medical writers. The Microtechna is a medieval summary of Galen’s ideas.
This sample of the Utopian language, which first appeared in the earliest edition of the work (1516), reveals affinities with Greek and Latin and has enough internal consistency to suggest that it was worked out with care. The Latin quatrain at the end, which purports to be a literal translation, can itself be translated as follows:

"Me, once a peninsula, Utopus the king made an island. / Alone among all nations, and without complex abstractions, / I set before men's eyes the philosophical city. / What I give is free: what is better I am not slow to take from others."

man, who is alone in being able to appreciate such an intricate object? Therefore he is bound to prefer a careful observer and sensitive admirer of his work before one who, like a brute beast, looks on the grand spectacle with a stupid and blockish mind.

Once stimulated by learning, the minds of the Utopians are wonderfully quick to seek out those various arts which make life more agreeable and convenient. Two inventions, to be sure, they owe to us: the art of printing and the manufacture of paper. At least they owe these arts partly to us, though partly to their own ingenuity. While we were showing them the Aldine editions of various books, we talked about paper-making and typecutting, though without going into detail, for none of us had had any practical experience of either skill. But with great sharpness of mind they immediately grasped the basic principles. While previously they had written only on vellum, bark, and papyrus, they now undertook to make paper and to print letters. Their first attempts were not altogether successful, but with practice they soon mastered both arts. If they had texts of the Greek authors, they would soon have no lack of volumes; but as they have no more than those I mentioned, they have contented themselves with reprinting each in thousands of copies.

Any sightseer coming to their land who has some special intellectual gift, or who has traveled widely and seen many countries, is sure of a warm welcome, for they love to hear what is happening throughout the world. This is why we were received so kindly. Few merchants, however, go there to trade. What could they import except iron—or else gold and silver, which everyone would rather bring home than send abroad? As for their own export trade, the Utopians prefer to do their own transportation, rather than invite strangers to do it. By carrying their own cargos they are able to learn more about their neighbors and keep up their skill in navigation.

SLAVES

The Utopians enslave prisoners of war only if they are captured in wars they fight themselves. The children of slaves are not automatically enslaved, nor are any men who were enslaved in a foreign country. Their slaves are either their own former citizens, enslaved for some heinous offense, or else foreigners who were condemned to death in their own land. Most are of the latter sort. Sometimes the Utopians buy them at a very modest rate, more often they ask for them, get them for nothing, and bring them home in considerable numbers. Both kinds of slaves are kept constantly at work, and are always fettered. The Utopians deal with their own people more harshly than with others, feeling that their crimes are worse and deserve stricter punishment because, as it is argued, they had an excellent education and the best of moral training, yet still couldn’t be restrained from wrongdoing. A third class of slaves consists of hardworking penniless drudges from other nations who voluntarily choose to become slaves in Utopia. Such people are treated well, almost as well as citizens, except that they are given a little extra work, on the score that they’re used to it. If one of them wants to leave, which seldom happens, no obstacles are put in his way, nor is he sent off emptyhanded.

As I said before, the sick are carefully tended, and nothing is neglected in the way of medicine or diet which might cure them. Everything is done to mitigate the pain of those who are suffering from incurable diseases; and visitors do their best to console them by sitting and talking with them. But if the disease is not only incurable but excruciatingly and continually painful, then the priests and public officials come and urge the invalid not to endure such agony any longer. They remind him that he is now unfit for any of life’s duties, a burden to himself and to others; he has really outlived his own death. They tell him he should not let the disease prey on him any longer, but now that life is simply torture and the world a mere prison cell, he should not hesitate to free himself, or to let others free him, from the rack of living. This would be a wise act, they say, since for him death puts an end not to pleasure but to agony. In addition, he would be obeying the advice of the priests, who are the interpreters of God’s will; which ensures that it will be a holy and pious act.\footnote{The Utopian view of suicide is clearly more Stoic than Christian, but different from both in the strong emphasis placed on the social element of the decision.}

Those who have been persuaded by these arguments either starve themselves to death or take a potion which puts them painlessly to sleep, and frees them from life without any sensation of dying. But they never force this step on a man against his will; nor, if he decides against it, do they lessen their care of him. Under these circumstances, when death is advised by the authorities, they consider self-destruction honorable. But the suicide, who takes his own life without the approval of priests and senate, they consider unworthy either of earth or fire, and throw his body, unburied and disgraced, into the nearest bog.

Women do not marry till they are eighteen, nor men till they are twenty-two. Premarital intercourse, if discovered and proved, brings severe punishment on both man and woman, and the guilty parties are forbidden to marry during their whole lives, unless the governor by his pardon remits the sentence. In addition both the father and mother of the household where the offense occurred suffer public disgrace for having been remiss in their duty. The reason they punish this offense so severely is that they suppose few people would join in married love—with confinement to a single partner, and all the petty annoyances that married life involves—unless they were strictly restrained from a life of promiscuity.

In choosing marriage partners, they solemnly and seriously follow a custom which seemed to us foolish and absurd in the extreme. Whether she is a widow or a virgin, the bride-to-be is shown naked to the groom by a responsible and respectable matron; and, similarly, some respectable man presents the groom naked to his future bride. We laughed at this custom and called it absurd; but they were just as amazed at the folly of all other peoples. When men go to buy a colt, where they are risking only a little money, they are so suspicious that though the beast is almost bare they won’t close the deal until the saddle and blanket have been taken off, lest there be a hidden sore underneath. Yet in the choice of a mate, which may cause either delight or disgust for the rest of their lives, people are completely careless. They leave all the rest of her body covered up with clothes and estimate the attractiveness of a woman from a mere handsbreadth of her person, the face, which is all they can see. And so they marry, running great risk of hating one another for the rest of their lives, if something in either’s person should offend the other. Not all people are so wise as to concern themselves solely with character; and even the wise appreciate physical beauty, as a supplement to the virtues of the mind. There’s no question but that deformity may lurk under clothing, serious enough to make a man hate his wife when it’s too late to be separated from her. When deformities are discovered after marriage, each person must bear his own fate; so the Utopians think everyone should be protected by law beforehand.

There is extra reason for them to be careful, because in that part of the world they are the only people who practice monogamy. Their marriages are seldom terminated except by death, though they do allow divorce for adultery or for intolerably difficult behavior. A husband or wife who is the aggrieved party in such a divorce is granted permission by the senate to remarry, but the guilty party is considered disreputable and permanently forbidden to take another mate. They absolutely forbid a husband to put away his wife against her will because of some bodily misfortune; they think it cruel that a person should be abandoned when most in need of comfort; and they add that old age, since it not only entails disease but is actually a disease itself, needs more than a precarious fidelity.

It happens occasionally that a married couple cannot get along, and have both found other persons with whom they hope to live more harmoniously. After getting the approval of the senate, they may then separate by mutual consent and contract new marriages. But such divorces are allowed only after the senators and their wives have carefully investigated the case. They allow divorce only very reluctantly, because they know that husbands and wives will find it hard to settle down together if each has in mind that a new marriage is easily available.

They punish adulterers with the strictest form of slavery. If both parties were married, they are both divorced, and the injured parties may marry one another, if they want, or someone else. But if one of the injured parties continues to love such an undeserving spouse, the marriage may go on, providing the innocent person chooses to share in the labor to which every slave is condemned. And sometimes it happens that the repentance of the guilty and the devotion of the innocent party move the governor to pity, so that he restores both to freedom. But a second conviction of adultery is punished by death.

No other crimes carry fixed penalties; the senate sets specific penalties for each particular misdeed, as it is considered atrocious or venial. Husbands chastise their wives, and parents their children, unless the offense is so serious that public punishment seems to be in the public interest. Generally, the gravest crimes are punished by slavery, for they think this deters offenders just as much as instant capital punishment, and is more beneficial to the commonwealth. Slaves, moreover, are permanent and visible reminders that crime does not pay. If the slaves rebel against their condition, then, like savage beasts which neither bars nor chains can tame, they are finally put to death. But if they are patient, they are not left altogether without hope. When subdued by long hardships, if they show by their behavior that they regret the crime more than the punishment, their slavery is lightened or remitted altogether, sometimes by the governor’s pardon, sometimes by popular vote.

A man who tries to seduce a woman is subject to the same penalties as if he had actually done it. They think that a crime attempted is as bad as one committed, and that failure should not confer advantages on a criminal who did all he could to succeed.

They are very fond of fools, and think it contemptible to insult them. There is no prohibition against enjoying their foolishness, and they even regard this as beneficial to the fools. If anyone is so serious and solemn that the foolish behavior and comic patter of a clown do not amuse him, they don’t entrust him with the care of such a person, for fear that a man who gets no fun from a fool’s only gift will not treat him kindly.

To mock a person for being deformed or crippled is considered disgraceful, not to the victim, but to the mocker, who stupidly reproaches the cripple for something he cannot help.
They think it a sign of a weak and sluggish character to neglect one’s natural beauty, but they consider cosmetics a detestable affectation. From experience they have learned that no physical beauty recommends a wife to her husband so effectually as truthfulness and integrity. Though quite a few men are captured by beauty alone, none are held except by virtue and compliance.

As they deter people from crime by penalties, so they incite them to virtue by public honors. They set up in the marketplaces statues of distinguished men who have served their country well, thinking thereby to preserve the memory of their good deeds and to spur on the citizens to emulate the glory of their ancestors.

Any man who campaigns for a public office is disqualified for all of them. They live together harmoniously, and the public officials are never arrogant or unapproachable. Instead, they are called “fathers,” and that is the way they behave. Because the officials never extort respect from the people against their will, the people respect them spontaneously, as they should. Not even the governor is distinguished from his fellow citizens by a robe or crown; he is known only by a sheaf of grain carried before him, just as the high priest is distinguished by a wax candle.4

They have very few laws, and their training is such that they need no more. The chief fault they find with other nations is that, even with infinite volumes of laws and interpretations, they cannot manage their affairs properly. They think it completely unjust to bind people by a set of laws that are too many to be read and too obscure for anyone to understand. As for lawyers, a class of men whose trade it is to manipulate cases and multiply quibbles, they have no use for them at all. They think it is better for each man to plead his own case, and say the same thing to the judge that he would tell his lawyer. This makes for less ambiguity, and readier access to the truth. A man speaks his mind without tricky instructions from a lawyer, and the judge examines each point carefully, taking pains to protect simple folk against the false accusations of the crafty. It is hard to find this kind of plain dealing in other countries, where they have such a multitude of incomprehensibly intricate laws. But in Utopia everyone is a legal expert. For the laws are very few, as I said, and they consider the most obvious interpretation of any law to be the fairest. As they see things, all laws are promulgated for the single purpose of teaching every man his duty. Subtle interpretations teach very few, since hardly anybody is able to understand them, whereas the more simple and apparent sense of the law is open to everyone. If laws are not clear, they are useless; for simple-minded men (and most men are of this sort, and need to be told where their duty lies) there might as well be no laws at all, as laws which can be interpreted only by devious minds after endless disputes. The average, common man cannot understand this legal chicanery, and couldn’t even if he studied it his whole life, since he has to earn a living in the meantime.

Some time ago the Utopians helped various of their neighbors to throw off the yoke of tyranny; and since then, these people (who have learned to admire Utopian virtue) have made a practice of asking for Utopians to rule over them. Some of these rulers serve one year, others five. When their service is over, they return with honor and praise to their home, and others are sent in their place. These countries seem to have settled on an excellent scheme to safeguard their happiness and safety. Since the welfare or ruin of a commonwealth depends wholly on the character of the officials, where could they make a more prudent choice than among Utopians, who cannot be tempted by money? For money is useless to them when they go home, as they soon must, and they can have no partisan or factional feelings, since they are strangers to the affairs of the city over which they rule. Wherever they take root in men’s minds, these two evils, greed and faction, are the destruction of all justice—and justice is the strongest bond of any society. The Utopians call these people who have borrowed magistrates from them their allies; others whom they have benefited they call simply friends.

While other nations are constantly making treaties, breaking them, and renewing them, the Utopians never make any treaties at all. If nature, they say, doesn’t bind man adequately to his fellow man, will an alliance do so? If a man scorns nature herself, is there any reason to think he will care about mere words? They are confirmed in this view by the fact that in that part of the world, treaties and alliances between kings are not generally observed with much good faith.

In Europe, of course, the dignity of treaties is everywhere kept sacred and inviolable, especially in these regions where the Christian religion prevails. This is partly because the kings are all so just and virtuous, partly also because of the reverence and fear that everyone feels toward the ruling popes. Just as the popes themselves never promise anything which they do not most conscientiously perform, so they command all other princes to abide by their promises in every way. If someone quibbles over it, they compel him to obey by means of pastoral censure and sharp reproof. The popes rightly declare that it would be particularly disgraceful if people who are specifically called ‘the faithful’ did not adhere faithfully to their solemn word.

But in that new world, which is scarcely removed from ours by geography so far as it is by customs and manners, nobody trusts treaties. The greater the formalities, the more numerous and solemn the oaths, the sooner the treaty will be broken. The rulers will easily find some defect in the wording of it, which often enough they deliberately inserted themselves. No treaty can be made so strong and explicit that a government will not be able to worm out of it, breaking in the process both the treaty and its own word. If such craft, deceit, and fraud were practiced in private contracts, the politicians would raise a great outcry against both parties, calling them sacrilegious and worthy of the gallows. Yet the very same politicians think themselves clever fellows when they give this sort of advice to kings. As a consequence, people are apt to think that justice is a humble, plebeian virtue, far beneath the majesty of kings. Or else they conclude that there are two kinds of justice, one which is only for the common herd, a lowly justice that creeps along the ground, encumbered with chains; and the other, which is the justice of princes, much more free and majestic, so that it can do anything it wants and nothing that it doesn’t want.

This royal practice of keeping treaties badly is, I suppose, the reason the Utopians don’t make any; doubtless if they lived here in Europe, they would change their minds. However, they think it a bad idea to make treaties at all, even if they are faithfully observed. A treaty implies that people who are separated by some natural obstacle as slight as a hill or a brook are joined by no bond of nature; it assumes that they are born rivals and enemies, and are right in aiming to destroy one another except insofar as the treaty restrains them. Moreover, they see that treaties do not really promote friendship; for both parties still retain the right to prey upon one another, unless extreme care has been used, in drawing up the treaty, to outlaw freebooting. The Utopians think, on the other hand, that no one should be considered an enemy who has done you no harm, that the fellowship of nature is as good as a treaty, and that men are united more firmly by good will than by pacts, by their hearts than by their words.

MILITARY PRACTICES

They despise war as an activity fit only for beasts, yet practiced more by man than by any other creature. Unlike almost every other people in the world, they think nothing so inglorious as the glory won in battle. Yet on certain fixed days men and women alike carry on vigorous military training, so they will be fit to fight should the need arise. But they go to war only for good reasons; among these are the protection of their own land, the protection of their friends from an invading army, and the liberation of an oppressed people from tyranny and servitude. Out of human sympathy, they not only protect their friends from present danger but avenge previous injuries; they do this, however, only if they themselves have previously been consulted, have approved the cause, and have demanded restitution in vain. Then and only then they think themselves free to declare war. They take this final step not only when their friends have been plundered but also when their friends' merchants have been subjected to extortion in another country, either through laws unfair in themselves or through the perversion of good laws.

This and no other was the cause of the war which the Utopians waged a little before our time on behalf of the Nephelogetes against the Alaopolitans. Under pretext of right, a wrong, as they saw it, had been inflicted on some Nephelogete traders residing among the Alaopolitans. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the quarrel, it developed into a fierce war, into which, apart from the hostile forces of the two parties themselves, the neighboring nations poured all their resources. Some prosperous nations were ruined completely, others badly shaken. One trouble led to another, and in the end the Alaopolitans were crushed and reduced to slavery (since the Utopians weren't involved on their own account) by the Nephelogetes—a people who, before the war, had not been remotely comparable in power to their rivals.

So severely do the Utopians punish wrong done to their friends, even in matters of mere money; but they are not so strict in standing up for their own rights. When they are cheated in any way, so long as no bodily harm is done, their anger goes no further than cutting off trade relations with that nation till restitution is made. The reason is not that they care more for their allies' citizens than for their own, but simply this: when the merchants of allies are cheated, it is their own property that is lost, but when the Utopians lose something, it comes from the common stock, and is bound to be in plentiful supply at home; otherwise they wouldn't have been exporting it. Hence no one individual has to stand the loss. So small a loss, which affects neither the life nor the livelihood of any of their own people, they consider it cruel to avenge by the death of many soldiers. On the other hand, if one of their own is killed or maimed anywhere, whether by a government or by a private citizen, they first send envoys to look into the circumstances; then they demand that the guilty persons be surrendered; and if that demand is refused, they are not to be put off, but at once declare war. If the guilty persons are surrendered, their punishment is death or slavery.

The Utopians are not only troubled but ashamed when their forces gain a bloody victory, thinking it folly to pay too high a price even for the best goods. But if they overcome the enemy by skill and cunning, they exult mightily, celebrate a public triumph, and raise a monument as for a mighty exploit. They think they have really acted with manly virtue when they have won a victory such as no animal except man could have won—a victory achieved by strength of understanding. Bears, lions, boars, wolves, dogs, and other wild beasts fight with their bodies, they say; and most of them are superior to us in strength and ferocity; but we outdo them all in shrewdness and rationality.

The only thing they aim at, in going to war, is to secure what would have prevented the declaration of war, if the enemy had conceded it beforehand. Or if they cannot get that, they try to take such bitter revenge on those who have injured them that they will be afraid ever to do it again. These are their chief concerns, which they go after energetically, yet in such a way as to avoid danger rather than to win fame and glory.

As soon as war is declared, therefore, they have their secret agents set up overnight many placards, each marked with their official seal, in the most conspicuous places throughout the enemy territory. In these proclamations they promise immense rewards to anyone who will kill the enemy's king. They offer smaller but still very substantial sums for killing any of a list of other individuals whom they name. These are the persons whom they regard as most responsible, after the king, for plotting aggression against them. The reward for an assassin is doubled for anyone who succeeds in bringing in one of the proscribed men alive. The same reward, plus a guarantee of personal safety, is offered to any one of the proscribed men who turns against his comrades. As a result, the enemies of the Utopians quickly come to suspect everyone, particularly one another; and the many perils of their situation lead to panic. They know perfectly well that many of them, including their princes as well, have been betrayed by those in whom they placed complete trust—so effective are bribes as an incitement to crime. Knowing this, the Utopians are lavish in their promises of bounty. Being well aware of the risks their agents must run, they make sure that the payments are in proportion to the peril; thus they not only offer, but actually deliver, enormous sums of gold, as well as large landed estates in very secure locations on the territory of their friends.

Everywhere else in the world, this process of bidding for and buying the life of an enemy is condemned as the cruel villainy of a degenerate mind; but the Utopians consider it good policy, both wise and merciful. In the first place, it enables them to win tremendous wars without fighting any actual battles; and in the second place it enables them, by the sacrifice of a few guilty men, to spare the lives of many innocent persons who would have died in battle, some on their side, some on the enemy’s. They pity the mass of the enemy’s soldiers almost as much as their own citizens, for they know common people do not go to war of their own accord, but are driven to it by the madness of princes.

If assassination does not work, they sow the seeds of dissension in enemy ranks by inciting the prince’s brother or some other member of the nobility to scheme for the crown. If internal discord dies down, they try to rouse up the neighboring peoples against the enemy by reviving forgotten claims to dominion, of which kings always have an ample supply.

When they promise their resources to help in a war, they send money very freely, but commit their own citizens only sparingly. They hold their own people dear, and value them so highly that they would not exchange one of their citizens for an enemy’s prince. Since they keep their gold and silver for the purpose of war alone, they spend it without hesitation; after all, they will continue to live just as well even if they expend the whole sum. Besides the wealth they have at home, they have a vast treasure abroad, since, as I said before, many nations owe them money. So they hire mercenary soldiers from all sides, especially the Zapoletes.9

These people live five hundred miles to the east of Utopia, and are rude, rough, and fierce. The forests and mountains where they are bred are the kind of country they like—tough and rugged. They are a hard race, capable of standing heat, cold, and drudgery, unacquainted with any luxuries, careless of what houses they live in or what they wear; they don’t till the fields but raise cattle instead. Most of them survive by hunting and stealing. These people are born for battle and are always eager for a fight; they seek one out at every opportunity. Leaving their own country in great numbers, they offer themselves for cheap hire to anyone in need of warriors. The only art they know for earning a living is the art of taking life.

They fight with great courage and incorruptible loyalty for the people who pay them, but they will not bind themselves to serve for any fixed period of time. If someone, even the enemy, offers them more money tomorrow, they will take his side; and day after tomorrow, if a trifle more is offered to bring them back, they’ll return to their first employers. Hardly a war is fought in which a good number of them are not engaged on both sides. It happens every day that men who are united by ties of blood and have served together in intimacy through long campaigns, but who are now separated into opposing armies, meet in battle. Forgetful of kinship and comradeship alike, they furiously run one another through, with no other motive than that they were hired for paltry pay by opposing princes. They care so much about money that they can easily be induced to change sides for an increase of only a penny a day.
They have picked up the habit of avarice, but none of the profit; for what they earn by shedding blood, they quickly squander on debauchery of the most squalid sort.

Because the Utopians give higher pay than anyone else, these people are ready to serve them against any enemy whatever. And the Utopians, who seek out the best possible men for proper uses, hire these, the worst possible men, for improper uses. When the situation requires, they thrust the Zapoletes into the positions of greatest danger by offering them immense rewards. Most of them never come back to collect their pay, but the Utopians faithfully pay off those who do survive, to encourage them to try it again. As for how many Zapoletes get killed, the Utopians never worry about that, for they think they would deserve very well of all mankind if they could exterminate from the face of the earth that entire disgusting and vicious race.

Beside the Zapoletes, they employ as auxiliaries the soldiers of the people for whom they have taken up arms, and then squadrons of all their other friends. Last, they add their own citizens, including some man of known bravery to command the entire army. In addition, they appoint two substitutes for him, who hold no rank as long as he is safe. But if the commander is captured or killed, the first of these two substitutes becomes his successor, and in case of a mishap to him, the other. Thus, though the accidents of war cannot be foreseen, they make sure that the whole army will not be disorganized through the loss of their leader.

Only volunteers are sent to fight abroad; they are picked men from within each city. No one is forced to fight abroad against his will, because they think a man who is naturally a bit fearful will act weakly at best, and may even spread panic among his comrades. But if their own country is invaded, they call everyone to arms, posting the fearful (as long as they are physically fit) on shipboard among braver men, or here and there along fortifications, where there is no place to run away. Thus shame at failing their countrymen, desperation at the immediate presence of the enemy, and the impossibility of flight often combine to overcome their fear, and they turn brave out of sheer necessity.

Just as no man is forced into a foreign war against his will, so women are allowed to accompany their men on military service if they want to—not only not forbidden, but encouraged and praised for doing so. They place each woman alongside her husband in the line of battle; and in addition they place around him all of a man’s children, kinsmen, and blood- or marriage-relations, so that those who by nature have most reason to help one another may be closest at hand for mutual aid. It is a matter of great reproach for either partner to come home without the other, or a son to return after losing his father. The result is for that as long as the enemy stands his ground, the hand-to-hand fighting is apt to be long and bitter, ending only when everyone is dead.

As I observed, they take every precaution to avoid fighting in person, so long as they can bring the war to an end with mercenaries. But when they are forced to take part in battle, they are as bold in the struggle as they were formerly prudent in avoiding it while they could. In the first charge they are not fierce, but gradually as the fighting goes on they grow more determined, putting up a steady, stubborn resistance. Their spirit is so strong that they will die rather than yield ground. They have no anxieties about making a living at home, nor any worry about the future of their families (and that sort of worry often daunts the boldest courage); so their spirit is exalted and unconquerable. Knowing the job of warfare and knowing it well gives them extra confidence; also from childhood they have been trained by example and instruction in the first principles of patriotism; and that too adds to their courage. They don’t hold life so cheap that they throw it away recklessly, nor so dear as to grasp it avidly at the price of shame, when duty bids them give it up.

At the height of the battle, a band of the bravest young men, who have taken a special oath, devote themselves to seeking out the opposing general. They attack him directly, they lay secret traps for him, they hit at him from near and far. A continuous supply of fresh men keep up the assault as the exhausted drop out. In the end, they rarely fail to kill or capture him, unless he takes to flight.

When they win a battle, it never ends in a massacre, for they would much rather take prisoners than cut throats. They never pursue fugitives without keeping one line of their army drawn up under the colors and ready to renew the fight. They are so careful of this that if they win the victory with this last reserve force (supposing the rest of their army has been beaten), they would rather let the enemy army escape than be tricked into pursuing fugitives with their own ranks in disorder. They remember what has happened more than once to themselves: that when the enemy seemed to have the best of the day, had routed the main Utopian force and scattered to pursue the fugitives, a few Utopians held in reserve and watching their opportunity have suddenly attacked the dispersed enemy at the very moment when he felt safe and had lowered his guard. Thereby they changed the fortune of the day, snatched a certain victory out of the enemy’s hands, and, though conquered themselves, were able to overcome their conquerors.

It is not easy to say whether they are more crafty in laying ambushes or more cautious in avoiding those laid for them. Sometimes they seem to be on the point of breaking and running when that is the very last thing they have in mind; but when they really are ready to retreat, you would never guess it. If they are too few to attack, or if the terrain is unsuitable, they shift their ground silently by night and slip away from the enemy by some stratagem. Or if they have to withdraw by day, they do so gradually, and in such good order that they are as dangerous to attack then as if they were advancing. They fortify their camps very carefully with a deep, broad ditch all around them, the earth being thrown inward to make a wall; the work is done not by workmen but by the soldiers themselves with their own hands. The whole army pitches in, except for a guard which is posted around the workers to prevent a surprise attack. With so many hands at work, they complete great fortifications, enclosing wide areas with unbelievable speed.

The armor they wear is strong enough to protect them from blows, but does not prevent easy movement of the body; in fact, it doesn’t interfere even with their swimming, and part of their military training consists of swimming in armor. For long-range fighting they use arrows, which they fire with great strength and accuracy, and from horseback as well as on the ground. At close quarters they use not swords but battle-axes, which, because of their sharp edge and great weight, are lethal weapons, whether used in slashing or thrusting. They are very skillful in inventing machines of war, but conceal them with the greatest care, since if they were made known before they were needed, the enemy might turn them to ridicule and lessen their effect. Their first consideration in designing them is to make them easy to carry and aim.

When the Utopians make a truce with the enemy, they observe it religiously, and will not break it even if provoked. They do not ravage the enemy’s territory or burn his crops; indeed, so far as possible, they avoid any trampling of the crops by men or horses, thinking they may need the grain themselves later on. Unless he is a spy, they injure no unarmed man. When cities are surrendered to them, they keep them intact; even when they have stormed a place, they do not plunder it, but put to death the men who prevented surrender, enslave the other defenders, and do no harm to the civilians. If they find any of the inhabitants who recommended surrender, they give them a share in the property of the condemned, and present their auxiliaries with the rest; for the Utopians themselves never take any booty.

1. The military devices of the Utopians are a patchwork of different notions from the common knowledge of the day. Their camps are fortified like Roman ones. Their reliance on archery links them with the English (though their skill in shooting arrows from horseback recalls the ancient Parthians and Scythians). Their “machines” are presumably like Roman dart-hurlers, battering-rams, and stone-throwers; but the emphasis on their portability probably reflects contemporary experience with cannon, which were terribly hard to drag over the muddy roads of the time.
After a war is ended, they collect the cost of it, not from the allies for whose sake they undertook it, but from the conquered. They take as indemnity not only money, which they set aside to finance future wars, but also landed estates, from which they may enjoy forever a generous annual income. They now have property of this sort in many different countries, which over the years has increased little by little, and has been augmented in various ways, till it now amounts to over seven hundred thousand ducats a year. As managers of these estates, they send abroad some of their own citizens to serve as collectors of revenue. Though they live on the properties in great style and conduct themselves like great personages, plenty of income is still left over to be put in the public treasury, unless they choose to give the conquered nation credit. They often do the latter, until they happen to need the money, and even then it's rare for them to call in the entire debt. And of course some of the estates are given, as I've already described, to those who have risked great dangers in their behalf.

If any prince takes up arms and prepares to invade their land, they immediately attack him in full force outside their own borders. They are most reluctant to wage war on their own soil, and no necessity could ever compel them to admit foreign auxiliaries onto their island.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE UTOPIANS

There are different forms of religion throughout the island, and in each particular city as well. Some worship as a god the sun, others the moon, and still others one of the planets. There are some who worship a man of past ages who was conspicuous either for virtue or glory; they consider him not only a god but the supreme god. Most of the Utopians, however, and among these all the wisest, believe nothing of the sort: they believe in a single power, unknown, eternal, infinite, inexplicable, far beyond the grasp of the human mind, and diffused throughout the universe, not physically, but in influence. Him they call father, and to him alone they attribute the origin, increase, progress, change, and end of all visible things; they do not offer divine honors to any other.

Though the other sects of the Utopians differ from this main group in various particular doctrines, they all agree in this single head, that there is one supreme power, the maker and ruler of the universe, whom they all call in their native language Mithra. Different people define him differently, and each supposes the object of his worship is the special vessel of that great force which all people agree in worshipping. But gradually they are coming to forswear this mixture of superstitions, and to unite in that one religion which seems more reasonable than any of the others. And there is no doubt that the other religions would have disappeared long ago, except for various unlucky accidents that befell certain Utopians who were thinking about changing their religion. All the others immediately construed these events as a sign of heavenly anger, not chance, as if the deity who was being abandoned were avenging an insult against himself.

But after they had heard from us the name of Christ, and learned of his teachings, his life, his miracles, and the no less marvelous devotion of the many martyrs who shed their blood to draw nations far and near into the Christian fellowship, you would not believe how they were impressed. Either through the mysterious inspiration of God, or because Christianity is very like the religion already prevailing among them, they were well disposed to it from the start. But I think they were also much influenced by the fact that Christ had encouraged his disciples to practice community of goods, and that among the truest groups of Christians the practice still prevails. Whatever the reason, no small number of them chose to join our communion, and received the holy water of baptism. By that time, two of our group had died, and among us four survivors there was, I am sorry to say, no priest; so, though they received instruction in other matters, they still lack those sacraments which in our religion can be administered only by priests. They do, however, understand what they are, and earnestly desire them. In fact, they dispute vigorously whether a man chosen from among themselves could legitimately assume the functions of a priest without the dispatch of a Christian bishop. Though they seemed on the point of selecting such a person, they had not yet done so when I left.

Those who have not accepted Christianity make no effort to restrain others from it, nor do they criticize new converts to it. While I was there, only one of the Christians got into trouble with the law. As soon as he was baptized, he took upon himself to preach the Christian religion publicly, with more zeal than discretion. We warned him not to do so, but he soon worked himself up to a pitch where he not only set our religion above the rest but condemned all others as profane in themselves, leading their impious and sacrilegious followers to the hell-flames they richly deserved. After he had been going on in this style for a long time, they arrested him. He was tried on a charge, not of despising their religion, but of creating a public disorder, convicted and sentenced to exile. For it is one of their oldest institutions that no man's religion, as such, shall be held against him.

Even before he came to the island, Utopus had heard that the inhabitants were continually quarreling over religious matters. In fact, he found it was easy to conquer the country because the different sects were too busy fighting one another to oppose him. As soon as he had gained the victory, therefore, he decreed that everyone may cultivate the religion of his choice, and strenuously proselytize for it too, provided he does so quietly, modestly, rationally, and without bitterness toward others. If persuasion fails, no one is allowed to resort to abuse or violence, under penalty of exile or enslavement.

Utopus laid down these rules not simply for the sake of peace, which he saw was in danger of being destroyed by constant quarrels and implacable hatreds, but also for the sake of religion itself. In matters of religion, he was not at all quick to dogmatize, because he suspected that God perhaps likes diverse and manifold forms of worship and has therefore deliberately inspired different people with different views. On the other hand, he was quite sure that it was arrogant folly for anyone to enforce conformity with his own beliefs by means of threats or violence. He supposed that if one religion is really true and the rest false, the true one will sooner or later prevail by its own natural strength, provided only that men consider the matter reasonably and moderately. But if they try to decide these matters by fighting and rioting, since the worst men are always the most headstrong, the best and holiest religion in the world will be crowded out by blind superstitions, like grain choked out of a field by thorns and briars. So he left the whole matter open, allowing each individual to choose what he would believe. The only exception he made was a positive and strict law against any person who should sink so far below the dignity of human nature as to think that the soul perishes with the body, or that the universe is ruled by mere chance rather than divine providence.

Thus the Utopians all believe that after this life vices are to be punished and virtue rewarded; and they consider that anyone who opposes this proposition is not even one of the human race, since he has degraded the sublimity of his own soul to the base level of a beast's wretched body. Still less will they count him as one of their citizens, since he would undoubtedly betray all the laws and customs of society, if not prevented by fear. Who can doubt that a man who has nothing to fear but the law, and no hope of life beyond the grave, will do anything he can to evade his country's laws by craft or break them by violence, in order to gratify his own private greed? Therefore a person who holds such views is offered no honors, entrusted with no offices, and given no public responsibility; he is universally regarded as a low and sordid fellow. Yet they do not affright him with punishments, because they are persuaded that no one can choose to believe by a mere act of the will. They do not compel him by threats to dissemble his views, nor do they tolerate in the matter any deceit or lying, which they detest as next door to deliberate malice. The man may not argue with the common people in behalf of his opinion; but in the presence of the priests and other important persons, they not only permit but encourage it. For they are confident that in the end his madness will yield to reason.

Almost all the Utopians are absolutely convinced that human bliss after death will be enormous and eternal; thus they lament every individual sickness, but mourn over a death only if they see that a person was torn from life despairingly and unwillingly. Such behavior they take to be a very bad sign, as if the soul, being in anguish and conscious of guilt, dreaded death through a secret premonition of punishments to come. Besides, they suppose God can hardly be well pleased with the coming of one who, when he is summoned, does not come gladly but is dragged off reluctantly and against his will. Such a death fills the onlookers with horror, and they carry away the corpse to the cemetery in melancholy silence. There, after begging God to have mercy on his spirit and to pardon his infirmities, they commit his body to the earth. But when a man dies blithely and full of good hope, they do not mourn for him but carry the body cheerfully away, singing and commending the dead man's soul to God. They cremate him in a spirit more of reverence than of grief, and erect a tombstone on which the dead man's honors are inscribed. As they go home, they talk of his character and deeds, and no part of his life is mentioned more frequently or more gladly than his joyful death.

7. These Utopians resemble the ancient Pythagoreans, who, as a facet of their doctrine of the transmigration of souls, conceded them to animals.
to behave virtuously and is also the most acceptable form of honor to the dead. For they think that dead people are actually present among us, and hear what we say about them, though through the dullness of human sight they are invisible to our eyes. Given their state of bliss, the dead must be able to travel freely where they please, and they are bound to want to revisit their friends, whom they loved and honored during their lives. Like all other good things, they think that after death charity is increased rather than decreased in all good men; and thus they believe the dead come frequently among the living, to observe their words and actions. Hence they go about their business the more confidently because of their trust in such protectors; and the belief that their forefathers are physically present keeps them from any secret dishonorable deed.

Fortune-telling and other vain forms of superstitious divination, such as other peoples take very seriously, they consider ridiculous and contemptible. But they venerate miracles which occur without the help of nature, considering them direct and visible manifestations of the divine power. Indeed, they report that miracles have frequently occurred in their country. Sometimes in great and dangerous crises they pray publicly for a miracle, which they then anticipate with great confidence, and obtain.

They think that the careful contemplation of nature, and the sense of reverence arising from it, are acts of worship to God. There are some people, however, and quite a few of them, who for religious motives reject learning, pursue no studies, and refuse all leisure, but devote their full time to good works. Constant dedication to the offices of charity, these people think, will increase their chances of happiness after death; and so they are always busy. Some tend the sick; others repair roads; clean ditches; rebuild bridges; dig turf, gravel, or stones; fell trees and cut them up; and transport wood, grain, and other commodities into the cities by wagon. They work for private citizens, as well as the public, and work even harder than slaves. They undertake with cheery good will any task that is so rough, hard, and dirty that most people refuse to tackle it because of the toil, boredom, and frustration involved. While constantly engaged in heavy labor themselves, they secure leisure for others, and yet they claim no credit for it. They do not criticize the way other people live, nor do they boast of their own doings. The more they put themselves in the position of slaves, the more highly they are honored by everyone.

These people are of two sects. The first are celibates who abstain not only from sex but also from eating meat, and some of them from any sort of animal food whatever. They reject all the pleasures of this life as harmful, and look forward only to the joys of the life to come, which they hope to deserve by hard labor and all-night vigils. As they hope to attain it quickly, they are cheerful and active in the here and now. The other kind are just as fond of hard work, but prefer to marry. They don't despise the comforts of marriage, but think that, as their duty to nature requires work, so their duty to their country requires them to beget children. They avoid no pleasure, unless it interferes with their labor, and gladly eat meat, precisely because they think it makes them stronger for any sort of heavy work. The Utopians regard the second sort as more sensible, but the first sort as holier. If anyone claimed to prefer celibacy to marriage, and a hard life to a comfortable one, on grounds of reason alone, the Utopians would think him absurd. But since these men claim to be motivated by religion, the Utopians respect and revere them. There is no subject on which they are warier of jumping to conclusions than this matter of Religion. These then are the men whom in their own language they call Buthrescas, a term which may be translated as "the religious."

Their priests are of great holiness, and therefore very few. In each city, there are no more than thirteen, one for each church. In case of war, seven of them go out with the army, and seven substitutes are appointed to fill their places for the time being. When the regular priests come back, the substitutes return to their former posts—that is, they serve as assistants to the high priest, until one of the regular thirteen dies, and then one of them succeeds to his position. The high priest is, of course, in authority over all the others. Priests are elected, just like all other officials, by secret popular vote, in order to avoid partisan feeling. After election they are ordained by the college of priests.

Their chief functions are to preside over divine worship, decree religious rites, and act as censors of public morality. For a man to be summoned before them, and scolded for not living an honorable life, is considered a great disgrace. As the duty of the priests is simply to counsel and advise, so correcting and punishing offenders is the duty of the governor and the other officials, though the priests may and do exclude from divine service persons whom they find to be extraordinarily wicked. Hardly any punishment is more dreaded than this; the excommunicate incurs great disgrace, and is tortured by the fear of damnation. Not even his body is safe for long, for unless he quickly convinces the priests of his repentance he will be seized and punished by the senate for impiety.

Instruction in good manners and pure morals is considered just as important as the accumulation of learning. From the very first they try to instill in the pupils' minds, while they are still young and tender, principles which will be useful to preserve the commonwealth. What is planted in the minds of children lives on in the minds of adults, and is of great value in strengthening the commonwealth: the decline of society can always be traced to vices which arise from wrong attitudes.

Women are not debarred from the priesthood, but only a widow of advanced years is ever chosen, and it doesn't happen often. The wives of the male priests are the very finest women in the whole country.

No official in Utopia is more honored than the priest. Even if one of them commits a crime, he is not brought into a court of law, but left to God and his own conscience. They think it is wrong to lay human hands on a man, however guilty, who has been specially consecrated to God as a holy offering, so to speak. This custom is the easier for them to observe because their priests are very few and very carefully chosen. Besides, it rarely happens that a man selected for his goodness and raised to high dignities wholly because of his moral character will fall into corruption and vice. If such a thing should happen, human nature being as changeable as it is, no great harm is to be feared, because the priests are so few and have no power beyond that which derives from their good reputation. In fact, the reason for having so few priests is to prevent the order, which the Utopians now esteem so highly, from being cheapened by numbers. Besides, they think it would be hard to find many men qualified for a dignity for which merely ordinary virtues are not sufficient.

Their priests are esteemed no less highly abroad than at home, which can be seen from the following fact: Whenever their armies join in battle, the Utopian priests are to be found, a little removed from the fray but not far, wearing their sacred vestments and down on their knees. With hands raised to heaven, they pray first of all for peace, and then for victory to their own side, but without much bloodshed on either hand. Should their side be victorious, they rush among the combatants and restrain the rage of their own men against the enemy. If any of the enemy see these priests and call to them, it is enough to save their lives; to touch the robe of a priest will save all their property from confiscation. This custom has brought them such veneration among all peoples, and given them such genuine authority, that they have saved the Utopians from the rage of the enemy as often as they have protected the enemy from Utopians. Instances of this are well known. Sometimes when the Utopian line has buckled, when the field was lost, and the enemy was rushing in to kill and plunder, the priests have intervened, separated the armies, and concluded an equitable peace. There was never anywhere a tribe so fierce, cruel, and barbarous as not to hold their persons sacrosanct and inviolable.

The Utopians celebrate the first and last days of every month, and likewise of each year, as holy days. They divide the year into months which they measure by the orbit of the moon, just as they measure the year itself by the course of the sun. In their language, the first days are known as the Cynemerns and the last days as the Trapemerns, which is to say "First-feasts" and "Last-feasts." Their churches are beautifully constructed, finely adorned, and large enough to hold a great many people. This is a necessity, since churches are so few. Their interiors are all rather dark, not from architectural ignorance, but from deliberate policy: for the priests think that in bright light the congregation's thoughts will go wandering, whereas a dim light tends to concentrate the mind and encourage devotion.

Though there are various religions in Utopia, as I've said, all of them, even the most diverse, agree in the main point, which is worship of the divine nature; they are like travelers going to one destination by different roads. So nothing is seen or heard in the churches that does not square with all the creeds. If any sect has a special rite of its own, that is celebrated in a private house; the public service is ordered by a ritual which in no way derogates from any of the private services. Therefore in the churches no image of the gods is to be seen, so that each person may be free to form his own image of God after his heart's desire, in any shape he pleases. There is no special name for God, apart from the common word Mithra. Whatever the nature of the divine majesty may be, they agree to refer to it by that single word, and their prayers are so phrased as to accommodate the beliefs of all the different sects.

On the evening of the "Last-feast" they meet in their churches, and while still fasting they thank God for their prosperity during that month or year which is just ending. Next day, which is "First-feast," they all flock to the churches in the morning, to pray for prosperity and happiness in the month or year which is just beginning. On the day of "Last-feast," in the home before they go to church, wives kneel before their husbands and children before their parents, to confess their various failures and negligences, and beg forgiveness for their offenses. Thus if any cloud of anger or resentment has arisen in the family, it is dispersed, and they can attend divine services with clear and untroubled minds—for they consider it sacrilege to worship with a rankling conscience. If they are conscious of hatred or anger toward anyone, they do not take part in divine services till they have been reconciled and have cleansed their hearts, for fear of some swift and terrible punishment.

9. Cynemerns really means, in Greek, "dog-days." Trapemerns "turning-days."

As they enter the church, they separate, men going to the right side and women to the left. Then they take their seats so that the males of each household are placed in front of the head of that household, while the womenfolk are directly in front of the mother of the family. In this way they ensure that everyone’s behavior in public is supervised by the same person whose authority and discipline direct him at home. They take great care that the young are everywhere placed in the company of their elders. For if children were trusted to the care of other children, they might spend in childish foolery the time they should devote to developing a religious fear of the gods, which is the greatest and almost the only incitement to virtue.

They do not slaughter animals in their sacrifices, and do not think that a merciful God, who gave life to all creatures, will be gratified with the shedding of blood. They light incense, scatter perfumes, and burn a great number of candles—not that they think these practices profit the divine nature in any way, any more than human prayers do; but they like this harmless kind of worship. They feel that sweet smells, lights, and rituals elevate the mind, and lift it with a livelier devotion toward the adoration of God.

When they go to church, the people all wear white. The priest wears a robe of many colors, wonderful for its workmanship and decoration, though not of materials as costly as one would suppose. It has no gold embroidery nor any precious stones, but is decorated with the feathers of different birds so skillfully woven together that the value of the handiwork far exceeds the cost of the most precious materials. They add that certain symbolic mysteries are hidden in the patterning of the feathers on the robes, the meaning of which is carefully handed down among the priests. These messages serve to remind them of God’s benefits toward them, and consequently of the gratitude they owe to God, as well as of their duty to one another.

As the priest in his robes appears from the vestibule, the people all fall to the ground in reverence. The stillness is so complete that the scene strikes one with awe, as if a divinity were actually present. After remaining in this posture for some time, they rise at a word from the priest. Then they sing hymns to the accompaniment of musical instruments, most of them quite different in shape from those in our part of the world. Many of them produce sweeter tones than ours, but others are not even comparable. In one respect, however, they are beyond doubt far ahead of us, because all their music, both vocal and instrumental, renders and expresses natural feelings, and perfectly matches the sound to the subject. Whether the words of the hymn are cheerful, supplicatory, troubled, mournful, or angry, the music represents the meaning through the melody so admirably that it penetrates and inspires the minds of the ardent hearers. Finally, the priest and the people together recite certain fixed forms of prayer, so composed that what they all repeat in unison each individual can apply to himself.

In these prayers, the worshippers acknowledge God to be the creator and ruler of the universe and the author of all good things. They thank God for benefits received, and particularly for the divine favor which placed them in the happiest of commonwealths and inspired them with religious ideas which they hope are the truest. If they are wrong in this, and if there is some sort of society or religion more acceptable to God, they pray that he will, in his goodness, reveal it to them, for they are ready to follow wherever he leads them. But if their form of society is the best and their religion the truest, then they pray that God will keep them steadfast, and bring other mortals to the same way of life and the same religious faith—unless, indeed, there is something in this variety of religions which delights his inscrutable will.

Then they pray that after an easy death God will receive each of them to himself, how soon or how late it is not for them to say. But, if God's divine majesty so please, they ask to be brought to him soon, even by the hardest possible death, rather than be kept away from him longer, even by the most prosperous of earthly careers. When this prayer has been said, they prostrate themselves on the ground again; then after a little while they rise and go to lunch. The rest of the day they pass in games and military training.

Now I have described to you as accurately as I could the structure of that commonwealth which I consider not only the best but indeed the only one that can rightfully claim that name. In other places men talk very liberally of the commonwealth, but what they mean is simply their own wealth; in Utopia, where there is no private business, every man zealously pursues the public business. And in both places people are right to act as they do. For among us, even though the commonwealth may flourish, there are very few who do not know that unless they make separate provision for themselves, they may perfectly well die of hunger. Bitter necessity, then, forces them to look out for themselves rather than for others, that is, for the people. But in Utopia, where everything belongs to everybody, no one need fear that, so long as the public warehouses are filled, anyone will ever lack for anything he needs. For the distribution of goods is not niggardly; in Utopia no one is poor, there are no beggars, and though no one owns anything, everyone is rich.

For what can be greater riches than to live joyfully and peacefully, free from all anxieties, and without worries about making a living? No man is bothered by his wife's querulous complaints about money, no man fears poverty for his son, or struggles to scrape up a dowry for his daughter. Everyone can feel secure of his own livelihood and happiness and of his whole family's as well: wife, sons, grandsons, great-grandsons, great-great-grandsons, and that whole long line of descendants that gentlefolk are so fond of contemplating. Indeed, even those who once worked but can do so no longer are cared for just as well as if they were still productive.

Now here I'd like to see anyone try to compare this justice of the Utopians with the so-called justice that prevails among other peoples—among whom let me perish if I can discover the slightest scrap of justice or fairness. What kind of justice is it when a nobleman or a goldsmith or a moneylender, or someone else who makes his living by doing either nothing at all or something completely useless to the public, gets to live a life of luxury and grandeur? In the meantime, a laborer, a carter, a carpenter, or a farmer works so hard and so constantly that even a beast of burden would perish under the load. Although this work of theirs is so necessary that no commonwealth could survive a year without it, they earn so meager a living and lead such miserable lives that a beast of burden would really seem to be better off. Beasts do not have to work every minute, and their food is not much worse; in fact they like it better. And besides, they do not have to worry about their future. But workingmen not only have to sweat and suffer without present reward, but agonize over the prospect of a penniless old age. Their daily wage is inadequate even for their present needs, so there is no possible chance of their saving toward the future.

Now isn't this an unjust and ungrateful commonwealth? It lavishes rich rewards on so-called gentry, goldsmiths, and the rest of that crew, who don't work at all or are mere parasites, purveyors of empty pleasures. And yet it makes no provision whatever for the welfare of farmers and colliers, laborers, carterers, and carpenters, without whom the commonwealth would simply cease to exist. After society has taken the labor of their best years, when they are worn out by age and sickness and utter destitution, then the thankless commonwealth, forgetting all their pains and services, throws them out to die a miserable death. What is worse, the rich constantly try to grind out of the poor part of their meager wages, not only by private swindling but by public laws. It is basically unjust that people who deserve most from the commonwealth should receive least. But now they have distorted and debased the right even further by giving their extortion the color of law; and thus they have palmed injustice off as 'legal.' When I run over in my mind the various commonwealths flourishing today, so help me God, I can see in them nothing but a conspiracy of the rich, who are fattening up their own interests under the name and title of the commonwealth. They invent ways and means to hang onto whatever they have acquired by sharp practice, and then they scheme to oppress the poor by buying up their toil and labor as cheaply as possible. These devices become law as soon as the rich, speaking for the commonwealth—which, of course, includes the poor as well—say they must be observed.

And yet, when these insatiably greedy and evil men have divided among themselves goods which would have sufficed for the entire people, how far they remain from the happiness of the Utopians, who have abolished not only money but with it greed! What a mass of trouble was uprooted by that one step! What a multitude of crimes was pulled up by the roots! Everyone knows that if money were abolished, fraud, theft, robbery, quarrels, brawls, seditions, murders, treasons, poisonings, and a whole set of crimes which are avenged but not prevented by the hangman would at once die out. If money disappeared, so would fear, anxiety, worry, toil, and sleepless nights. Even poverty, which seems to need money more than anything else for its relief, would vanish if money were entirely done away with.

Consider, if you will, this example. Take a barren year of failed harvests, when many thousands of people have been carried off by famine. If at the end of the scarcity the barns of the rich were searched, I dare say positively that enough grain would be found in them to have saved the lives of all those who died from starvation and disease, if it had been divided equally among them. Nobody really need have suffered from a bad harvest at all. So easily might people get the necessities of life if that cursed money, which is supposed to provide access to them, were not in fact the chief barrier to our getting what we need to live. Even the rich, I'm sure, understand this. They must know that it’s better to have enough of what we really need than an abundance of superfluities, much better to escape from our many present troubles than to be burdened with great masses of wealth. And in fact I have no doubt that every man’s perception of where his true interest lies, along with the authority of Christ our Savior (whose wisdom could not fail to recognize the best, and whose goodness would not fail to counsel it), would long ago have brought the whole world to adopt Utopian laws, if it were not for one single monster, the prime plague and begetter of all others—I mean Pride.

Pride measures her advantages not by what she has but by what other people lack. Pride would not condescend even to be made a goddess, if there were no wretches for her to sneer at and domineer over. Her good fortune is dazzling only by contrast with the miseries of others, her riches are valuable only as they torment and tantalize the poverty of others. Pride is a serpent from hell which twines itself around the hearts of men; and it acts like the suckfish3 in holding them back from choosing a better way of life.

Pride is too deeply fixed in human nature to be easily plucked out. So I am glad that the Utopians at least have been lucky enough to achieve this commonwealth, which I wish all mankind would imitate. The institutions they have adopted have made their community most happy, and as far as anyone can tell, capable of lasting forever. Now that they have rooted up the seeds of ambition and faction at home, along with most other vices, they are in no danger from internal strife, which alone has been the ruin of many cities that seemed secure. As long as they preserve harmony at home, and keep their institutions healthy, the Utopians can never be overcome or even shaken by the envious princes of neighboring countries, who have often attempted their ruin, but always in vain.

When Raphael had finished his story, I was left thinking that not a few of the customs and laws he had described as existing among the Utopians were quite absurd. Their methods of waging war, their religious practices, and their social customs were some of these, but my chief objection was to the basis of their whole system, that is, their communal living and their moneyless economy. This one thing alone takes away all the nobility, magnificence, splendor, and majesty which (in the popular view) are the true ornaments of any commonwealth. But I saw Raphael was tired with talking, and I was not sure he could take contradiction in these matters, particularly when I remembered what he had said about certain people who were afraid they might not appear wise unless they found out something to criticize in the ideas of others.

So with praise for the Utopian way of life and his account of it, I took him by the hand and led him in to supper. But first I said that we would find some other time for thinking of these matters more deeply, and for talking them over in more detail. And I still hope such an opportunity will present itself some day.

Meanwhile, though he is a man of unquestioned learning, and highly experienced in the ways of the world, I cannot agree with everything he said. Yet I freely confess there are very many things in the Commonwealth of Utopia that in our own societies I would wish rather than expect to see.

Thomas More to His Friend Peter Giles, Warmest Greetings

My dear Peter, I was absolutely delighted with the opinion of that very sharp man whom you know. He posed this dilemma about my Utopia: if the story is put forward as true, he said, then I see a number of absurdities in it; but if it’s a fable, then it seems to me that in various respects More’s usual good judgment is at fault. I suspect this fellow of being learned, and I see that he’s a friend; but whoever he is, my dear Peter, I’m much obliged to him. By this frank opinion of his, he has pleased me more than anyone else since the book was published.

For in the first place, either out of devotion to me or interest in the subject itself, he seems to have borne up under the burden of reading the book all the way through—and that not perfunctorily or hastily, the way priests read the divine office—those, at least, who read it at all. No, he read slowly and attentively, noting all the particular points. Then, having singled out certain matters for criticism, and not very many, as a matter of fact, he gives careful and considered approval to the rest. And finally, in the very expressions he uses to criticize me, he implies higher praises than some of those who have put all their energies into compliment. It’s easy to see what a high opinion he has of me when he expresses disappointment over reading something imperfect or inexact—whereas I don’t expect, in treating so many different matters, to be able to say more than a few things which aren’t totally ridiculous.

Still, I’d like to be just as frank with him as he was with me; and, in fact, I don’t see why he should think himself so acute (so “sharp-sighted,” as the Greeks would say) just because he’s discovered some absurdities in the institutions of Utopia, or caught me putting forth some half-baked ideas about the constitution of a republic. Aren’t there any absurdities elsewhere in the world? And haven’t most of the philosophers who’ve written about society, a ruler, or even the office of a private citizen, managed to say something that needs correcting?

But when he wonders whether Utopia is true or a fiction, then I find his judgment, in turn, sorely at fault. It’s perfectly possible that if I’d decided to write about a commonwealth, and a fable of this sort had occurred to me, I might have spread a little fiction, like so much honey, over the truth, to make it more acceptable. But I would certainly have tempered the fiction so that, while it deceived the common folk, I gave hints to the more learned which would enable them to see what I was about. So, if I'd done nothing but give special names to the governor, the river, the city, and the island, which hinted to the learned that the island was nowhere, the city a phantom, the river waterless, and that the governor had no people,\(^3\) that would not have been hard to do, and would have been far more clever than what I actually did. Unless I had a historian's devotion to fact, I am not so stupid as to have used those barbarous and senseless names of Utopia, Anyder, Amaurot, and Ademus.

Still, my dear Giles, I see some people are so suspicious that what we naive fellows have written down of Hythloday's account can hardly find any credence at all with these circumspect and sagacious persons. I'm afraid my personal reputation, as well as my authority as a historian, may be threatened by their skepticism; so it's a good thing that I can defend myself by saying, as Terence's Mysis says about Glycerium's boy, to confirm his legitimacy: "Praise be to God there were some free women present at his birth."\(^4\) And so it was a good thing for me that Raphael told his story not just to you and me, but to a great many perfectly respectable and serious-minded men. Whether he told them more things, and more important things, I don't know; but I'm sure he told them no fewer and no less important things than he told us.

Well, if these doubters won't believe such witnesses, let them consult Hythloday himself, for he is not yet dead. I heard only recently from some travelers coming out of Portugal that on the first of last March he was as healthy and vigorous a man as he ever was. Let them get the truth from him—dig it out of him with questions, if they want. I only want them to understand that I'm responsible for my own work, and my own work alone, not for anyone else's credibility.

Farewell, my dearest Peter, to you, your lovely wife, and your delightful little girl—to all, my wife sends her very best wishes.

Wife of a London merchant and mistress of the late king, Edward IV, she was persecuted by his brother Richard, duke of Gloucester, who had been named protector (regent) during the minority of Edward's sons. After immuring them in the Tower of London (where they disappeared forever) he ascended the throne as Richard III.

the thing that herself could not deny, that all the world wist was true, and that natheles? every man laughed at to hear it then so suddenly so highly taken, that she was naught of her body. And for this cause (as a goodly continent prince clean and faultless of himself, sent out of heaven into this vicious world for the amendment of men's manners) he caused the bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the cross in procession upon a Sunday with a taper in her hand. In which she went in countenance and pace demure, so womanly, and albeit she were out of all array save her kirtle only, yet went she so fair and lovely, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comely rud in her cheeks (of which she before had most miss), that her great shame won her much praise among those that were more amorous of her body than curious of her soul. And many good folk also that hated her living and glad were to see sin corrected, yet pitied they more her penance than rejoiced therein, when they considered that the protector procured it more of a corrupt intent than any virtuous affection.

This woman was born in London, worshipfully friended, honestly brought up, and very well married, saving somewhat too soon, her husband an honest citizen, young and goodly and of good substance. But forasmuch as they were coupled ere she were well ripe, she not very fervently loved for whom she never longed. Which was haply the thing that the more easily made her incline unto the king's appetite when he required her. Howbeit, the respect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparel, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth was able soon to pierce a soft tender heart. But when the king had abused her, anon her husband (as he was an honest man and one that could his good, not presuming to touch a king's concubine) left her up to him altogether. When the king died, the lord chamberlain took her, which in the king's days, albeit he was sore enamored upon her, yet he forbare her, either for reverence or for a certain friendly faithfulness.

Proper she was, and fair: nothing in her body that you would have changed, but if you would have wished her somewhat higher. Thus say they that knew her in her youth, albeit some that now see her (for yet she liveth) deem her never to have been well-visaged. Whose judgment seemeth me somewhat like as though men should guess the beauty of one long before departed, by her scalp taken out of the charnel house; for now is she old, lean, withered, and dried up, nothing left but rivelled skin and hard bone. And yet, being even such, whoso well advise her visage might guess and devise which parts how filled would make it a fair face.

Yet delighted not men so much in her beauty as in her pleasant behavior.
For a proper wit had she, and could both read well and write, merry in company, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure and not without disport. The king would say that he had three concubines, which in three diverse properties diversely excelled: one the merriest, another the wiliest, the third the holiest harlot in his realm, as one whom no man could get out of the church lightly to any place but it were to his bed. The other two were somewhat greater personages, and natheles of their humility content to be nameless and to forbear the praise of those properties. But the merriest was this Shore’s wife, in whom the king therefore took special pleasure. For many he had, but her he loved, whose favor, to say the truth (for sin it were to belie the devil), she never abused to any man’s hurt, but to many a man’s comfort and relief. Where the king took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind. Where men were out of favor, she would bring them in his grace. For many that had highly offended, she obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures she gat men remission. And finally, in many weighty suits she stood many men in great stead, either for none or very small rewards, and those rather gay than rich, either for that she was content with the deed’ self well done, or for that she delighted to be sued unto and to show what she was able to do with the king; or for that wanton women and wealthy be not alway covetous.

I doubt not some shall think this woman too slight a thing to be written of and set among the remembrances of great matters, which they shall specially think that haply shall esteem her only by that they now see her. But meseemeth the chance so much the more worthy to be remembered, in how much she is now in the more beggarly condition, unfriended and worn out of acquaintance, after good substance, after as great favor with the prince, after as great suit and seeking to with all those that those days had business to speed, as many other men were in their times which be now famous only by the infamy of their ill deeds. Her doings were not much less, albeit they be much less remembered because they were not so evil. For men use if they have an evil turn to write it in marble; and whoso doth us a good turn, we write it in dust; which is not worst proved by her; for at this day she beggeth of many at this day living, that at this day had begged if she had not been.

SIR THOMAS WYATT THE ELDER
1503–1542

Thomas Wyatt made his career in the shifting, dangerous currents of Renaissance courts, and court culture, with its power struggles, sexual intrigues, and sophisticated tastes, shaped his remarkable achievements as a poet. Educated at St. John’s College, Cambridge, Wyatt entered the service of Henry VIII, becoming clerk of the king’s jewels, a member of diplomatic missions to France and the Low Countries, and, in 1537–39, ambassador to Spain at the court of the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V. The years he spent abroad as a diplomat had a significant impact upon his writing,
Harry: The Elder / 593

most obvious in his translations and imitations of poems by the Italian Renaissance writers Serafino, Aretino, Sannazaro, Alamanni, and, above all, Petrarch. Diplomacy, with its veiled threats, subtle indirection, and cynical role-playing, may have had a more indirect impact as well, reinforcing the lessons in self-display and self-concealment that Wyatt would have received at the English court.

Life in the orbit of the ruthless, unpredictable Henry VIII was competitive and risky. When, in the late 1530s, Wyatt wrote to his son of the "thousand dangers and hazards, enmities, hatreds, imprisonments, despeites, and indignations" he had faced, he was not exaggerating. He probably came closest to the executioner's axe when in 1536 he was imprisoned in the Tower of London along with several others accused of having committed adultery with the queen, Anne Boleyn. As his poem "Who list his wealth and ease retain" suggests, Wyatt may have watched from his cell the execution of the queen and her alleged lovers; but he himself was spared, as he was spared a few years later, when he was again imprisoned in the Tower on charges of high treason brought by his enemies at court. His death, at the age of thirty-nine, came from a fever.

It is not surprising, given his career, that many of Wyatt's poems, including his satires and his psalm translations, express an intense longing for "steadfastness" and an escape from the corruption, anxiety, and duplicity of the court. The praise, in his verse epistle to John Poins, of a quiet retired life in the country and the harsh condemnation of courtly hypocrisy derive from his own experience. But of course the eloquent celebration of simplicity and truthfulness can itself be a cunning strategy. Wyatt was a master of the game of poetic self-display. Again and again he represents himself as a plain-speaking and steadfast man, betrayed by the "doubleness" of a fickle mistress or the instability of fortune. At this distance it is impossible to know how much this account corresponds to reality, but we can admire, as Wyatt's contemporaries did, the rhetorical deftness of the performance.

In a move with momentous consequences for English poetry, Wyatt introduced into English the sonnet, a fourteen-line poem in iambic pentameter with a complex, intertwining rhyme scheme. For the most part, he took his subject matter from Petrarch's sonnets, but his rhyme schemes make a significant departure. Petrarch's sonnets consist of an "octave," rhyming abbaabba, followed, after a turn (volta) in the sense, by a "sestet" with various rhyme schemes (such as cd cd cd and cde cde) that have in common their avoidance of a rhyming couplet at the end. Wyatt employs the Petrarchan octave, but his most common sestet scheme is cddc ee, the Petrarchan sonnet was already beginning to change into the characteristic 'English' structure for the sonnet, three quatrains and a closing couplet. (For the Italian originals of the Petrarchan sonnets translated in our selection, as well as additional poems by Wyatt, go to Norton Literature Online.)

In his freest translations of Petrarchan sonnets, such as 'Whoso list to hunt,' Wyatt tends to turn the idealizing of the woman into disillusionment and complaint. For the lover in Petrarch's poems, love is a transcendent experience; for the lover in Wyatt's poems, it is obsessive and embittering. The tone of bitterness carries over to many poems less closely linked to Italian and French models, poems with short stanzas and refrains in the manner of the native English 'ballet' (pronounced to rhyme with mallet) or dance-song. Some of the ballets, to be sure, strike a note of jaunty independence, often tinged with misogyny, but melancholy complaint is rarely very distant. Perhaps the poem that most brilliantly captures Wyatt's blend of passion, anger, cynicism, longing, and pain is "They flee from me."

Though Wyatt's representations of women are often cynical, it is clear that aristocratic women played a key role in the reception and preservation of his poetry. Women were not excluded from the courtly game of ballet-making. The Devonshire Manuscript, one of the chief sources for Wyatt's poetry, contains a number of poems that were probably by women, many more transcribed by female hands, and some male-authored poems written in a female voice, as well as any number of misogynist verses, by Wyatt and others.
Wyatt never published a collection of his own poems, and very title of his verse appeared in print during his lifetime. In 1557 (fifteen years after his death), the printer Richard Tottel included 97 poems attributed to Wyatt among the 271 poems in his miscellany, Songs and Sonnets. Wyatt was not primarily concerned with regularity of accent and smoothness of rhythm. By the time Tottel's collection was published, Wyatt's deliberately rough, vigorous, and expressive metrical practice was felt to be crude, and Tottel (or perhaps some intermediary) smoothed out the versification. We reprint "They flee from me" both in Tottel's "improved" version and in the version found in the Egerton Manuscript, a manuscript that contains poems in Wyatt's own hand and corrections he made to scribal copies of his poems. Unlike the Egerton Manuscript (E. MS.), the Devonshire Manuscript (D. MS.) was not apparently in the poet's possession, but some of its texts seem earlier than Egerton's, and it furnishes additional poems, as do the Blage Manuscript (B. MS.) and the Arundel Manuscript (A. MS.).

In the following selections we have indicated the manuscript from which each of the poems derives and divided the poems into three generic groups: sonnets, other lyrics, and finally a satire. Within each of the first two groups, the poems are printed in the order in which they appear in the manuscripts. There is no reason to think that this is a chronological ordering.*

The long love that in my thought doth harbor

The long love that in my thought doth harbor,
And in mine heart doth keep his residence,
Into my face presseth with bold pretense
And therein campeth, spreading his banner.
She that me learneth to love and suffer
And will that my trust and lust's negligence
Be reined by reason, shame, and reverence,
With his hardiness taketh displeasure.
Wherewithal unto the heart's forest he fleeth,
Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry,
And there him hideth, and not appeareth.
What may I do, when my master feareth,
But in the field with him to live and die?
For good is the life ending faithfully.

Petrarch, Rima 140

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

Love, who lives and reigns in my thought and keeps his principal seat in my heart, sometimes comes forth all in armor into my forehead, there camps, and there sets up his banner.

1. Wyatt's version of poem 140 of Petrarch's Rime sparse (Scattered rhymes); his younger friend the earl of Surrey also translated it (p. 608).
2. I.e., the speaker's blush. The first four lines of this sonnet introduce the "conceit" (elaborately sustained metaphor) of Love as a warrior who, "with bold pretense" (i.e., making bold claim), flaunts his presence by means of the "banner." Elaborate metaphors of this kind are common in Petrarchan (and Elizabethan) love poetry, and often, as in this instance, an entire sonnet will turn on a single conceit.
3. I.e., my open and careless revelation of my love.

She who teaches us to love and to be patient, and wishes my great desire, my kindled hope, to be reined in by reason, shame, and reverence, at our boldness is angry within herself.

Wherefore Love flees terrified to my heart, abandoning his every enterprise, and weeps and trembles; there he hides and no more appears outside.

What can I do, when my lord is afraid, except stay with him until the last hour? For he makes a good end who dies loving well.

Whoso list to hunt

Whoso list to hunt, I know where is an hind, cares /female deer
But as for me, alas, I may no more.
The vain travail hath wearied me so sore, labor
I am of them that farthest cometh behind.
Yet may I, by no means, my wearied mind
Draw from the deer, but as she fleeth afore, Fainting I follow. I leave off, therefore,
Since in a net I seek to hold the wind.
Who list her hunt, I put him out of doubt, assure him
As well as I, may spend his time in vain.
And graven with diamonds in letters plain
There is written, her fair neck round about,
"Noli me tangere, for Caesar’s I am,
And wild for to hold, though I seem tame."

Petrarch, Rima 190

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

A white doe on the green grass appeared to me, with two golden horns, between two rivers, in the shade of a laurel, when the sun was rising in the unripe season.

Her look was so sweet and proud that to follow her I left every task, like the miser who as he seeks treasure sweetens his trouble with delight.

"Let no one touch me," she bore written with diamonds and topazes around her lovely neck. "It has pleased my Caesar to make me free."

And the sun had already turned at midday; my eyes were tired by looking but not sated, when I fell into the water, and she disappeared.

1. An adaptation of Petrarch's Rima 190, perhaps influenced by commentators on Petrarch, who said that Noli me tangere quia Caesaris sum ("Touch me not, for I am Caesar's") was inscribed on the collars of Caesar’s hinds, which were then set free and were presumably safe from hunters. Wyatt’s sonnet is usually supposed to refer to Anne Boleyn, in whom Henry VIII became interested in 1526.
Farewell, Love

Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever,
Thy baited hooks shall tangle me no more;
Senec and Plato call me from thy lore,
To perfect wealth my wit for to endeavor.¹

In blind error when I did persever,
Thy sharp repulse, that pricketh aye so sore,
Hath taught me to set in trifles no store,
And 'scape forth since liberty is lever.²

Therefore farewell, go trouble younger hearts,
And in me claim no more authority;
With idle youth go use thy property,
And thereon spend thy many brittle darts.²

For hitherto though I have lost all my time,
Me Iusteth no longer rotten boughs to climb.

I find no peace¹

I find no peace, and all my war is done,
I fear and hope, I burn and freeze like ice,
I fly above the wind, yet can I not arise,
And naught I have, and all the world I seize on.

That¹ looseth nor locketh holdeth me in prison,
And holdeth me not, yet can I 'scape nowise;
Nor letteth me live nor die at my devise,
Nor of death it giveth me occasion.

Without eyen² I see, and without tongue I plain;²
I desire to perish, and yet I ask health;
I love another, and thus I hate myself;
I feed me in sorrow, and laugh in all my pain.

Likewise displeaseth me both death and life,
And my delight is causer of this strife.

Petrarch, Rima 134

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

Peace I do not find, and I have no wish to make war; and I fear and hope, and burn am of ice; and I fly above the heavens and lie on the ground; and I grasp nothing and embrace all the world.

1. I.e., 'Senec' (Seneca, the Roman moral philosopher and tragedian) and Plato call him to educate his mind ('wit') to perfect well-being ('wealth').
2. Do what you characteristically do.
3. Translated from Petrarch's Rima 134.
4. Complain; lament.
One has me in prison who neither opens nor locks, neither keeps me for his own nor unties the bonds; and Love does not kill and does not unchain me, he neither wishes me alive nor frees me from the tangle.

I see without eyes, and I have no tongue and yet cry out; and I wish to perish and I ask for help; and I hate myself and love another.

I feed on pain, weeping I laugh; equally displeasing to me are death and life. In this state am I, Lady, on account of you.

My galley

My galley charged with forgetfulness
Thorough sharp seas, in winter nights doth pass
'Tween rock and rock; and eke* mine enemy, alas,
That is my lord, steereth with cruelness;
And every oar a thought in readiness,
As though that death were light in such a case.º
An endless wind doth tear the sail spaceº
Of forced sighs and trusty fearfulness.º
A rain of tears, a cloud of dark disdain,
Hath done the wearied cords great hinderance;
Wreathed* with error and eke with ignorance.
The stars be hid that led me to this pain.
Drowned is reason that should me consort,º
And I remain despairing of the port.

Petrarch, Rima 189

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

My ship laden with forgetfulness passes through a harsh sea, at midnight, in winter, between Scylla and Charybdis, and at the tiller sits my lord, rather my enemy:

each oar is manned by a ready, cruel thought that seems to scorn the tempest and the end; a wet, changeless wind of sighs, hopes, and desires breaks the sail;

a rain of weeping, a mist of disdain wet and loosen the already weary ropes, made of error twisted up with ignorance.

My two usual sweet stars are hidden; dead among the waves are reason and skill; so that I begin to despair of the port.

1. Translated from Petrarch’s Rima 189. For
2. I.e., obliviousness of everything except love.
3. As though my destruction would not matter much.

They flee from me

They flee from me, that sometime did me seek
With naked foot stalking in my chamber.
I have seen them gentle, tame, and meek
That now are wild and do not remember
To take bread at my hand; and now they range,
Busily seeking with a continual change.

I fain would know what she hath deserved.

The Lover Showeth How He Is Forsaken of Such as He Sometimes Enjoyed

[THEY FLEE FROM ME]

They flee from me, that sometime did me seek
With naked foot stalking within my chamber.
Once have I seen them gentle, tame, and meek
That now are wild and do not once remember
That sometime they have put themselves in danger
To take bread at my hand; and now they range,
Busily seeking in continual change.

Thanked be fortune, it hath been otherwise
Twenty times better; but once especial,

In thin array, after a pleasant guise,
When her loose gown did from her shoulders fall,

And therewithal so sweetly did me kiss
And softly said, "Dear heart, how like you this?"

It was no dream, for I lay broad awaking.
But all is turned now, through my gentleness,
Into a bitter fashion of forsaking;
And I have leave to go, of her goodness,
And she also to use newfangledness.

But since that I unkindly so am served,
How like you this? What hath she now deserved?

TOTTLE, 1557

My lute, awake!

My lute, awake! Perform the last
Labor that thou and I shall waste,
And end that I have now begun:
For when this song is sung and past,

My lute be still, for I have done.

As to be heard where ear is none,
As lead to grave in marble stone,1
My song may pierce her heart as soon.
Should we then sigh or sing or moan?

No, no, my lute, for I have done.

The rocks do not so cruelly
Repulse the waves continually
As she my suit and affection.

1. I.e., when sound may be heard with no ear to hear it or when soft lead is able to carve ("grave") hard marble.
So that I am past remedy,
15 Whereby my lute and I have done.

Proud of the spoil that thou hast got
Of simple hearts, thorough Love's shot,
By whom, unkind, thou hast them won,
Think not he hath his bow forgot,
20 Although my lute and I have done.

Vengeance shall fall on thy disdain
That makest but game on earnest pain.
Think not alone under the sun
Unquitt\(^2\) to cause thy lovers plain,\(^6\)  unrevenged / to complain
25 Although my lute and I have done.

Perchance thee lie\(^2\) withered and old
The winter nights that are so cold,
Plaining in vain unto the moon.
Thy wishes then dare not be told.
30 Care then who list,\(^6\) for I have done.

And then may chance thee to repent
The time that thou hast lost and spent
To cause thy lovers sigh and swoon.
Then shalt thou know beauty but lent,
35 And wish and want as I have done.

Now cease, my lute. This is the last
Labor that thou and I shall waste,
And ended is that we begun.
Now is this song both sung and past;
40 My lute be still, for I have done.

Forget not yet

Forget not yet the tried intent
Of such a truth\(^6\) as I have meant, fidelity
My great travail so gladly spent,
Forget not yet.

5 Forget not yet when first began
The weary life ye know since when.
The suit,\(^9\) the service\(^1\) none tell can, pursuit, -wooing
Forget not yet.

Forget not yet the great essays,\(^6\) trials

10 The cruel wrong, the scornful ways,

\(^2\) Perhaps it may befall you to lie.
\(^1\) Actions of a lover, often called the lady's "servant."
The painful patience in denays,\textsuperscript{6} denials, refusals
Forget not yet.

Forget not yet, forget not this,
How long ago hath been and is 15  The mind that never meant amiss,
Forget not yet.

Forget not then thine own approved,
The which so long hath thee so loved,
Whose steadfast faith yet never moved,
20  Forget not this.

Blame not my lute

Blame not my lute, for he must sound
Of this or that as liketh\textsuperscript{6} me:
For lack of wit\textsuperscript{7} the lute is bound
To give such tunes as pleaseth me.
5  Though my songs be somewhat strange,
And speaks such words as touch thy change,\textsuperscript{8}
Blame not my lute.

My lute, alas, doth not offend,
Though that perforce\textsuperscript{9} he must agree
To sound such tunes as I intend
To sing to them that heareth me.
10  Though my songs be somewhat plain,
And toucheth some that use to feign,\textsuperscript{1} Blame not my lute.

My lute and strings may not deny,
But as I strike they must obey:
Break not them then so wrongfully,
And though the songs which I indite\textsuperscript{9}
20  Do quit thy change\textsuperscript{2} with rightful spite,
Blame not my lute.

Spite asketh\textsuperscript{8} spite, and changing change,
And falsed faith must needs be known;
The fault so great, the case so strange,
25  Of right it must abroad be blown.
Then since that by thine own desert
My songs do tell how true thou art,
Blame not my lute.

I. And comment on some who are accustomed to dissemble.
2. Require your unfaithfulness.
Who list his wealth and ease retain

Blame but thyself, that hast misdone
And well deserved to have blame;
Change thou thy way so evil begun,
And then my lute shall sound that same.
But if till then my fingers play
By thy desert their wonted way,

Blame not my lute.

Farewell, unknown, for though thou break
My strings in spite with great disdain,
Yet have I found out for thy sake
Strings for to string my lute again.

If perchance this foolish rhyme
Do make thee blush at any time,
Blame not my lute.

Stand whoso list

Stand whoso list upon the slippery top
Of court's estates, and let me here rejoice
And use me quiet without let or stop,
Unknown in court, that hath such brackish joys.

In hidden place so let my days forth pass
That when my years be done withouten noise,
I may die aged after the common trace.

For him death grippeth right hard by the crop
That is much known of other, and of himself, alas,

Doth die unknown, dazed, with dreadful face.

6. I.e., intelligence does not help one earn ("yerne") a defense, [nor does it help] to plead or prattle about one's innocence.
7. Let God do the steering. "Bear low": be humble.
8. Poins was a friend of Wyatt's. This verse epistle of informal satire is based on the tenth satire of the Italian Luigi Alamanni but is personalized and Anglicized in detail by Wyatt. It was apparently written during Wyatt's banishment from court in 1536. Lines 1—52 of the poem are missing from the authoritative Egerton Manuscript and are here supplied from the Devonshire Manuscript.
2. I.e., my retirement from court is not because I scorn the powerful, or their prerogatives of rule and punishment. But I esteem them less than do the "common sort" of people, who judge by externals only (lines 10-13).

4. I.e., cannot pretend that black is not black.

I cannot crouch nor kneel nor do so great a wrong
To worship them like God on earth alone
That are as wolves these sely\(^6\) lambs among,

Nor turn the word that from my mouth is gone;
I cannot speak and look like a saint,
Use wiles for wit\(^7\) and make deceit a pleasure,

And in foul weather at my book to sit;
In frost and snow then with my bow to stalk.
No man doth mark\(^*\) whereso I ride or go.
In lusty leas\(^*\) at liberty I walk,
And of these news I feel nor weal nor woe,
Save that a clog doth hang yet at my heel.\(^*\)
No force\(^*\) for that, for it is ordered so
That I may leap both hedge and dike full well.
I am not now in France, to judge the wine,
With sav'ry sauce the delicates\(^*\) to feel;
Nor yet in Spain, where one must him incline,
Rather than to be, outwardly to seem.
I meddle not with wits that be so fine;
Nor Flanders' cheer\(^\) letteth\(^\) not my sight to deem
Of black and white, nor taketh my wit away
With beastliness they, beasts, do so esteem.
Nor am I not where Christ is given in prey
For money, poison, and treason—at Rome\(^*\)
A common practice, used night and day.
But here I am in Kent and Christendom,
Among the Muses, where I read and rhyme;
Where if thou list, my Poins, for to come,
Thou shalt be judge how I do spend my time.

HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY
1517-1547

The axe that decapitated Surrey at the age of thirty had been hanging over his head for much of his life. In the court of Henry VIII, it was dangerous to be a potential claimant to the throne, and Surrey was descended from kings on both sides of his family. He was brought up at Windsor Castle as the close companion of Henry VIII's illegitimate son, the duke of Richmond, who married Surrey's sister. As the eldest son of the duke of Norfolk, the chief bulwark of the old Catholic aristocracy against the rising tide of "new men" and the reformed religion, Surrey was the heir not only to the Howard family's great wealth but also to their immense pride, their sense at once of noble privilege and of obligation. Like his father and grandfather, he was a brave and able soldier, serving in Henry VIII's French wars as "Lieutenant General of the King on Sea and Land." He was also repeatedly imprisoned for rash behavior, on one occasion for striking a courtier, on another for wandering through the streets of London breaking the windows of sleeping townspeople. In 1541 Surrey used his family connections—his first cousin, Catherine Howard, was queen—to secure the release from the Tower of his close friend, the poet Thomas Wyatt, who had been accused of treason. But a year later, Catherine Howard was executed for adultery, like Anne Boleyn before her. Power returned to the rival family of the former queen Jane Seymour, who had died in childbirth giving a son and heir to the aging Henry VIII. Surrey's situation was already precarious, and his vocal opposition to the Seymours, with their strong Protestant leanings, sealed his fate. Convicted of treason, he had the grim distinction of being Henry's last victim.

Poets and critics of the later sixteenth century, fascinated by Surrey's noble rank and his tragic fate, routinely praised him as one of the very greatest English poets. The full title of Tottel's influential miscellany, published in 1557 (ten years after Surrey's death), is Songs and Sonnets written by the Right Honorable Lord Henry Howard Late Earl of Surrey and Other. The principal "other" here is his older friend Wyatt, with whose poetry Surrey's is closely linked. Poets who circulated their verse in manuscript in a courtly milieu, both shared a passion for French and Italian poetry, especially for Petrarch's sonnets. Surrey established a form for these that was used by Shakespeare and that has become known as the English sonnet: three quatrains and a couplet, all in iambic pentameter and rhyming abab cdcd efef gg. Even more significant, he was the first English poet to publish in blank verse—unrhymed iambic pentameter—a verse form so popular in the succeeding centuries that it has come to seem almost indigenous to the language. The work in which he used his "strange meter," as the publisher called it, was a translation of part of Virgil's Aeneid. Managing the five-stress line with exceptional skill, Surrey initiated the rhythmic fluency that distinguishes so many Elizabethan lyrics. It is striking that his two great literary innovations, the English sonnet and blank verse, should emerge in the same period that saw radical upheavals in traditional religious and social life. It is possible that he was drawn to Virgil's epic because it offered a model of continuity in the face of disaster. Aeneas cannot prevent the fall of Troy, but he goes on to establish a new world without abandoning his old values.

As a conventional love poet Surrey is not very convincing: in 1593 Thomas Nashe wrote sardonically that Surrey "was more in love with his own curious forming fancy" than with this mistress's face. His verse comes alive when he writes about his deep male friendships ("So cruel prison" and the moving epitaph he published on Wyatt), or imagines himself as a woman longing for her absent man ("O happy dames"), or employs his new sonnet form in a savage attack on the "womanish delight" of an unmanly king ("Th'Assyrians' king").

The soote season'

The soote season, that bud and bloom forth brings, sweet, fragrant also
With green hath clad the hill and eke the vale.
The nightingale with feathers new she sings; turtledove to her mate
The turtle to her mate hath told her tale. Summer is come, for every spray now springs.
The hart hath hung his old head on the pale; fence, paling
The buck in brake hath his winter coat he flings; thicket
The fishes float with new repaired scale;
The adder all her slough away she slings; cast-off skin
The swift swallow pursueth the flies small;
The busy bee her honey now she mingles. harm
Winter is worn, that was the flowers' bale. And thus I see among these pleasant things,
Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs.

Petrarch, Rima 310

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION'

Zephyrus returns and leads back the fine weather and the flowers and the grass, his sweet family, and chattering Procne and weeping Philomena, and Spring, all white and vermilion; the meadows laugh and the sky becomes clear again, Jupiter is glad dened looking at his daughter, the air and the waters and the earth are full of love, every animal takes counsel again to love.

But to me, alas, come back heavier sighs, which she draws from my deepest heart, she who carried off to Heaven the keys to it;

and the singing of little birds, and the flowering of meadows, and virtuous gentle gestures in beautiful ladies are a wilderness and cruel, savage beasts.

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought'

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought,
And built his seat within my captive breast,

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

Now that the heavens and the earth and the wind are silent, and sleep reins in the beasts and the birds, Night drives her starry car about, and in its bed the sea lies without a wave,

I am awake, I think, I burn, I weep; and she who destroys me is always before me, to my sweet pain: war is my state, full of sorrow and suffering, and only thinking of her do I have any peace.

Thus from one clear living fountain alone spring the sweet and the bitter on which I feed; one hand alone heals me and pierces me.

Th'Assyrians' king, in peace with foul desire
And filthy lust that stained his regal heart,
In war, that should set princely hearts afire,

With words and looks that tigers could but rue,
Where each of us did plead the other's right.

6. In the summer of 1537 Surrey was imprisoned at Windsor Castle for striking a courtier. The poem recalls his boyhood stay there (1530–32) with Henry Fitzroy, illegitimate son of Henry VIII.
The graveled ground, with sleeves tied on the helm, ladies' favors
On foaming horse, with swords and friendly hearts, countenance
With cheer as though the one should overwhelm, spears
Where we have fought and chased oft with darts.

With silver drops the meads yet spread for ruth, pity
In active games of nimbleness and strength,
Where we did strain, trailed by swarms of youth,
Our tender limbs that yet shot up in length.

The secret groves which oft we made resound favor
Of pleasant plaint and of our ladies' praise, success
Recording soft what grace each one had found,
What hope of speed, what dread of long delays.

The wild forest, the clothed holts with green, wooded hills
With reins availed and swift ybreathed horse, slackened
With cry of hounds and merry blasts between, i.e., of the horn
Where we did chase the fearful hart a force.

The void walls eke that harbored us each night, empty / also Wherewith, alas, revive within my breast
The sweet accord, such sleeps as yet delight,
The pleasant dreams, the quiet bed of rest.

And with this thought, the blood forsakes my face,
The tears berain my cheeks of deadly hue,.success
The which as soon as sobbing sighs, alas, Upsupped have, thus I my plaint renew:

"O place of bliss, renewer of my woes, account
Give me accompt, where is my noble fere, Whom in thy walls thou didst each night enclose, account
To other lief, but unto me most dear.

Each stone, alas, that doth my sorrow rue, pity
Returns thereto a hollow sound of plaint.
Thus I alone, where all my freedom grew,
In prison pine with bondage and restraint.

And with remembrance of the greater grief
To banish the less, I find my chief relief.

Whose hammers beat still in that lively brain
As on a stith,\(^9\) where that some work of fame
Was daily wrought to turn to Britain's gain.

A visage stern and mild, where both did grow

Vice to contemn,\(^{10}\)\(^9\) in virtue to rejoice;
Amid great storms whom grace assured so
To live upright and smile at fortune's choice.

A hand that taught what might be said in rhyme,
That refit\(^5\) Chaucer the glory of his wit—\(^2\)
Some may approach, but never none shall hit.

15 A tongue that served in foreign realms his king;
Whose courteous talk to virtue did inflame
Each noble heart: a worthy guide to bring
Our English youth by travail\(^3\) unto fame.

An eye whose judgment none affect\(^{10}\) could blind,\(^9\) no partiality
Friends to allure and foes to reconcile,
Whose piercing look did represent a mind
With virtue fraught, reposed, void of guile.

20 A heart where dread yet never so impressed
To hide the thought that might the truth advance;
In neither fortune loft\(^6\) nor yet repressed\(^8\) elevated / downcast
To swell in wealth or yield unto mischance.

A valiant corpse\(^3\) where force and beauty met,

Happy—alas, too happy, but for foes;
Lived and ran the race that Nature set,
Of manhood's shape, where she the mold did lose.\(^4\)

But to the heavens that simple\(^5\) soul is fled,

Which left, with such as covet Christ to know,
Witness of faith\(^3\) that never shall be dead,
Sent for our health,\(^5\) but not received so.
Thus for our guilt, this jewel have we lost;
The earth his bones, the heavens possess his ghost.\(^{6}\)

O happy dames, that may embrace
The fruit of your delight,
Help to bewail the woeful case
And eke\(^{5}\) the heavy plight
Of me, that wonted\(^{9}\) to rejoice
The fortune of my pleasant choice:
Good ladies, help to fill my mourning voice

In ship, freight\(^{6}\) with rememberance
Of thoughts and pleasures past,
He sails, that hath in governance
My life, while it will last;
With scalding sighs, for lack of gale,
Futhering his hope, that is his sail,
Toward me, the sweet port of his avail.\(^{6}\)

Alas, how oft in dreams I see
Those eyes, that were my food,
Which sometime so delighted me,
That yet they do me good;
Wherewith I wake with his return,
Whose absent flame did make me burn:
But when I find the lack, Lord how I mourn!

When other lovers in arms across\(^{6}\)
Rejoice their chief delight,
Drowned in tears to mourn my loss
I stand the bitter night
In my window, where I may see
Before the winds how the clouds flee.
Lo, what a mariner love hath made me!

And in green waves when the salt flood
Doth rise by rage of wind,
A thousand fancies in that mood
Assail my restless mind.
Alas, now drencheth\(^{6}\) my sweet foe,\(^{2}\)
That with the spoil\(^{6}\) of my heart did go
And left me; but, alas,\(\text{-}\)why did he so?

1. The speaker is a woman. The poem was probably written for Surrey's wife, from whom he was separated while on military duty in France in the 1540s.
2. A conventional expression for a loved one, going back to medieval love poetry.
And when the seas wax calm again,
To chase from me annoy,
My doubtful hope doth cause me plain,
So dread cuts off my joy.

And of each thought a doubt doth grow:
Now he comes! Will he come? Alas, no, no!

Martial, the things for to attain
The happy life be these, I find:
The riches left, not got with pain;
The fruitful ground, the quiet mind;

The equal friend; no grudge nor strife;
No charge of rule, nor governance;
Without disease the healthy life;
The household of continuance;

The mean diet, no delicate fare;
Wisdom joined with simplicity;
The night discharged of all care,
Where wine may bear no sovereignty;

The chaste wife, wise, without debate;
Such sleeps as may beguile the night;

is Contented with thine own estate;
Neither wish death nor fear his might.

Unhappy Dido burns, and in her rage

When, in the late 1520s, the Catholic authorities of England tried to burn all copies of William Tyndale's English translation of the New Testament, they were attempting to stop the spread of what they viewed as a dangerous new plague of heresies. The plague was the Protestant Reformation, a movement opposed to crucial aspects of both the belief system and the institutional structure of Roman Catholicism.

The movement had been launched by the German theologian Martin Luther, who in 1517 challenged the authority of the pope and attacked several key doctrines of the Catholic Church. According to Luther, the Church, with its elaborate hierarchical structure centered in Rome, its rich monasteries and convents, and its enormous political influence, had become hopelessly corrupt, a conspiracy of venal priests who manipulated popular superstitions to enrich themselves and amass worldly power. Luther began by vehemently attacking the sale of indulgences—certificates promising the remission of punishments to be suffered in the afterlife by souls sent to Purgatory to expiate their sins before being allowed into heaven. Purgatory, he argued, had no foundation in Scripture, which in his view was the only legitimate source of religious truth (sola scriptura). Christians would be saved not by scrupulously following the ritual practices fostered by the Catholic Church—observing fast days, reciting the ancient Latin prayers, endowing chantries to say prayers for the dead, invoking the protection of individual saints, and so on—but by faith and faith alone (sola fide).

This challenge spread and gathered force, especially in Northern Europe, where major leaders like the French theologian Calvin (who, after his break with Catholicism, established a theocracy in Geneva) transformed religious institutions and elaborated various and sometimes conflicting doctrinal principles. Calvin, whose thought came to be particularly influential in England, emphasized the obligation of governments to implement God's will in the world. He advanced too the doctrine of predestination by which, as he put it, "God adopts some to hope of life and sentences others to eternal death." God's "secret election" of the saved made Calvin uncomfortable, but his study of the Scriptures had led him to conclude that "only a small number, out of an incalculable multitude, should obtain salvation." It might seem that such a conclusion would lead to passivity or even despair, but for Calvin predestination was a mystery bound up with faith, confidence, and an active engagement in the fashioning of a Christian community.

The Reformation had a direct and powerful impact on those realms where it gained control. Monasteries were sacked, their possessions seized by princes or sold off to the highest bidder; monks and nuns, expelled from their cloisters, were encouraged to break their vows of chastity and find spouses, as Luther and his wife, a former nun, had done. In the great cathedrals and in hundreds of smaller churches and chapels, the elaborate altarpieces, bejewelled crucifixes, crystal reliquaries holding the bones of saints, venerated statues, and paintings were attacked as "idols" and often defaced or destyned. Protestant congregations continued, for the most part, to celebrate the most sacred Christian ritual, the Eucharist or Lord's Supper, but in a profoundly different spirit from the Catholic Church, more as commemoration than as miracle, and the service was conducted not in the old liturgical Latin but in the vernacular.

The Reformation was at first vigorously resisted in England. Protestant writings were seized by officials of the Church and the state and burned. Protestants who made their views known were persecuted, driven to flee the country or arrested, put on trial, and burned at the stake. But the situation changed drastically after Henry decided to seek a divorce from his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, in order to marry Anne Boleyn. When the Roman Catholic Church, under pressure from Catherine's powerful family, refused to grant the divorce, Henry defied papal authority, declared himself head of the church in England, seized the wealth of the monasteries, and unleashed Protestant energies, including fierce bursts of iconoclasm. On most doctrinal questions, however, Henry remained an orthodox Catholic, and in the latter part of his reign, his clerical authorities renewed the persecution of Protestants.

The turn toward the Reformation was more decisive in the reign (1547—53) of Henry's heir, Edward VI, and the attempt by Edward's successor, Mary (daughter of Catherine of Aragon), to reimpose Roman Catholicism as the national religion came to an end with her death in 1558. The long reign of Henry's daughter by Anne Boleyn, Elizabeth I (1558—1603), firmly established Protestantism as the faith of the Church of England. Reformation doctrine shaped the vernacular liturgy eloquently formulated in the officially sanctioned Book of Common Prayer and was reinforced in the series of homilies or sermons that ministers were commanded to deliver to their parishioners.

The Reformation did not spread quickly or easily among the mass of the English population. Like Henry VIII himself, most English people in the decades after the break with Rome were far from being full-fledged Protestants. Emotional attachment to the traditional religion ran deep, as did resentment of an aggressively intolerant Protestant officialdom. From the 1530s to the end of the century, a few individuals, including Thomas More and the Jesuit Robert Southwell, were prepared to die for the old faith. Many more, though still a small minority, stubbornly rejected the new orthodoxy, absenting themselves from Protestant worship; these recusants, as they were known, were subjected to fines and sometimes worse punishments. A much greater number conformed in public, but remained largely untouched by Protestant doctrine.

Though Protestantism and Catholicism were exposed, under different regimes, to brutal persecution, both faiths proved impossible to eradicate. In large part this tenacity arose from the passionate, often suicidal heroism of men and women who felt that their soul's salvation depended upon the precise character of their Christianity and who consequently embraced martyrdom rather than repudiate their beliefs. It arose too from a mid-fifteenth-century technological innovation that made it extremely difficult to suppress unwelcome ideas: the printing press. Early Protestants quickly grasped that with a few clandestine presses they could defy the Catholic authorities and flood the country with their texts. "How many printing presses there be in the world," wrote the Protestant polemicist and martyrlogist John Foxe, "so many blockhouses there be against the high castle of the pope in Rome, "so that either the pope must abolish knowledge and printing or printing at length will root him out.' By the century's end it was the Catholics, as well as the more radical Protestants—known as Puritans—who were using the clandestine press to propagate their beliefs in the face of official persecution.*

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

Protestant insistence that true belief must be based on the Holy Scriptures alone made the translation and dissemination of the Bible in English and other vernacular languages a matter of utmost urgency. Prior to the Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church had not always and everywhere opposed vernacular translations of the Bible, but it generally preferred that the populace encounter the Scriptures through the interpretations of the priests, trained to read the Latin translation known as the Vulgate. In times of great conflict this preference for clerical mediation hardened into outright prohibition of vernacular translation and into persecution and book burning. It was in the face of fierce opposition that zealous Protestants all over Europe set out to put the Bible into the hands of the laity. A remarkable translation of the New Testament by an English Lutheran named William Tyndale was printed on the Continent and smuggled into England in 1525; Tyndale's translation of the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Hebrew Bible, followed in 1530. Many copies of these translations were seized and destroyed, as was the translator himself, but the printing press made it extremely difficult for authorities to eradicate books for which there was a passionate demand.

Tyndale's translation was completed by an associate, Miles Coverdale, whose rendering of the Psalms proved to be particularly influential. Their joint labor was the basis for the Great Bible (1539), the first authorized version of the Bible in English, a copy of which was ordered to be placed in every church in the kingdom. Four years later, as Henry VIII sought to halt the tide of reform, a law was passed forbidding women, craftsmen, servants, and laborers from reading the Bible either in public or in private. Yet nothing could be done at this stage to take the Scriptures out of the hands of the populace. Though there would be further opposition in years to come—innumerable Bibles were printed under Edward VI, only to be burned under his sister Mary—the English Bible was a force that could not be suppressed, and it became, in its various forms, the single most important book of the sixteenth century.

Marian persecution was indirectly responsible for what would become the most scholarly Protestant English Bible, the translation known as the Geneva Bible, prepared, with extensive, learned, and often fiercely polemical marginal notes, by English exiles in Calvin's Geneva and widely diffused in England after Elizabeth came to the throne. In addition, Elizabethan church authorities ordered a careful revision of the Great Bible, and this version, known as the Bishops' Bible, was the one read in the churches. The success of the Geneva Bible in particular prompted those Elizabethan Catholics who now in turn found themselves in exile to bring out a vernacular translation of their own, the Douay-Rheims version, in order to counter the Protestant readings and glosses.

After Elizabeth's death in 1603, King James I and his bishops ordered that a revised translation of the entire Bible be undertaken by a group of forty-seven scholars. The result was the Authorized Version, more popularly known as the King James Bible.

In the passage selected here, I Corinthians 13, Tyndale's use of the word "love," echoed by the Geneva Bible, is set against the Catholic "charity." The latter term gestures toward the religious doctrine of "works," against the Protestant insistence on salvation by faith alone. It is a sign of the conservative, moderate Protestantism of the King James version that it too opts for "charity."

1 Corinthians 13

From Tyndale's Translation

Though I spake with the tongues of men and angels, and yet had no love, I were even as sounding brass: or as a tinkling cymbal. And though I could prophesy, and understood all secrets, and all knowledge: yea, if I had all faith, so that I could move mountains out of their places, and yet had no love, I were nothing. And though I bestowed all my goods to feed the poor, and though I gave my body even that I burned, and yet had no love, it profiteth me nothing.

Love suffereth long, and is courteous. Love envieth not. Love doth not perversely,2 swelleth not, dealeth not dishonestly, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh not evil: but rejoiceth in the truth, suffereth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth in all things. Though that prophesying fail, other tongues shall cease, or knowledge vanish away, yet love falleth never away.

For our knowledge is unperfect and our prophesying is unperfect. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is unperfect shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I imagined as a child. But as soon as I was a man, I put away childishness. Now we see in a glass, even in a dark3 speaking: but then shall we see face to face. Now I know unperfectly: but then shall I know even as I am known. Now abideth faith, hope, and love, even these three: but the chief of these is love.

From The Geneva Bible

Though I speak with the tongues of men and Angels, and have not love, I am as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I had the gift of prophecy, and knew all secrets and all knowledge, yea, if I had all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and had not love, I were nothing. And though I feed the poor with all my goods, and though I give my body, that I be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing. Love suffereth long: it is bountiful: love envieth not: love doth not boast itself: it is not puffed up: It disdaineth not: it seeketh not her own things: it is not provoked to anger: it thinketh not evil: It rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth: It suffereth all things: it believeth all things: it hopeth all things: it endureth all things. Love doth never fall away, though that prophesyings be abolished, or the tongues cease, or knowledge vanish away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. For now we see through a glass darkly:4 but then shall we see face to face. Now I know in part: but then shall I know even as I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, and love, even these three: but the chiefest of these is love.

1560, 1602

From The Douay-Rheims Version

If I speak with the tongues of men and of Angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And if I should have prophecy, and knew all mysteries, and all knowledge, and if I should have all faith so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And if I should distribute all my goods to be meat for the poor, and if I should deliver my body so that I burn, and have not charity, it doth profit me nothing.

Charity is patient, is benign: charity envieth not, dealeth not perversely: is not puffed up, is not ambitious, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh not evil: rejoiceth not upon iniquity, but rejoiceth with the truth: suffereth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, beareth all things. Charity never falleth away: whether prophecies shall be made void, or tongues shall cease, or knowledge shall be destroyed. For in part we know, and, in part we prophesy. But when that shall come that is perfect, that shall be made void that is in part. When I was a little one, I spake as a little one, I understood as a little one, I thought as a little one. But when I was made a man, I did away the things that belonged to a little one. We see now by a glass in a dark sort: but then face to face. Now I know in part: but then I shall know as also I am known. And now there remain faith, hope, charity, these three, but the greater of these is charity.

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have no charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. For now we see

WILLIAM TYNDALE

Educated at Oxford, William Tyndale (ca. 1490—1536) became a lecturer at Cambridge, where he was associated with a group of humanist scholars who met regularly at the White Horse Inn. Having become convinced that salvation depended upon direct access to the word of God, he sought support to undertake a translation of the Bible into English, but English church authorities, concerned about the spread of heresies, blocked this project. In 1524 Tyndale went to Germany, where with the financial assistance of wealthy London merchants, he completed a translation of the New Testament the following year.* Deeply influenced by the writings of Martin Luther and other reformers, he also wrote a series of doctrinal and polemical works, such as The Obedience of a Christian Man (1527), that eloquently express the Proestant hope of salvation through faith alone and reject the principles and practices of Roman Catholicism. Because of their vitriolic assaults upon the Catholic church, Protestants like Tyndale were often accused of fomenting rebellion. The Obedience of a Christian Man attempts to answer the charge by insisting upon the subject’s absolute secular obligation to obey the king. At Anne Boleyn’s urging, Henry VIII read it and is reported to have remarked that “This is a book for me and for all kings to read.” Notwithstanding this supposed endorsement, English Catholic authorities during Henry’s reign managed to lure Tyndale into a trap and had him executed in Vilvorde, Flanders.

[THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS]

* * * For sin we through fragility1 never so oft, yet as soon as we repent and come into the right way again, and unto the testament which God hath made in Christ’s blood, our sins vanish away as smoke in the wind, and as darkness at the coming of light; or as thou castest a little blood, or milk, into the main sea: insomuch that whosoever goeth about to make satisfaction for his sins to God-ward, saying in his heart, This much have I sinned, this much will I do again; or this-wise will I live to make amends withal; or this will I do, to get heaven withal; the same is an infidel, faithless, and damned in his deed-doing, and hath lost his part in Christ’s blood; because he is disobedient unto God’s testament, and setteth up another of his own imagination, unto which he will compel God to obey. If we love God, we have a commandment to love our neighbor also, as saith John in his epistle;2 and if we have offended him, to make him amends; or if we have not wherewith, to ask him forgiveness, and to do and suffer all things for his sake, to win him to God, and to nourish peace and unity. But to God-ward Christ is an everlasting satisfaction, and ever sufficient.\(^3\)

[SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETATION]

Thou shalt understand, therefore, that the Scripture hath but one sense, which is the literal sense. And that literal sense is the root and ground of all, and the anchor that never faileth, whereunto if thou cleave, thou canst never err or go out of the way. And if thou leave the literal sense, thou canst not but go out of the way. Nevertheless,\(^4\) the Scripture useth proverbs, similitudes, riddles, or allegories, as all other speeches do; but that which the proverb, similitude, riddle, or allegory signifieth, is ever the literal sense, which thou must seek out diligently: as in the English we borrow words and sentences of one thing, and apply them unto another, and give them new significations. We say, "Let the sea swell and rise as high as he will, yet hath God appointed how far he shall go": meaning that the tyrants shall not do what they would, but that only which God hath appointed them to do. "Look ere thou leap": whose literal sense is, "Do nothing suddenly, or without advisement." "Cut not the bough that thou standest upon": whose literal sense is, "Oppress not the commons"; and is borrowed of hewers. When a thing speedeth\(^5\) not well, we borrow speech, and say, 'The bishop hath blessed it'; because that nothing speedeth well that they meddle withal. If the porridge be burned too, or the meat overroasted, we say, 'The bishop hath put his foot in the pot,' or 'The bishop hath played the cook'; because the bishops burn whom they lust,\(^6\) and whosoever displeaseth them. 'He is a pontifical fellow'; that is, proud and stately. 'He is popish'; that is, superstitious and faithless.

* * *

Beyond all this, when we have found out the literal sense of the Scripture by the process of the text, or by a like text of another place, then go we, and as the Scripture borroweth similitudes of worldly things, even so we again borrow similitudes or allegories of the Scripture, and apply them to our purposes; which allegories are no sense of the Scripture, but free things besides the Scripture, and altogether in the liberty of the Spirit. * * * This allegory proveth nothing, neither can do. For it is not the Scripture, but an ensample or a similitude borrowed of the Scripture, to declare a text or a conclusion of the Scripture more expressly, and to root it and grave it in the heart. For a similitude, or an ensample,\(^7\) doth print a thing much deeper in the wits of a man than doth a plain speaking, and leaveth behind him as it were a sting to prick him forward, and to awake him withal. Moreover, if I could not prove with an open\(^8\) text that which the allegory doth express, then were the allegory a thing to be jested at, and of no greater value than a tale of Robin Hood.

whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also" (1 John 4.20-21).

THOMAS MORE

As early as 1521, when he became Henry VIII's "theological councilor," Thomas More had played an important role in the official campaign against Luther. Initially writing as the king's surrogate in doctrinal polemics conducted in Latin, by 1529, when he became chancellor of England, More had become deeply immersed in the anti-Protestant campaign in his own right. His extremely energetic contributions included written attacks, in English, on Tyndale's Bible translations and other prohibited books, and also extended to active persecution of those defined as heretics. "I find that breed of men absolutely loathsome," More wrote to his friend Erasmus; "I want to be as hateful to them as anyone can possibly be." If More was willing to kill in defense of the Christian consensus in which he fervently believed, he also proved himself willing in the end to die for his belief.

More had two principal objections to Lutheranism: (1) he objected to Luther's denial that Christians could contribute toward their own salvation through their good works; and (2) he objected to Luther's account of biblical interpretation. For Luther, Scripture preceded and ideally determined the form of the Church; for More, the Church preceded and determined the interpretation of Scripture.

In A Dialogue Concerning Heresies (1529), More broaches both issues. Departing from the head-on, vituperative attacks of his Latin works, More here adopts a different approach: his interlocutor in the Dialogue is a young man on friendly terms with More, but infatuated with Protestant ideas. More's aim seems less to attack Luther directly than, by using wit and cajolery as well as dialectic, to dissuade English men and women from embracing Protestantism.

This selection printed here tackles the fundamental issues of biblical interpretation. Who decides on the meaning of Scripture: the Church or individual readers? More's interlocutor is in no doubt: Scripture is for the most part entirely plain; individual readers have no trouble interpreting it. More strongly counters such simple faith in the plain and literal sense. Everything, he argues (in a passage playing with the consonance of "goose" and "gloss"), requires a commentary. Even to compare one text with another is to gloss it. If commentary is always necessary, then some stable ground for establishing authority over that commentary also becomes necessary. For More that ground is the Catholic Church, whose authority is established by the many centuries of its continued existence and by the consensus of the Church's Councils. More casts the young Lutheran's position as that of a single opinionated reader perversely resisting the "common faith" of Christendom.

From A Dialogue Concerning Heresies

From Chapter 28:  * * proving the authority of the old interpreters and the infallible authority of the Church * * *

"* * in somewhat, ye say, ye will believe the Church, but not in all. In anything beside Scripture ye will not, nor in the interpretation of Scripture ye will not; and so, where ye said that ye believe the Church in somewhat, in very deed ye believe the Church in right nought. For wherein wil ye believe it, if ye believe it not in the interpretation of Scripture? For as touching the text, ye believe the Scripture self, and not the Church."

"Methinketh," quod i he, "the text is good enough and plain enough, needing no gloss if it be well considered, and every part compared with other."

1. Quoth, said.
2. Interpretation, commentary.
"Hard it were," quod I, "to find anything so plain that it should need no gloss at all."
"In faith," quod he, "they make a gloss to some texts that be as plain as it is that twice two make four."
"Why?" quod I, "needeth that no gloss at all?"
"I trow so," quod he, "Or else the devil is on it."
"I wis," quod I, "and yet though ye would believe one that would tell you that twice two ganders made always four geese, yet ye would be advised ere ye believed him that would tell you that twice two geese made always four ganders. For therein might ye be deceived. And him would ye not believe at all, that would tell you that twice two geese would always make four horse."
"Tut," quod he, "this is a merry matter. They must be all the twice twain always of one kind. But geese and horse be of diverse."
"Well," quod I, "then every man that is neither goose nor horse seeth that there is one gloss yet."
"But now," quod I, "the geese and the ganders be both of one kind, and yet twice two geese make not always four ganders."
"A sweet matter," quod he. "Ye wot what I mean well enough."
"I think I do," quod I. "But I think if ye bring it forth it will make another gloss to your text, as plain as your text is; and ye will in all Holy Scripture have no gloss at all. And yet will ye have collation made of one text with another, and show how they may be agreed together—as though all that were no gloss."
"Yea," quod he, "but would you that we should believe the Church if it set a gloss that will in no wise agree with the text, but that it appeareth plainly that the text, well considered, saith clean the contrary?"
"To whom doth that appear," quod I, "so plainly, when it appeareth one to you, and to the whole Church another?"
"Yet if I see it so," quod he, "though holy doctors and all the whole Church would tell me the contrary, methinketh I were no more bounden to believe them all, that the Scripture meaneth as they take it, than if they would all tell me that a thing were white which I see myself is black."
"Of late," quod I, "ye would believe the Church in something. And now not only ye would believe it in nothing, but also whereas God would the Church should be your judge, ye would now be judge over the Church. And ye will by your wit be judge whether the Church, in the understanding of Holy Scripture that God hath written to His Church, do judge aight or err. As for your white and black, never shall it be that ye shall see the thing black that all other shall see white. But ye may be sure that if all other see it white, and ye take it for black, your eyen be sore deceived. For the Church will not, I think, agree to call it other than it seemeth to them. And much marvel were it, if ye should in Holy Scripture see better than the old holy doctors and Christ's whole Church."

Bom to middle-class parents in Picardy, France, and trained as a lawyer, Calvin (1509—1564) was steeped in the Greek and Latin learning associated with Renaissance humanism. He acquired as well a knowledge of Hebrew, so that he was powerfully equipped to respond to the call, from Erasmus and others, for a study of the Bible in its original languages. Drawn increasingly toward Protestantism, Calvin left Catholic France for Switzerland, where he eventually became the dominant figure in Geneva, establishing a stern theocratic rule. Through his voluminous writings, he also became the principal theologian of the Protestant Reformation, exercising immense influence in England as well as on the Continent. His major work, revised in successive Latin and French editions and widely translated, is The Institution of Christian Religion. The passage selected here is from Calvin's famous, troubling account of the doctrine of predestination, according to which God has determined before the foundation of the world whom he will save and whom he will damn, regardless of the merits or defects of these individuals. The good deeds that a virtuous person does in life are a sign of divine election, not a means to secure it. The translation, closely adhering to the Latin original, is by Thomas Norton (1532—1584), a lawyer and member of Parliament and, with Thomas Sackville, the author of the earliest English tragedy in blank verse, Gorhoduc—first performed in the same year (1561) that his translation of Calvin appeared.

From The Institution of Christian Religion, written in Latin by Master John Calvin, and translated into English according to the author's last edition

From Book 3, Chapter 21

Of the eternal election, whereby God hath predestinate some to salvation, and other some to destruction

But now whereas the covenant of life is not equally preached to all men, and with them to whom it is preached it doth not either equally or continually find like place, in this diversity the wondrous depth of the judgment of God appeareth. For neither is it any doubt but that this diversity also serveth the free choice of God's eternal election. If it be evident that it is wrought by the will of God that salvation is freely offered to some, and other some are debarred from coming to it, here by and by arise great and hard questions which cannot otherwise be discussed than if the godly minds have that certainly stablished concerning election and predestination. This is (as many think) a cumbersome question: because they think nothing to be less reasonable than of the common multitude of men some to be foreordained to salvation, other some to destruction. But how they wrongfully encumber themselves shall afterward be evident by the framing of the matter together. Beside that in the very same darkness which maketh men afraid, not only the profitableness of this doctrine but also the most sweet fruit showeth forth itself. We shall never be clearly persuaded, as we ought to be, that our salvation floweth out of the fountain of the free mercy of God, till his eternal election be known to us, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doth not without difference adopt all into the hope of salvation, but giveth to some that which he denieth to other. How much the ignorance of this principle diminisheth of the glory of God, how much it withdraweth from true humility, it is plain to see.

They which shut the gates, that none may be bold to come to the tasting of this doctrine, do no less wrong to men than to God: because neither shall any other thing suffice to humble us as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feel from our heart how much we are bound to God. Neither yet is there any otherwhere the upholding stay of sound affiance, as Christ himself teacheth, which to deliver us from all fear, and to make us unvanquishable among so many dangers, ambushes, and deadly battles, promiseth that whatsoever he hath received of his Father to keep shall be safe. Whereof we gather that they shall with continual trembling be miserable, whosoever they be that know not themselves to be the proper possession of God; and therefore that they do very ill provide both for themselves and for all the faithful, which, in being blind at these three profits which we have touched, would wish the whole foundation of our salvation to be quite taken from among us. Moreover, hereby the Church appeareth unto us, which otherwise (as Bernard rightly teacheth) were not possible to be found nor to be known among creatures because both ways in marvelous wise it lieth hidden: within the bosom of blessed predestination, and within the mass of miserable damnation.

But ere I enter into the matter itself, I must beforehand in two sorts speak to two sorts of men. That the entreating of predestination, whereas of itself it is somewhat cumbersome, is made very doubtful, yea, and dangerous, the curiousness of men is the cause: which can by no stops be refrained from wandering into forbidden compasses, and climbing up on high; which, if it may, will leave to God no secret which it will not search and turn over. Into this boldness and importunacy forasmuch as we commonly see many to run headlong, and among those some that are otherwise not evil men, here is fit occasion to warn them what is in this behalf the due measure of their duty.
First, therefore, let them remember that when they inquire upon predestina-tion, they pierce into the secret closets of the wisdom of God: whereinto if any man too carelessly and boldly break in, he shall both not attain wherewith he shall enter into a maze whereof he shall find no way to get out again. For neither is it meet that man should freely search those things which God hath willed to be hidden in himself, and to turn over from very eternity the height of wisdom, which he willed to be honored and not to be conceived, that by it also he might be marvelous unto us. Those secrets of his will which he hath determined to be opened unto us, he hath disclosed in his Word: and he hath determined, so far as he foresaw to pertain to us and to be profitable for us.

There be other which, when they have a will to remedy this evil, do command all mention of predestination to be in a manner buried: at the least they teach men to flee from every manner of questioning thereof as from a rock. Although the moderation of these men be herein worthy to be praised, that they judge that mysteries should be tasted of with such sobriety, yet because they descend too much beneath the mean, they little prevail with the wit of man, which doth not lightly suffer itself to be restrained. Therefore, that in this behalf also we may keep a right end, we must return to the Word of the Lord, in which we have a sure rule of understanding. For the Scripture is the school of the Holy Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessary and profitable to be known, so nothing is taught but that which is behoveful to learn. Whatsoever therefore is uttered in the Scripture concerning predestination, we must beware that we debar not the faithful from it, lest we should seem either enviously to defraud them of the benefit of their God, or to blame and accuse the Holy Ghost, who hath published those things which it is in any wise profitable to be suppressed.

That, therefore, which the Scripture clearly showeth, we say that God by eternal and unchangeable counsel hath once appointed whom in time to come he would take to salvation, and on the other side whom he would condemn to destruction. This counsel as touching the elect, we say to be grounded upon his free mercy, without any respect of the worthiness of man: but whom he appointeth to damnation, to them by his judgment (which is indeed just and irreprehensible but also incomprehensible) the entry of life is foreclosed. Now in the elect we set vocation to be the testimony of election; and then justification to be another sign of the manifest showing of it, till they come to glory, wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God marketh his elect, so by shutting out the reprobate either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his spirit, he doth as it were by these marks open what judgment abideth for them.

ANNE ASKEW

In the 1540s, Henry VIII sought to return the English church to a basically Catholic doctrinal position, and Protestants were subjected to persecution. The outspoken Protestant Anne Askew (1521—1546) was called in for questioning in 1545; the next year, she was tortured and burned at the stake. Askew's accounts of her two examinations were smuggled out of England and published in Germany (1546—47) by the reformer John Bale. The texts were later incorporated into John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563).*

The theological controversies over the Eucharist, for which Askew and her companions along with many other Protestants and Catholics were willing to lay down their lives, require some explanation. Catholic doctrine held that sacraments properly performed were independent of the spiritual condition either of the priest or of the worshipper. Hence, for example, if the formula of consecration of the bread and wine was correctly spoken by a properly ordained priest, the miraculous transubstantiation of the Host into the body and blood of Christ would occur, whether or not the priest or the communicant was in a state of grace. Indeed, some Catholic theologians argued, since the bread had objectively been transformed into the body of God, even a mouse, nibbling on a consecrated host, would be receiving Christ's flesh. Protestants argued that the efficacy of certain key religious sacraments, including the Lord's Supper, depended on the spiritual state of the minister and the congregant. An evil priest, in such a conception, would not only be damning himself (as Catholics also believed) but would be turning the Lord's Supper into the Devil's Supper.

From The First Examination of Anne Askew

To satisfy your expectation, good people (sayeth she), this was my first examination in the year of our Lord 1545, and in the month of March. First, Christopher Dare examined me at Saddlers' Hall,1 being one of the quest,2 and asked if I did not believe that the sacrament hanging over the altar3 was the very body of Christ really. And he said he could not tell. Then I answered that no more would I assol5 his vain question.

Secondly, he said that there was a woman which did testify that I should read4 how God was not in temples made with hands. Then I showed him the seventh and the seventeenth chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, what Stephen and Paul had said therein.7 Whereupon he asked me how I took those sentences. I answered that I would not throw pearls among swine,8 for acorns were good enough.

Thirdly, he asked me wherefore I said that I had rather to read five lines in the Bible than to hear five masses in the temple. I confessed that I said no less. Not for the dispraise of either the Epistle or Gospel, but because the one did greatly edify me and the other\textsuperscript{9} nothing at all. As Saint Paul doth witness in the fourteenth chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians, whereas he doth say: "If the trumpet giveth an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself to the battle?"

Fourthly, he laid unto my charge that I should say: "If an ill priest ministered, it was the Devil and not God." My answer was that I never spake such thing. But this was my saying: 'That whatsoever he were which ministered unto me, his ill conditions could not hurt my faith, but in spirit I received nevertheless the body and blood of Christ.' He asked me what I said concerning confession. I answered him my meaning, which was as Saint James sayeth, that every man ought to knowledge\textsuperscript{2} his faults to other, and the one to pray for the other.

Sixthly, he asked me what I said to the king's book.\textsuperscript{3} And I answered him that I could say nothing to it, because I never saw it.

Seventhly, he asked me if I had the spirit of God in me. I answered if I had not, I was but reprobate or cast away. Then he said he had sent for a priest to examine me, which was there at hand. The priest asked me what I said to the sacrament of the altar.\textsuperscript{4} And required much to know therein my meaning. But I desired him again to hold me excused concerning that matter. None other answer would I make him, because I perceived him a papist.\textsuperscript{5}

Eighthly, he asked me if I did not think that private masses did help souls departed.\textsuperscript{6} And [I] said it was great idolatry to believe more in them than in the death which Christ died for us. Then they had me thence unto my lord mayor and he examined me, as they had before, and I answered him directly in all things as I answered the quest afore. Besides this, my lord mayor laid one thing unto my charge which was never spoken of\textsuperscript{7} me but of them. And that was whether a mouse eating the host received God or no. This question did I never ask, but indeed they asked it of me, whereunto I made them no answer, but smiled. Then the bishop's chancellor rebuked me and said that I was much to blame for uttering the Scriptures. For Saint Paul (he said) forbade women to speak or to talk of the word of God. I answered him that I knew Paul's meaning as well as he, which is, I Corinthians 14, that a woman ought not to speak in the congregation by the way of teaching. And then I asked him how many women he had seen go into the pulpit and preach? He said he never saw none. Then I said he ought to find no fault in poor women, except\textsuperscript{8} they had offended the law. Then my lord mayor commanded me to ward. I asked him if sureties\textsuperscript{9} would not serve me, and he made me short answer, that he would take none.

Then was I had to the Counter,\textsuperscript{1} and there remained eleven days, no friend admitted to speak with me. But in the meantime there was a priest sent to me which said that he was commanded of the bishop to examine me, and to give me good counsel, which he did not. But first he asked me for what cause I was put in the Counter. And I told him I could not tell. Then he said it was great pity that I should be there without cause, and concluded that he was very sorry for me.

I told him, so that I might have one of these three, that is to say, Doctor Crome, Sir William, or Huntingdon, I was contented, because I knew them to be men of wisdom. "As for you or any other I will not dispraise, because I know ye not."

Then he said, 'I would not have you think but that I or another that shall be brought you shall be as honest as they. For if we were not, ye may be sure, the king would not suffer us to preach.'

Then I answered by the saying of Solomon, "By communing with the wise, I may learn wisdom: But by talking with a fool, I shall take scathe" (Proverbs 1).

Fourthly, he asked me if the host should fall, and a beast did eat it, whether the beast did receive God or no. I answered, "Seeing ye have taken the pains to ask this question I desire you also to assoil it yourself. For I will not do it, because I perceive ye come to tempt me." And he said it was against the order of schools that he which asked the question should answer it. I told him I was but a woman and knew not the course of schools.

Fifthly, he asked me if I intended to receive the sacrament at Easter or no. I answered that else I were no Christian woman, and that I did rejoice that the time was so near at hand. And then he departed thence with many fair words.

In the meanwhile he commanded his archdeacon to common with me, who said unto me, "Mistress, wherefore are ye accused and thus troubled here before the bishop?"

To whom I answered again and said, "Sir, ask, I pray you, my accusers, for I know not as yet.'

Then took he my book out of my hand and said, "Such books as this hath brought you to the trouble you are in. Beware," sayeth he, "beware, for he that made this book and was the author thereof was an heretic, I warrant you, and burnt in Smithfield."

Then I asked him if he were certain and sure that it was true that he had spoken. And he said he knew well the book was of John Frith's making. Then I asked him if he were not ashamed for to judge of the book before he saw it within, or yet knew the truth thereof. I said also that such unadvised and hasty judgment is token apparent of a very slender wit. Then I opened the book and showed it to him. He said he thought it had been another, for he could find no fault therein. Then I desired him no more to be so unadvisedly rash and swift in judgment, till he thoroughly knew the truth; and so he departed from me. * * *

JOHN FOXE

John Foxe's career at Oxford University, where he had become a fellow of Magdalen College, was interrupted when his Puritan convictions led him to protest energetically against some college rules and practices. Foxe (1516—1587) then served as tutor to the children of various noble families, but when Mary became queen in 1553 and Protestants were once again persecuted, he fled to the Continent. His great book was already under way: the first version (Strasbourg, 1554) was in Latin and dealt with the persecutions suffered by the early reformers, particularly Wycliffe and John Hus. But the book grew and grew as Foxe received from England accounts of the hideous tortures and persecutions being inflicted on the Protestants there. When Elizabeth came to the throne in 1558, Foxe returned at once to England, and there he translated his Latin volume, adding to it hundreds of stories of the Marian martyrs (many based on eyewitness testimony, some on hearsay and rumor). The English edition was first published in 1563; often called "Foxe's Book of Martyrs," its title was Acts and Monuments of these latter and perilous days, touching matters of the church, wherein are comprehended and described the great persecution and horrible troubles that have been wrought and practiced by the Romish prelates from the year of Our Lord a thousand to the time now present.

Foxe saw life as an apocalyptic struggle between good and evil, Christ and Anti-christ. Immediately and enormously popular, his book is a compendium of memoirs, stories, personal letters, court records, and the like, rendering the words, acts, and sufferings of some hundreds of martyrs in graphic—if often fictionalized—detail. The final version of the book (1583) is massive—more than six thousand folio pages, containing four million words. Apart from fanning the flames of anti-Catholic feeling, Foxe had an immense influence on English nationalism. His stories, from the medieval crypto-Protestants burned for heresy to the Protestant martyrs who passed through the fiery trials of the Marian persecutions, portrayed England as the land of a new chosen people, destined to lead the way toward the kingdom of God on earth. Foxe's second edition (1570) was placed, by government order, in churches throughout England.*

[THE DEATH OF ANNE ASKEW]

Hitherto we have entreated of this good woman; now it remaineth that we touch somewhat as touching her end and martyrdom. She being born of such stock and kindred that she might have lived in great wealth and prosperity, if she would rather have followed the world than Christ, but now she was so tormented, that she could neither live long in so great distress, neither yet by the adversaries be suffered 1 to die in secret. Wherefore the day of her execution was appointed, and she brought into Smithfield 2 in a chair, because she could not go on her feet, by means 3 of her great torments. When she was brought unto the stake she was tied by the middle with a chain that held up her body. When all things were thus prepared to the fire, the king's letters of pardon were brought, whereby to offer her safeguard of her life if she would recant, which she would neither receive nor yet vouchsafe once to look upon. Shaxton also was there present, who, openly that day recanting his opinions, went about with a long oration to cause her also to turn, against whom she stoutly resisted. Thus she being troubled so many manner of ways, and having passed through so many torments, having now ended the long course of her agonies, being compassed in with flames of fire, as a blessed sacrifice unto God, she slept in the Lord, in anno 1546, leaving behind her a singular example of Christian constancy for all men to follow.

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER

The Protestant attack on Catholic rituals and the demand for worship in the vernacular led during the reign of Edward VI to the preparation of an English liturgical book, authorized to be the official and only text for public worship in England. Initiated by the Act of Uniformity in 1549, the work's principal architect was Thomas Cranmer (1489—1556). Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, was at first careful to translate and shape the old Latin liturgy into a moderate, occasionally ambiguous compromise between Catholic and Protestant positions. His thorough revision in 1552 put the Book of Common Prayer much more decisively into the Protestant camp. Banned by the Catholic Mary Tudor, during whose reign Cranmer was executed, the Book of Common Prayer was restored, with small revisions, by Elizabeth, and has remained the basis of Anglican worship ever since. Cranmer was, among his other accomplishments, a brilliant prose stylist, and the cadences of his book have had a profound influence on the English language. The selection, part of the marriage service, is from the version used during the reign of Elizabeth.

From The Form of Solemnization of Matrimony

* * * At the day appointed for solemnization of matrimony, the persons to be married shall come into the body of the church with their friends and neighbors. And there the priest shall thus say:

Dearly beloved friends, we are gathered together here in the sight of God, and in the face of his congregation, to join together this man and this woman in holy matrimony, which is an honorable estate, instituted of God in paradise, in the time of man's innocency, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and his church: which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence and first miracle that he wrought in Cana of Galilee, and is commended of Saint Paul to be honorable among all men, and therefore is not to be enterprised nor taken in hand unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly, to satisfy men’s carnal lusts and appetites, like brute beasts that have no understanding; but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God, duly considering the causes for which matrimony was ordained. One was, the procreation of children, to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, and praise of God. Secondly, it was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication, that such persons as have not the gift of continency might marry, and keep themselves undefiled members of Christ’s body. Thirdly, for the mutual society, help, and comfort that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity: into the which holy estate these two persons present come now to be joined. Therefore if any man can show any just cause why they may not lawfully be joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter forever hold his peace.

And also speaking to the persons that shall be married, he shall say:

I require and charge you (as you will answer at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed) that if either of you do know any impediment why ye may not be lawfully joined together in matrimony, that ye confess it. For be ye well assured, that so many as be coupled together otherwise than God’s word doth allow are not joined together by God, neither is their matrimony lawful.

At which day of marriage, if any man do allege and declare any impediment why they may not be coupled together in matrimony by God’s law or the laws of this realm; and will be bound, and sufficient sureties with him, to the parties, or else put in a caution, to the full value of such charges as the persons to be married doth sustain, to prove his allegation: then the solemnization must be deferred unto such time as the truth be tried. If no impediment be alleged, then shall the curate say unto the man,

N. Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God’s ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honor and keep her, in sickness and in health? And forsaking all other, keep thee only to her, so long as you both shall live?

The man shall answer,

I will.

Then shall the priest say to the woman,

N. Wilt thou have this man to thy wedded husband, to live together after God’s ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou obey him and serve him, love, honor, and keep him, in sickness and in health, and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as you both shall live?

The woman shall answer,

I will.

Then shall the minister say,

Who giveth this woman to be married unto this man?

2. He changed water into wine (John 2:1—11).
3. “Marriage is honorable in all, and the bed undefiled: but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge” (Hebrews 13:4).
4. Undertaken.
5. The church.
7. A clergyman who has charge of a parish.
8. Name—i.e., the minister inserts the man’s given name here.
And the minister receiving the woman at her father or friend's hands, shall cause the man to take the woman by the right hand, and so either to give their troth to other. The man first saying:

I N. take thee N. to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us depart, according to God’s holy ordinance: and thereto I plight thee my troth.

Then shall they loose their hands, and the woman taking again the man by the right hand shall say:

I N. take thee N. to my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish, and to obey, till death us depart, according to God’s holy ordinance: and thereto I give thee my troth.

Then shall they again loose their hands, and the man shall give unto the woman a ring, laying the same upon the book with the accustomed duty to the priest and clerk. And the priest taking the ring, shall deliver it unto the man, to put it upon the fourth finger of the woman’s left hand. And the man taught by the priest shall say:

With this ring I thee wed: with my body I thee worship: and with all my worldly goods I thee endow. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Then the man leaving the ring upon the fourth finger of the woman’s left hand, the minister shall say:

O eternal God, creator and preserver of all mankind, giver of all spiritual grace, the author of everlasting life: send thy blessing upon these thy servants, this man and this woman, whom we bless in thy name; that as Isaac and Rebecca lived faithfully together, so these persons may surely perform and keep the vow and covenant betwixt them made, whereof this ring given and received is a token and pledge, and may ever remain in perfect love and peace together, and live according unto thy laws: through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Then shall the priest join their right hands together, and say:

Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

Then shall the minister speak unto the people:

Forasmuch as IV. and N. have consented together in holy wedlock, and have witnessed the same before God and this company, and thereto have given and pledged their troth, either to other, and have declared the same by giving and receiving of a ring, and by joining of hands: I pronounce that they be man and wife together. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

And the minister shall add this blessing:

God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost, bless, preserve, and keep you: the Lord mercifully with his favor look upon you, and so fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace that you may so live together in this life that in the world to come you may have life everlasting. Amen.

BOOK OF HOMILIES

The Protestant archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, was responsible in 1547 for the publication of the Book of Homilies. Hoping to curb the influence of "ignorant preachers" and fearing the spread of unauthorized beliefs, Cranmer brought together twelve sermons that were, by royal and ecclesiastical decree, to be read over and over, in the order in which they were set forth, in parish churches throughout the realm. The Homilies, revised and reissued during the reign of Elizabeth, are political as well as religious documents. As the "Homily Against Disobedience" (added in 1570 in the aftermath of a Catholic uprising the preceding year) amply demonstrates, the intention was to teach the English people "to honor God and to serve their king with all humility and subjection, and godly and honestly to behave themselves toward all men." Artfully crafted and tirelessly reiterated, these sermons would have been familiar to almost everyone in the latter half of the sixteenth century.*

From An Homily Against Disobedience and Willful Rebellion

* * * How horrible a sin against God and man rebellion is cannot possibly be expressed according unto the greatness thereof. For he that nameth rebellion nameth not a singular, or one only sin, as is theft, robbery, murder, and suchlike, but he nameth the whole puddle and sink of all sins against God and man, against his prince, his country, his countrymen, his parents, his children, his kinfolks, his friends, and against all men universally: all sins, I say, against God and all men heaped together nameth he that nameth rebellion. For concerning the offense of God's majesty, who seeth not that rebellion riseth first by contempt of God and of his holy ordinances and laws, wherein he so straitly commandeth obedience, forbiddeth disobedience and rebellion? And besides the dishonor done by rebels unto God's holy name by their breaking of the oath made to their prince with the attestation of God's name and calling of his majesty to witness, who heareth not the horrible oaths and blasphemies of God's holy name that are used daily amongst rebels, that is either amongst them or heareth the truth of their behavior? Who knoweth not that rebels do not only themselves leave all works necessary to be done upon workdays undone, whiles they accomplish their abominable work of rebellion, and do compel others that would gladly be well occupied to do the same, but also how rebels do not only leave the sabbath day of the Lord unsanctified, the temple and church of the Lord unresorted unto, but also do by their works of wickedness most horribly profane and pollute the sabbath day, serving Satan, and by doing of his work making it the devil’s day instead of the Lord’s day? Besides that they compel good men that would gladly serve the Lord assemblig in his temple and church upon his day, as becometh the Lord’s servants, to assemble and meet armed in the field to resist the fury of such rebels. Yea, and many rebels, lest they should leave any part of God’s commandments in the first table of his law unbroken or any sin against God undone, do make rebellion for the maintenance of their images and idols, and of their idolatry committed or to be committed by them, and, in despite of God, cut and tear in sunder his Holy Word, and tread it under their feet, as of late ye know was done.4

As concerning the second table of God’s law, and all sins that may be committed against man, who seeth not that they be all contained in rebellion? For first, the rebels do not only dishonor their prince, the parent of their country, but also do dishonor and shame their natural parents, if they have any, do shame their kindred and friends, disinherit5 and undo forever their children and heirs. Thefts, robberies, and murders, which of all sins are most loathed of most men, are in no men so much, nor so perniciously and mischievously, as in rebels. For the most arrant thieves and cruelest murderers that ever were, so long as they refrain from rebellion, as they are not many in number, so spreadeth their wickedness and damnation unto a few: they spoil6 but a few, they shed the blood but of few in comparison. But rebels are the cause of infinite robberies and murders of great multitudes, and of those also whom they should defend from the spoil and violence of other; and, as rebels are many in number, so doth their wickedness and damnation spread itself unto many. And if whoredom and adultery amongst such persons as are agreeable to such wickedness are (as they indeed be) most damnable, what are the forcible oppressions7 of matrons and men’s wives, and the violating and deflowering of virgins and maids, which are most rife with rebels; how horrible and damnable, think you, are they? Now, besides that rebels, by breach of their faith given and oath made to their prince, be guilty of most damnable perjury, it is wondrous to see what false colors and feigned causes, by slanderous lies made upon their prince and the counselors, rebels will devise to cloak their rebellion withal, which is the worst and most damnable of all false-witness-bearing that may be possible. For what should I speak of coveting or desiring of other men’s wives, houses, lands, goods, and servants in rebels, who by their wills would leave unto no man anything of his own?

Thus you see that all God’s laws are by rebels violated and broken, and that all sins possible to be committed against God or man be contained in rebellion: which sins, if a man list8 to name by the accustomed names of the seven capital or deadly sins, as pride, envy, wrath, covetousness, sloth, gluttony, and lechery, he shall find them all in rebellion, and amongst rebels. For first, as ambition and desire to be aloft, which is the property of pride, stirreth up many men’s minds to rebellion, so cometh it of a luciferian pride and presumption that a few rebellious subjects should set themselves up against the majesty of their prince, against the wisdom of the counselors, against the power and force of all nobility, and the faithful subjects and people of the whole realm. As for envy, wrath, murder, and desire of blood, and covetousness of other men’s goods, lands, and livings, they are the inseparable accidents of all rebels, and peculiar properties that do usually stir up wicked men unto rebellion. Now such as by riotousness, gluttony, drunkenness, excess of apparel, and unthrifty games have wasted their own goods unthrifitily, the same are most apt unto and most desirous of rebellion, whereby they trust to come by other men’s goods unlawfully and violently. And where other gluttons and drunkards take too much of such meats and drinks as are served to tables, rebels waste and consume in short space all corn in barns, fields, or elsewhere, whole graners, whole storehouses, whole cellars, devour whole flocks of sheep, whole droves of oxen and kine. And as rebels that are married, leaving their own wives at home, do most ungraciously, so much more do unmarried men than any stallions or horses, being now by rebellion set at liberty from correction of laws which briddled them before, which abuse by force other men’s wives and daughters, and ravish virgins and maidens most shamefully, abominably, and damnable. Thus all sins, by all names that sins may be named, and by all means that all sins may be committed and wrought, do all wholly upon heaps follow rebellion, and are to be found all together amongst rebels.

RICHARD HOOKER

Out of the long and bitter controversy over the government of the church in sixteenth-century England emerged one literary masterpiece. It is a work in eight books called Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (that is, the governmental system of the church). The author was the Oxford-educated Richard Hooker (1554—1600), a scholar and minister. In 1585 Hooker was master of the Temple (in modern terms, dean of a law school); one of his subordinates was a Puritan intellectual named Walter Travers. Between them a contentious debate developed on the burning question of how the church should be governed. The Puritan view was that no organization or authority in the church was valid unless it was based clearly and specifically on the Bible; the whole hierarchical system of the English Church, with its deacons, priests, bishops, and archbishops, was accordingly wrong, along with its liturgy and most of its rituals. The position Hooker undertook to defend was that the Scriptures, or divine revelation, are not the only guide given to Christians for organizing and administering the church. Another guide is the law of nature, also divinely given, which can be discerned by the use of human reason.

In the book that grew out of his controversy with Travers, Hooker explained how the law of nature affords principles that justify the existing organization and practices of the English Church. Book 1 of Ecclesiastical Polity deals with law in general and the several kinds of law; it pictures the entire universe, and also human society, as founded on reason and operating under various natural and divine laws. Book 2 deals with the nature, authority, and adequacy of Scripture. Books 3 to 5 explain and defend the rites, ceremonies, worship, and government of the English church. Books 6, 7, and 8 deal with various embodiments of authority, legitimate and illegitimate—elders, bishops, kings, and popes.

Hooker was a close and effective reasoner; avoiding the fiery invective or impassioned rhetoric that characterized most disputants of his time, he wrote in a calm, reasonable, and judicious manner. His defense of existing ecclesiastical practices went back to fundamental principles, to a philosophy of nature and our place in it, to the subordination of the individual to a larger community and to God. It is this worldview, set forth in what is perhaps the period's most sonorous and quietly elegant prose, that makes Ecclesiastical Polity of enduring interest.*

From Book 1, Chapter 3

[ON THE SEVERAL KINDS OF LAW, AND ON THE NATURAL LAW]

I am not ignorant that by law eternal the learned for the most part do understand the order, not which God hath eternally purposed himself in all his works to observe, but rather that which with himself he hath set down as expedient to be kept by all his creatures, according to the several conditions wherewith he hath indued them. They who thus are accustomed to speak apply the name of Law unto that only rule of working which superior authority imposeth; whereas we, somewhat more enlarging the sense thereof, term any kind of rule or canon whereby actions are framed a law. Now that law, which as it is laid up in the bosom of God they call eternal, receiveth according unto the different kinds of things which are subject unto it different and sundry kinds of names. That part of it which ordereth natural agents, we call usually nature’s law; that which angels do clearly behold, and without any swerving observe, is a law celestial and heavenly; the law of reason that which bindeth creatures reasonable in this world, and with which by reason they may most plainly perceive themselves bound; that which bindeth them, and is not known but by special revelation from God, divine law; human law, that which, out of the law either of reason or of God, men probably gathering to be expedient, they make it a law. All things, therefore, which are as they ought to be, are conformed unto this second law eternal, and even those things which to this eternal law are not conformable are notwithstanding in some sort ordered by the first eternal law. For what good or evil is there under the sun, what action correspondent to or repugnant unto the law which God hath imposed upon his creatures, but in or upon it God doth work according to the law which himself hath eternally purposed to keep, that is to say, the first law eternal? So that a twofold law eternal being thus made, it is not hard to conceive how they both take place in all things. Wherefore to come to the law of nature, albeit thereby we sometimes mean that manner of working which God hath set for each created thing to keep, yet forasmuch as those things are termed most properly natural agents, which keep the law of their kind unwittingly, as the heavens and elements of the world, which can do no otherwise than they do, and forasmuch as we give unto intellectual natures the name of voluntary agents, that so we may distinguish them from the other, expedient it will be that we sever the law of nature observed by the one from that which the other is tied unto. Touching the former, their strict keeping of one tenure statute and law is spoken of by all, but hath in it more than men have as yet attained to know, or perhaps ever shall attain, seeing the travail of wading herein is given of God to the sons of men, that perceiving how much the least thing in the world hath in it more than the wisest are able to reach unto, they may by this means learn humility. Moses in describing the work of creation attributeth speech unto God: "God said, Let there be light, Let there be a firmament; Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place; Let the earth bring forth; Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven." Was this only the intent of Moses, to signify the greatness of God's power by the easiness of his accomplishing such effects without travail, pain, or labor? Surely it seemeth that Moses had herein besides this a further purpose: namely, first to teach that God did not work as a necessary, but a voluntary, agent, intending beforehand and decreeing with himself that which did outwardly proceed from him; secondly, to show that God did then institute a law natural to be observed by creatures, and therefore according to the manner of laws, the institution thereof is described as being established by solemn injunction. His commanding those things to be which are, and to be in such sort as they are, to keep that tenure and course which they do, importeth the establishment of nature's law. This world's first creation, and the preservation since of things created, what is it but only so far forth a manifestation by execution, what the eternal law of God is concerning things natural? And as it cometh to pass in a kingdom rightly ordered, that after a law is once published, it presently takes effect far and wide, all states framing themselves thereunto; even so let us think it fareth in the natural course of the world: since the time that God did first proclaim the edicts of his law upon it, heaven and earth have hearkened unto his voice, and their labor hath been to do his will. He made a law for the rain. He gave his decree unto the sea, that the waters should not pass his commandment.

Now if Nature should intermit her course and leave altogether, though it were but for a while, the observation of her own laws; if those principal and mother elements of the world, whereof all things in this lower world are made, should lose the qualities which now they have; if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads should loosen and dissolve itself; if celestial spheres should forget their wonted motions and by irregular volubility turn themselves any way as it might happen; if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now as a giant doth run his unwearied course, should as it were through a languishing faintness begin to stand and to rest himself; if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the times and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixture, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated of heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine away as children at the withered breasts of their mother no longer able to yield them relief, what would become of man himself, whom these things now do all serve? See we not plainly that obedience of creatures

ROBERT SOUTHWELL

Robert Southwell (1561—1595), the younger son of a prominent Roman Catholic family, went to the English seminary for Catholics at Douai, France, in his youth, then to Rome, where he entered the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits). In 1586 he returned to England to minister to English Catholics. His mission was a dangerous one because of laws that proscribed Roman Catholic worship and banished priests; in 1592 he was apprehended, imprisoned, tortured, and, three years later, executed as a traitor in the usual grisly manner—by being hanged, disemboweled, and then beheaded. Southwell wrote a good deal of religious prose and verse; the most famous of his lyrics is "The Burning Babe." Ben Jonson told his friend William Drummond of Hawthornden that if he had written "The Burning Babe" he would have been content to destroy many of his own poems.

The Burning Babe

As I in hoary winter's night stood shivering in the snow,
Surprised I was with sudden heat which made my heart to glow;
And lifting up a fearful eye to view what fire was near,
A pretty babe all burning bright did in the air appear;
Who, scorched with excessive heat, such floods of tears did shed
As though his floods should quench his flames which with his tears were fed.
"Alas," quoth he, "but newly born in fiery heats I fry,
Yet none approach to warm their hearts or feel my fire but I!
My faultless breast the furnace is, the fuel wounding thorns,
Love is the fire, and sighs the smoke, the ashes shame and scorns;
The fuel justice layeth on, and mercy blows the coals,
The metal in this furnace wrought are men's defiled souls,
For which, as now on fire I am to work them to their good,
So will I melt into a bath to wash them in my blood.'
With this he vanished out of sight and swiftly shrunk away,
And straight'1 called unto mind that it was Christmas day.

ROGER ASCHAM 1515-1568

When she heard of the death of her former tutor and Latin secretary, Queen Elizabeth is said to have exclaimed, "I would rather have cast ten thousand pounds in the sea than parted from my Ascham." Educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, one of the great centers of humanism in England, Ascham passionately believed in the study of the Greek and Latin classics, not merely for erudition and aesthetic pleasure but for guidance in moral values and in political activity. He corresponded widely in Latin with learned men on the Continent, but eager to influence his countrymen, whether they read Latin or not, he wrote several important books in English, including Toxophilus, a dialogue in praise of archery with the traditional English longbow, and A Report and Discourse of the State of Germany, based on his experience as secretary to the English ambassador there in 1550—53. His most famous work in English was The Schoolmaster, published two years after his death.

The Schoolmaster eloquently opposes the widespread use of corporal punishment in schools. Instilling a love of learning, rather than a fear of physical pain, inspires young children to excel in their studies. Ascham advocates "double translation" as the most effective way of acquiring a sound Latin style: students would translate a passage from Latin to English and then, without making use of the Latin original, translate the English back into Latin. The approach thus downplays rote learning of the rules of grammar and emphasizes instead a sense of style.

In the hands of a pedant, Ascham's method (which included discouraging students from speaking Latin, for fear that everyday life would corrupt the linguistic purity of classical antiquity) could, like so many other educational reforms, harden into a rigid form into which individuals are hammered. But his ultimate goal was not a sterile miming but an ethical and aesthetic fashioning of the self. Deeply fearing what he called the "divorce between the tongue and the heart," he believed that education should teach a person to conjoin language and values in the achievement of what
The Schoolmaster calls "decorum." Ascham’s most despairing vision of a society without this moral decorum comes in his account of a brief trip to Italy, which he viewed as an evil seductress, luring unwitting Englishmen away from their ethical and religious values.*

[TEACHING LATIN]

There is a way, touched in the first book of Cicero De oratore,¹ which, wisely brought into schools, truly taught, and constantly used, would not only take wholly away this butcherly fear in making of Latins² but would also, with ease and pleasure and in short time, as I know by good experience, work a true choice and placing of words, a right ordering of sentences, an easy understanding of the tongue, a readiness to speak, a facility to write, a true judgment both of his own and other men’s doings, what tongue soever he doth use.

The way is this. After the three concordances³ learned, as I touched before, let the master read unto him the epistles of Cicero gathered together and chosen out by Sturmius⁴ for the capacity of children.

First, let him teach the child, cheerfully and plainly, the cause and matter of the letter; then, let him construe it into English so oft as the child may easily carry away the understanding of it; lastly, parse⁵ it over perfectly. This done thus, let the child, by and by;⁶ both construe and parse it over again so that it may appear that the child doubteth in nothing that his master taught him before. After this, the child must take a paper book and, sitting in some place where no man shall prompt him, by himself, let him translate into English his former lesson. Then, showing it to his master, let the master take from him his Latin book, and, pausing an hour at the least, then let the child translate his own English into Latin again in another paper book. When the child bringeth it turned into Latin, the master must compare it with Tully’s⁷ book and lay them both together, and where the child doth well, either in choosing or true placing of Tully’s words, let the master praise him and say, "Here ye do well." For I assure you, there is no such whetstone to sharpen a good wit and encourage a will to learning as is praise.

But if the child miss, either in forgetting a word, or in changing a good with a worse, or misordering the sentence, I would not have the master either frown or chide with him, if the child have done his diligence and used no truantship therein. For I know by good experience that a child shall take more profit of two faults gently warned of than of four things rightly hit. For then the master shall have good occasion to say unto him:

N[omen],⁸ Tully would have used such a word, not this; Tully would have placed this word here, not there; would have used this case, this number.

this person, this degree, this gender; he would have used this mood, this tense, this simple rather than this compound; this adverb here, not there;
he would have ended the sentence with this verb, not with that noun or participle, etc.

In these few lines I have wrapped up the most tedious part of grammar and also the ground of almost all the rules that are so busily taught by the master, and so hardly learned by the scholar, in all common schools, which after this sort the master shall teach without all error, and the scholar shall learn without great pain, the master being led by so sure a guide, and the scholar being brought into so plain and easy a way. And therefore we do not contemn rules, but we gladly teach rules, and teach them more plainly, sensibly, and orderly than they be commonly taught in common schools. For when the master shall compare Tully's book with his scholar's translation, let the master, at the first, lead and teach his scholar to join the rules of his grammar book with the examples of his present lesson, until the scholar by himself be able to fetch out of his grammar every rule for every example, so as the grammar book be ever in the scholar's hand and also used of him, as a dictionary, for every present use. This is a lively and perfect way of teaching of rules, where the common way, used in common schools, to read the grammar alone by itself, is tedious for the master, hard for the scholar, cold and uncomfortable to them both.

Let your scholar be never afraid to ask you any doubt, but use discreetly the best allurements ye can to encourage him to the same, lest his overmuch fearing of you drive him to seek some misorderly shift, as to seek to be helped by some other book, or to be prompted by some other scholar, and so go about to beguile you much, and himself more.

* * * But I am afraid that overmany of our travelers into Italy do not eschew the way to Circe's court but go and ride and run and fly thither; they make great haste to come to her; they make great suit to serve her; yea, I could point out some with my finger that never had gone out of England but only to serve Circe in Italy. Vanity and vice and any license to ill-living in England was counted stale and rude unto them. And so, being mules and horses before they went, returned very swine and asses home again; yet everywhere very foxes with subtle and busy heads and, where they may, very wolves with cruel malicious hearts. A marvelous monster which for filthiness of living, for dullness to learning himself, for wiliness in dealing with others, for malice in hurting without cause, should carry at once in one body the belly of a swine, the head of an ass, the brain of a fox, the womb of a wolf. If you think we judge amiss and write too sore against you, hear what the Italian saith of the Englishman, what the master reporteth of the scholar, who uttereth plainly what is taught by him and what is learned by you, saying, Inglese italiano e un diavolo incarnato; that is to say, "You remain men in shape and fashion but become devils in life and condition." This is not the opinion of one, for some private spite, but the judgment of all in a common proverb which riseth of that learning and those manners which you gather in Italy—a good schoolhouse of wholesome doctrine, and worthy masters of commendable scholars, where the master had rather defame himself for his teaching than not shame his scholar for his learning: a good nature of the master, and fair conditions of the scholars. And now choose you, you Italian Englishmen, whether you will be angry with us for calling you monsters, or with the Italians for calling you devils, or else with your own selves, that take so much pains and go so far to make yourselves both. If some yet do not well understand what is an Englishman Italianated, I will plainly tell him: he that by living and traveling in Italy bringeth home into England out of Italy the religion, the learning, the policy, the experience, the manners\(^6\) of Italy. That is to say, for religion, papistry or worse; for learning, less, commonly, than they carried out with them; for policy, a factious heart, a discoursing head, a mind to meddle in all men’s matters; for experience, plenty of new mischiefs never known in England before; for manners, variety of vanities and change of filthy living.

These be the enchantments of Circe brought out of Italy to mar men’s manners in England: much by example of ill life but more by precepts of fond\(^7\) books, of late translated out of Italian into English, sold in every shop in London, commended by honest titles the sooner to corrupt honest manners, dedicated overboldly to virtuous and honorable personages, the easiplier to beguile simple and innocent wits. It is pity that those which have authority and charge to allow and disallow books to be printed be no more circumspect herein than they are. Ten sermons at Paul’s Cross\(^8\) do not so much good for moving men to true doctrine as one of those books do harm with enticing men to ill-living.
Yea, I say farther, those books tend not so much to corrupt honest living as they do to subvert true religion. More papists be made by your merry books of Italy than by your earnest books of Louvain.\(^9\) And because our great physicians do wink at the matter and make no count of this sore, I, though not admitted one of their fellowship, yet having been many years a prentice to God’s true religion, and trust to continue a poor journeyman therein all days of my life, for the duty I owe and love I bear both to true doctrine and honest living, though I have no authority to amend the sore myself, yet I will declare my good will to discover the sore to others.

St. Paul saith that sects and ill opinions be the works of the flesh and fruits of sin.\(^1\) This is spoken no more truly for the doctrine than sensibly for the reason. And why? For ill-doings breed ill-thinkings, and of corrupted manners spring perverted judgments. And how? There be in man two special things:
man’s will, man’s mind. Where will inclineth to goodness the mind is bent to truth; where will is carried from goodness to vanity the mind is soon drawn from truth to false opinion. And so the readiest way to entangle the mind with false doctrine is first to entice the will to wanton living. Therefore, when the busy and open papists abroad could not by their contentious books turn men in England fast enough from truth and right judgment in doctrine, then the subtle and secret papists at home procured bawdy books to be translated out of the Italian tongue, whereby overmany young wills and wits, allured to wantonness, do now boldly contemn all severe books that sound to\(^2\) honesty and godliness. In our forefathers' time, when papistry as a standing pool covered and overflowed all England, few books were read in our tongue, saving certain books of chivalry, as they said, for pastime and pleasure, which, as some say, were made in monasteries by idle monks or wanton canons; as one for example, Morte Darthur, the whole pleasure of which book standeth in two special points—in open manslaughter and bold bawdry; in which book those be counted the noblest knights that do kill most men without any quarrel and commit foulest adulteries by subtest shifts: as Sir Lancelot with the wife of King Arthur his master, Sir Tristram with the wife of King Mark his uncle, Sir Lamorak with the wife of King Lot that was his own aunt. This is good stuff for wise men to laugh at or honest men to take pleasure at. Yet I know when God’s Bible was banished the court and Morte Darthur received into the prince's chamber.

One of the great and influential books of the Renaissance was Il Cortegiano (The Courtier), published in 1528 in Italian by Count Baldassare Castiglione (1478—1529) and soon translated into all the major European languages. The English translation, by the humanist and diplomat Sir Thomas Hoby, was not published until 1561 but had been written earlier, probably during the reign of Queen Mary (1553—58), when Hoby lived abroad as a Protestant exile.

Castiglione’s book describes, by means of dialogues between actual men and women living at the court of the duke of Urbino in the years 1504—08, the qualities of the ideal courtier. Supreme among these qualities is grace, the mysterious attribute which renders a person’s speech and actions not merely impressive or accomplished but persuasive, touching, and beautiful. Though a few people are born with grace, most actually learn to have it by the mastery of certain techniques. In a famous passage, one of The Courtier’s speakers, Count Lodovico Canossa, defines the most important of these techniques as sprezzatura or, as Hoby translates it, "recklessness." Sprezzatura is in fact close to the opposite of recklessness, as we ordinarily understand the term; it is a device for manipulating appearances and masking all the tedious memorizing of lines and secret rehearsals that underlie successful social performances. There is a paradox here, still evident in many social settings: success requires the painstaking mastery of complex codes of behavior, yet there is no surer recipe for failure than to be seen (like Malvolio in Twelfth Night) to be trying too hard.

The most famous passage in The Courtier is Peter Bembo’s elegant restatement, Christianized and heterosexualized, of an ideal of love that ultimately derives from Plato’s Symposium. Bembo declares that love is not the mere gratification of the senses but is the yearning of the soul after beauty, which is finally identical with the eternal good. Love properly understood is, therefore, a kind of ladder by which the soul progresses from lower to higher things. As he pursues his theme, Bembo becomes more and more enraptured and ends with a vision of the soul ravished by heavenly beauty, purged of the flesh, and admitted to the feast of the angels. One of the spirited ladies in the court, Emilia Pia, plucks his garment and gently reminds him that he has a body.*

* * * Perhaps I am able to tell you what a perfect Courtier ought to be, but not to teach you how ye should do to be one. Notwithstanding, to fulfill your request in what I am able, although it be (in manner) in a proverb that Grace is not to be learned, I say unto you, whose mindeth to be gracious or to have a good grace in the exercises of the body (presupposing first that he be not of nature unapt) ought to begin betimes, and to learn his principles of cunning men. The which thing how necessary a matter Philip, king of Macedonia, thought it, a man may gather in that his will was that Aristotle, so famous a philosopher, and perhaps the greatest that ever hath been in the world, should be the man that should instruct Alexander, his son, in the first principles of letters. And of men whom we know nowadays, mark how well and with what a good grace Sir Galeazzo Sanseverino, master of the horse to the French king, doth all exercises of the body; and that because, besides the natural disposition of person that is in him, he hath applied all his study to learn of cunning men, and to have continually excellent men about him, and, of every one, to choose the best of that they have skill in. For as in wrestling, in vaulting, and in learning to handle sundry kind of weapons he hath taken for his guide our Master Peter Mount, who (as you know) is the true and only master of all artificial force and sleight, so in riding, in jousting, and in every other feat, he hath always had before his eyes the most perfectest that hath been known to be in those professions.

"He therefore that will be a good scholar, beside the practicing of good things, must evermore set all his diligence to be like his master, and, if it were possible, change himself into him. And when he hath had some entry, it profiteth him much to behold sundry men of that profession; and, governing himself with that good judgment that must always be his guide, go about to pick out, sometime of one and sometime of another, sundry matters. And even as the bee in the green meadows flieth always about the grass choosing out flowers, so shall our Courtier steal this grace from them that to his seeming have it, and from each one that parcel that shall be most worthy praise. And not do as a friend of ours whom you all know, that thought he resembled much King Ferdinand the Younger, of Aragon, and regarded not to resemble him in any other point but in the often lifting up his head, wrying, therewithal, a part of his mouth, the which custom the king had gotten by infirmity. And many such there are that think they do much, so they resemble a great man in somewhat, and take many times the thing in him that worst becometh him. But I, imagining with myself often times how this grace cometh, leaving apart such as have it from above, find one rule that is most general which in this part (methink) taketh place in all things belonging to a man in word or deed above all other. And that is to eschew as much as a man may, and as a sharp and dangerous rock, Affectation or curiosity, and, to speak a new word, to use in everything a certain Recklessness, to cover art withal, and seem whatsoever he doth and sayeth to do it without pain, and, as it were, not minding it. And of this do I believe grace is much derived, for in rare matters and well brought to pass every man knoweth the hardness of them, so that a readiness therein maketh great wonder. And contrariwise to use force, and, as they say, to hale by the hair, giveth a great disgrace and maketh everything, how great soever it be, to be little esteemed. Therefore that may be said to be a very art that appeareth not to be art; neither ought a man to put more diligence in anything than in covering it, for in case it be open, it loseth credit clean, and maketh a man little set by. And I remember that I have read in my days that there were some most excellent orators which among other their cares enforced themselves to make every man believe that they had no sight in letters, and dissembling their cunning, made semblant their orations to be made very simply, and rather as nature and truth made them than study and art, the which if it had been openly known would have put a doubt in the people's mind, for fear lest he beguiled them. You may see then how to show art and such bent study taketh away the grace of everything.

[THE LADDER OF LOVE]

Then the Lord Gaspar: "I remember," quoth he, "that these lords yester-night, reasoning of the Courtier's qualities, did allow him to be a lover; and in making rehearsal of as much as hitherto hath been spoken, a man may pick out a conclusion that the Courtier which with his worthiness and credit must incline his prince to virtue must in manner of necessity be aged, for knowledge cometh very seldom-time before years, and specially in matters that be learned with experience. I cannot see, when he is well drawn in years, how it will stand well with him to be a lover, considering, as it hath been said the other night, love frameth not with old men, and the tricks that in young men be gallantness, courtesy, and preciseness so acceptable to women, in them are mere follies and fondness to be laughed at, and purchase him that useth them hatred of women and mocks of others. Therefore, in case this your Aristotile, an old Courtier, were a lover and practiced the feats that young lovers do, as some that we have seen in our days, I fear me he would forget to teach

Then said the Lord Octavian:6 "Since all the other qualities appointed to the Courtier are meet7 for him, although he be old, methink we should not then bar him from this happiness to love."

'Nay rather,' quoth the Lord Gaspar, 'to take this love from him is a perfection over and above, and a making him to live happily out of misery and wretchedness.'

Then M. Peter8 after a while's silence, somewhat settling himself as though he should entreat upon a weighty matter, said thus: "My lords, to show that old men may love not only without slander, but otherwhiles9 more happily than young men, I must be enforced to make a little discourse to declare what love is, and wherein consisteth the happiness that lovers may have. Therefore I beseech you give the hearing with heedfulness, for I hope to make you understand that it were not unfitting for any man here to be a lover, in case he were fifteen or twenty years elder than M. Morello."

And here, after they had laughed awhile, M. Peter proceeded: "I say, therefore, that according as it is defined of the wise men of old time, love is nothing else but a certain coveting to enjoy beauty;2 and forsomuch as coveting Iongeth for nothing but for things known, it is requisite that knowledge go evermore before coveting, which of his own nature willeth the good, but of himself is blind and knoweth it not. Therefore hath nature so ordained that to every virtue3 of knowledge there is annexed a virtue of longing. And because in our soul there be three manner4 ways to know, namely, by sense, reason, and understanding: of sense ariseth appetite or longing, which is common to us with brute beasts; of reason ariseth election or choice, which is proper5 to man; of understanding, by the which man may be partner with angels, ariseth will. Even as therefore the sense knoweth not but sensible matters and that which may be felt, so the appetite or coveting only desireth the same; and even as the understanding is bent but to behold things that may be understood, so is that which only fed with spiritual goods. Man of nature endowed with reason, placed, as it were, in the middle between these two extremities, may, through his choice inclining to sense or reaching to understanding, come nigh to the coveting sometime of the one, sometime of the other part. In these sorts therefore may beauty be coveted; the general name whereof may be applied to all things, either natural or artificial, that are framed in good proportion and due temper,6 as their nature beareth. But speaking of the beauty that we mean, which is only it that appeareth in bodies, and especially in the face of man, and moveth this fervent coveting which we call love, we will term it an influence of the heavenly bountifulness, the which for all it stretcheth over all things that be created (like the light of the sun), yet when it findeth out a face well proportioned, and framed with a certain lively agreement of several colors, and set forth with lights and shadows, and with an orderly distance and limits of lines, thereinto it distilleth itself and appearth most well favored, and decketh out and lighteneth the subject where it shineth with a marvelous grace and glistering; like the sunbeams that strike against beautiful plate of fine gold wrought and set with precious jewels, so that it draweth unto it men’s eyes with pleasure, and piercing through them imprinteth himself in the soul, and with an unwonted sweetness all to-stirreth her and delighteth, and setting her on fire maketh her to covet him.

"Do you believe, M. Morello," quoth then Count Lewis, "that beauty is always so good a thing as M. Peter Bembo speaketh of?"

"Not I, in good sooth," answered M. Morello. "But I remember rather that I have seen many beautiful women of a most ill inclination, cruel and spiteful, and it seemeth that, in a manner, it happeneth always so, for beauty maketh them proud, and pride, cruel."

Count Lewis said, smiling: "To you perhaps they seem cruel, because they content you not with it that you would have. But cause M. Peter Bembo to teach you in what sort old men ought to covet beauty, and what to seek at their ladies’ hands, and what to content themselves withal; and in not passing out of these bounds ye shall see that they shall be neither proud nor cruel, and will satisfy you with what you shall require."

M. Morello seemed then somewhat out of patience, and said: "I will not know the thing that toucheth me not. But cause you to be taught how the young men ought to covet this beauty that are not so fresh and lusty as old men be."

Here Sir Frederick, to pacify M. Morello and to break their talk, would not suffer Count Lewis to make answer, but interrupting him said: "Perhaps M. Morello is not altogether out of the way in saying that beauty is not always good, for the beauty of women is many times cause of infinite evils in the world—hatred, war, mortality, and destruction, whereof the razing of Troy can be a good witness; and beautiful women for the most part be either proud and cruel, as is said, or unchaste; but M. Morello would find no fault with that. There be also many wicked men that have the comeliness of a beautiful countenance, and it seemeth that nature hath so shaped them because they may be the readier to deceive, and that this amiable look were like a bait that covereth the hook."

Then M. Peter Bembo: "Believe not," quoth he, "but beauty is always good."

Here Count Lewis, because he would return again to his former purpose, interrupted him and said: "Since M. Morello passeth not to understand that which is so necessary for him, teach it me, and show me how old men may come by this happiness of love, for I will not care to be counted old, so it may profit me."

M. Peter Bembo laughed, and said: "First will I take the error out of these gentlemen's mind, and afterward will I satisfy you also." So beginning afresh: "My Lords," quoth he, "I would not that with speaking ill of beauty, which is a holy thing, any of us as profane and wicked should purchase him the wrath of God. Therefore, to give M. Morello and Sir Frederick warning, that they lose not their sight, as Stesichorus did—a pain most meet for whoso dispariseth beauty—I say that beauty cometh of God and is like a circle, the goodness whereof is the center. And therefore, as there can be no circle without a center, no more can beauty be without goodness. Whereupon doth very seldom an ill soul dwell in a beautiful body. And therefore is the outward beauty a true sign of the inward goodness, and in bodies this comeliness is imprinted, more and less, as it were, for a mark of the soul, whereby she is outwardly known; as in trees, in which the beauty of the buds giveth a testimony of the goodness of the fruit. And the very same happeneth in bodies, as it is seen that palmisters by the visage know many times the conditions and otherwhile the thoughts of men. And, which is more, in beasts also a man may discern by the face the quality of the courage, which in the body declareth itself as much as it can. Judge you how plainly in the face of a lion, a horse, and an eagle, a man shall discern anger, fierceness, and stoutness; in lambs and doves, simplicity and very innocency; the crafty subtlety in foxes and wolves; and the like, in a manner, in all other living creatures. The foul, therefore, for the most part be also evil, and the beautiful good. Therefore it may be said that beauty is a face pleasant, merry, comely, and to be desired for goodness; and foulness a face dark, uglesome, unpleasant, and to be shunned for ill. And in case you will consider all things, you shall find that whatsoever is good and profitable hath also evermore the comeliness of beauty. Behold the state of this great engine of the world, which God created for the health and preservation of everything that was made: the heaven round beset with so many heavenly lights; and in the middle the earth environed with the elements and upheld with the very weight of itself; the sun, that compassing about giveth light to the whole, and in winter season draweth to the lowermost sign, afterward by little and little climbeth again to the other part; the moon, that of him taketh her light, according as she draweth nigh or goeth farther from him; and the other five stars that diversely keep the very same course. These things among themselves have such force by the knitting together of an order so necessarily framed that, with altering them any one jot, they should all be loosed and the world would decay. They have also such beauty and comeliness that all the wits men have cannot imagine a more beautiful matter.

"Think now of the shape of man, which may be called a little world, in whom every parcel of his body is seen to be necessarily framed by art and not by hap, and then the form altogether most beautiful, so that it were a hard matter to judge whether the members (as the eyes, the nose, the mouth, the ears, the arms, the breast, and in like manner the other parts) give either more profit to the countenance and the rest of the body, or comeliness. The like may be said of all other living creatures. Behold the feathers of fowls, the leaves and boughs of trees, which be given them of nature to keep them in their being, and yet have they withal a very great sightliness. Leave nature, and come to art. What thing is so necessary in sailing vessels as the forepart, the sides, the main yards, the mast, the sails, the stern, oars, anchors, and tacklings? All these things notwithstanding are so well-favored in the eye that unto whoso beholdeth them they seem to have been found out as well for pleasure as for profit. Pillars and great beams uphold high buildings and palaces, and yet are they no less pleasureful unto the eyes of the beholders than profitable to the buildings. When men began first to build, in the middle of temples and houses they reared the ridge of the roof, not to make the works to have a better show, but because the water might the more commodiously avoid on both sides; yet unto profit there was forthwith adjoined a fair sightliness, so that if, under the sky where there falleth neither hail nor rain, a man should build a temple without a reared ridge, it is to be thought that it could have neither a sightly show nor any beauty. Besides other things, therefore, it giveth a great praise to the world in saying that it is beautiful. It is praised in saying the beautiful heaven, beautiful earth, beautiful sea, beautiful rivers, beautiful woods, trees, gardens, beautiful cities, beautiful churches, houses, armies. In conclusion, this comely and holy beauty is a wondrous setting out of everything. And it may be said that good and beautiful be after a sort one self thing, especially in the bodies of men; of the beauty whereof the highest cause, I suppose, is the beauty of the soul; the which, as a partner of the right and heavenly beauty, maketh sightly and beautiful whatever she toucheth, and most of all if the body where she dwelleth be not of so vile a matter that she cannot imprint in it her property. Therefore beauty is the true monument and spoil of the victory of the soul, when she with heavenly influence beareth rule over material and gross nature, and with her light overcometh the darkness of the body. It is not, then, to be spoken that beauty maketh women proud or cruel, although it seem so to M. Morello. Neither yet ought beautiful women to bear the blame of that hatred, mortality, and destruction which the unbridled appetites of men are the cause of. I will not now deny but it is possible also to find in the world beautiful women unchaste; yet not because beauty inclineth them to unchaste living, but otherwhile inclineth them into the way of virtuous conditions, through the affinity that beauty hath with goodness; but otherwhile they be overcome by the continual provocations of lovers' tokens, poverty, hope, deceits, fear, and a thousand other matters, overcome the steadfastness, yea, of beautiful and good women; and for these and like causes may also beautiful men become wicked."

Then said the Lord Cesar: "In case the Lord Gaspar's saying be true of yesternight, there is no doubt but the fair women be more chaste than the foul."

"And what was my saying?" quoth the Lord Gaspar.

The Lord Cesar answered: "If I do well bear in mind, your saying was that the women that are sued to, always refuse to satisfy him that sueth to them, but those that are not sued to, sue to others. There is no doubt but the beautiful women have always more suitors, and be more instantly laid at love, than the foul. Therefore the beautiful always deny, and consequently be more chaste than the foul, which, not being sued to, sue unto others."

M. Peter Bembo laughed, and said: "This argument cannot be answered to."

Afterward he proceeded: "It chanceth also, oftentimes, that as the other senses, so the sight is deceived and judgeth a face beautiful which indeed is not beautiful. And because in the eyes and in the whole countenance of some woman a man beholdeth otherwhile a certain lavish wantonness painted, with dishonest flickerings, many, whom that manner delighteth because it promised them an easiness to come by the thing that they covet, call it beauty; but indeed it is a cloaked un-shamefastness, unworthy of so honorable and holy a name."

M. Peter Bembo held his peace, but those lords still were earnest upon him to speak somewhat more of this love and of the way to enjoy beauty aright, and at the last, "Methink," quoth he, "I have showed plainly enough that old men may love more happily than young, which was my drift; therefore it belongeth not to me to enter any farther."

Count Lewis answered: "You have better declared the unluckiness of young men than the happiness of old men, whom you have not as yet taught what way they must follow in this love of theirs; only you have said that they must suffer themselves to be guided by reason, and the opinion of many is that it is unpossible for love to stand with reason."

Bembo notwithstanding sought to make an end of reasoning, but the duchess desired him to say on, and he began thus afresh: "Too unlucky were the nature of man, if our soul, in which this so fervent coveting may lightly arise, should be driven to nourish it with that only which is common to her with beasts, and could not turn it to the other noble part, which is proper to her. Therefore, since it is so your pleasure, I will not refuse to reason upon this noble matter. And because I know myself unworthy to talk of the most holy mysteries of Love, I beseech him to lead my thought and my tongue so that I may show this excellent Courtier how to love contrary to the wonted manner of the common ignorant sort; and even as from my childhood I have dedicated all my whole life unto him, so also now that my words may be answerable to the same intent, and to the praise of him. I say, therefore, that since the nature of man in youthful age is so much inclined to sense, it may be granted the Courtier, while he is young, to love sensually; but in case afterward also, in his riper years, he chance to be set on fire with this coveting of love, he ought to be good and circumspect, and heedful that he beguile not himself to be led willfully into the wretchedness that in young men deserveth more to be pitied than blamed, and contrariwise in old men more to be blamed than pitied. Therefore when an amiable countenance of a beautiful woman cometh in his sight, that is accompanied with noble conditions and honest behaviors, so that, as one practiced in love, he wotteth well that his hue hath an agreement with hers, as soon as he is aware that his eyes snatch that image and carry it to the heart, and that the soul beginneth to behold it with pleasure, and feeleth within herself the influence that stirreth her and by little and little setteth her in heat, and that those lively spirits that twinkle out through the eyes put continually fresh nourishment to the fire, he ought in this beginning to seek a speedy remedy and to raise up reason, and with her to fence the fortress of his heart, and to shut in such wise that they may enter neither with force nor subtle practice. Thus, if the flame be quenched, the jeopardy is also quenched. But in case it continue or increase, then must the Courtier determine, when he perceiveth he is taken, to shun thoroughly all filthiness of common love, and so enter into the holy way of love with the guide of reason, and first consider that the body where that beauty shineth is not the fountain from whence beauty springeth, but rather because beauty is bodiless and, as we have said, an heavenly shining beam, she loseth much of her honor when she is coupled with that vile subject and full of corruption: because the less she is partner thereof, the more perfect she is, and, clean sundered from it, is most perfect. And as a man heareth not with his mouth, nor smelleth with his ears, no more can he also in any manner wise enjoy beauty, nor satisfy the desire that she stirreth up in our minds, with feeling, but with the sense unto whom beauty is the very butt to level at, namely, the virtue of seeing. Let him lay aside, therefore, the blind judgment of the sense, and enjoy with his eyes the brightness, the comeliness, the loving sparkles, laughter, gestures, and all the other pleasant furnishings of beauty, especially with hearing the sweetness of her voice, the tunableness of her words, the melody of her singing and playing on instruments (in case the woman beloved be a musician); and so shall he with most dainty food feed the soul through the means of these two senses which have little bodily substance in them and be the ministers of reason, without entering farther toward the body with coveting unto any longing otherwise than honest. Afterward, let him obey, please, and honor with all reverence his woman, and reckon her more dear to him than his own life, and prefer all her commodities and pleasures before his own, and love no less in her the beauty of the mind than of the body. Therefore let him have a care not to suffer her to run into any error, but with lessons and good exhortations seek always to frame her to modesty, to temperance, to true honesty, and so to work that there may never take place in her other than pure thoughts and far wide from all filthiness of vices. And this shall be the right engendering and imprinting of beauty in beauty, the which some hold opinion to be the end of love. In this manner shall our Courtier be most acceptable to his lady, and she will always show herself toward him tractable, lowly, and sweet in language, and as willing to please him as to be beloved of him; and the wills of them both shall be most honest and agreeable, and they consequently shall be most happy.

Here M. Morello: "The engendering," quoth he, "of beauty in beauty aright were the engendering of a beautiful child in a beautiful woman; and I would think it a more manifest token a great deal that she loved her lover, if she pleased him with this than with the sweetness of language that you speak of."

M. Peter Bembo laughed, and said: "You must not, M. Morello, pass your bounds. I may tell you it is not a small token that a woman loveth when she giveth unto her lover her beauty, which is so precious a matter; and by the ways that be a passage to the soul (that is to say, the sight and the hearing) sendeth the looks of her eyes, the image of her countenance, and the voice of her words, that pierce into the lover's heart and give a witness of her love.

M. Morello said: "Looks and words may be, and oftentimes are, false witnesses. Therefore whoso hath not a better pledge of love, in my judgment he is in an ill assurance. And surely I looked? still that you would have made this woman of yours somewhat more courteous and free toward the Courtier than my Lord Julian hath made his; but meseemeth ye be both of the property? of those judges that, to appear wise, give sentence against their own."

Bembo said: "I am well pleased to have this woman much more courteous toward my Courtier not young than the Lord Julian's is to the young; and that with good reason, because mine coveteth but honest matters, and therefore may the woman grant him them all without blame. But my Lord Julian's woman, that is not so assured of the modesty of the young man, ought to grant him the honest matters only, and deny him the dishonest. Therefore more happy is mine, that hath granted him whatsoever he requireth, than the other, that hath part granted and part denied. And because2 you may moreover the better understand that reasonable love is more happy than sensual, I say unto you that selfsame things in sensual ought to be denied otherwise, and in reasonable granted; because in the one they be honest, and in the other dishonest. Therefore the woman, to please her good lover, besides the granting him merry countenances, familiar and secret talk, jesting, dallying, hand-in-hand, may also lawfully and without blame come to kissing, which in sensual love, according to the Lord Julian's rules, is not lawful. For since a kiss is a knitting together both of body and soul, it is to be feared lest the sensual lover will be more inclined to the part of the body than of the soul; but the reasonable lover wotteth well that although the mouth be a parcel3 of the body, yet is it an issue for the words that be the interpreters of the soul, and for the inward breath, which is also called the soul; and therefore hath a delight to join his mouth with the woman's beloved with a kiss, not to stir him to any unhonest desire, but because he feeleth that that bond is the opening of an entry to the souls, which, drawn with a coveting the one of the other, pour themselves by turn the one into the other's body, and be so mingled together that each of them hath two souls, and one alone, so framed of them both, ruleth, in a manner, two bodies. Whereupon a kiss may be said to be rather a coupling together of the soul than of the body, because it hath such force in her that it draweth her unto it, and, as it were, separateth her from the body. For this do all chaste lovers covet a kiss as a coupling of souls together. And therefore Plato,4 the divine lover, saith that in kissing his soul came as far as his lips to depart out of the body. And because the separating of the soul from the matters of the sense, and the thorough coupling of her with matters of understanding, may be betokened by a kiss, Solomon saith5 in his heavenly book of ballads, 'Oh that he would kiss me with a kiss of his mouth,' to express the desire he had that his soul might be ravished through heavenly love to the beholding of heavenly beauty in such manner that, coupling herself inwardly with it, she might forsake the body."

They stood all hearkening heedfully to Bembo's reasoning, and after he had stayed a while and saw that none spake, he said: "Since you have made me to begin to show our not-young Courtier this happy love, I will lead him yet somewhat farther forwards; because to stand still at this stay were somewhat perilous for him, considering, as we have oftentimes said, the soul is most inclined to the senses, and for all reason with discourse chooseth well, and knoweth that beauty not to spring of the body, and therefore seteth a bridle to the unhonest desires, yet to behold it always in that body doth oftentimes corrupt the right judgment. And where no other inconvenience ensieth upon it, one's absence from the wight beloved carrieth a great passion with it; because the influence of that beauty when it is present giveth a wondrous delight to the lover and, setting his heart on fire, quickeneth and melteth certain virtues in a trance and congealed in the soul, the which, nourished with the heat of love, flow about and go bubbling nigh the heart, and thrust out through the eyes those spirits which be most fine vapors made of the purest and clearest part of the blood, which receive the image of beauty and deck it with a thousand sundry furnitures. Whereupon the soul taketh a delight, and with a certain wonder is aghast, and yet enjoyeth she it, and, as it were, astonied together with the pleasure, feeleth the fear and reverence that men customably have toward holy matters, and thinketh herself to be in paradise. The lover, therefore, that considereth only the beauty in the body loseth this treasure and happiness as soon as the woman beloved with her departure leaveth the eyes without their brightness, and consequently the soul as a widow without her joy. For since beauty is far off, that influence of love seteth not the heart on fire, as it did in presence. Whereupon the pores be dried up and withered, and yet doth the remembrance of beauty somewhat stir those virtues of the soul in such wise that they seek to scatter abroad the spirits, and they, finding the ways closed up, have no issue, and still they seek to get out, and so with those shootings enclosed prick the soul and torment her bitterly, as young children when in their tender gums they begin to breed teeth. And hence come the tears, sighs, vexations, and torments of lovers; because the soul is always in affliction and travail and, in a manner, waxeth wood, until the beloved beauty cometh before her once again, and then she is immediately pacified and taketh breath, and, throughly bent to it, is nourished with most dainty food, and by her will would never depart from so sweet a sight. To avoid, therefore, the torment of this absence, and to enjoy beauty without passion, the Courtier by the help of reason must full and wholly call back again the coveting of the body to beauty alone, and, in what he can, behold it in itself simple and pure, and frame it within his imagination sundered from all matter, and so make it friendly and loving to his soul, and there enjoy it, and have it with him day and night, in every time and place, without mistrust ever to lose it; keeping always in mind that the body is a most diverse thing from beauty, and not only not increaseth but diminisheth the perfection of it. In this wise shall our not-young Courtier be out of all bitterness and wretchedness that young men feel, in a manner continually, as jealousies, suspicions, disdains, angers, desperations, and certain rages full of madness, whereby many times they be led into so great error that some do not only beat the women whom they love, but rid themselves out of their life. He shall do no wrong to the husband, father, brethren, or kinsfolk of the woman beloved. He shall not bring her in slander. He shall not be in case with much ado otherwise to refrain his eyes and tongue from discovering his desires to others. He shall not take thought at departure or in absence, because he shall evermore carry his precious treasure about with him shut fast within his heart. And besides, through the virtue of imagination, he shall fashion within himself that beauty much more fair than it is indeed. But among these commodities the lover shall find another yet far greater, in case he will take this love for a stair, as it were, to climb up to another far higher than it. The which he shall bring to pass, if he will go and consider with himself what a strait bond it is to be always in the trouble to behold the beauty of one body alone. And therefore, to come out of this so narrow a room, he shall gather in his thought by little and little so many ornaments that, meddling all beauties together, he shall make a universal concept, and bring the multitude of them to the unity of one alone, that is generally spread over all the nature of man. And thus shall he behold no more the particular beauty of one woman, but an universal, that decketh out all bodies. Whereupon, being made dim with this greater light, he shall not pass upon the lesser, and, burning in a more excellent flame, he shall little esteem it that he set great store by at the first. This stair of love, though it be very noble and such as few arrive at it, yet is it not in this sort to be called perfect, forsomuch as where the imagination is of force to make conveyance, and hath no knowledge but through those beginnings that the senses help her withal, she is not clean purged from gross darkness; and therefore, though she do consider that universal beauty in sunder and in itself alone, yet doth she not well and clearly discern it, nor without some doubtfulness, by reason of the agreement that the fancies have with the body. Wherefore such as come to this love are like young birds almost flush, which for all they flutter a little their tender wings, yet dare they not stray far from the nest, nor commit themselves to the wind and open weather. When our Courtier, therefore, shall be come to this point, although he may be called a good and happy lover, in respect of them that be drowned in the misery of sensual love, yet will I not have him to set his heart at rest, but boldly proceed farther, following the highway, after his guide that leadeth him to the point of true happiness. And thus, instead of going out of his wit with thought, as he must do that will consider the bodily beauty, he may come into his wit to behold the beauty that is seen with the eyes of the mind, which then begin to be sharp and through-seeing when the eyes of the body lose the flower of their sightliness.

"Therefore the soul, rid of vices, purged with the studies of true philosophy, occupied in spiritual, and exercised in matters of understanding, turning her to the beholding of her own substance, as it were raised out of a most deep sleep, openeth the eyes that all men have and few occupy, and seeth in herself a shining beam of that light which is the true image of the angel-like beauty parted with her, whereof she also partneth with the body a feeble shadow; therefore, waxed blind about earthly matters, is made most quick of sight about heavenly. And otherwhile, when the stirring virtues of the body are withdrawn alone through earnest beholding, either fast bound through sleep, when she is not hindered by them, she feeleth a certain privy smell of the right angel-like beauty, and, ravished with the shining of that light, beginneth to be inflamed, and so greedily followeth after, that in a manner she waxeth drunken and beside herself, for coveting to couple herself with it, having found, to her weening, the footsteps of God, in the beholding of whom, as in her happy end, she seeketh to settle herself. And therefore, burning in this most happy flame, she ariseth to the noblest part of her, which is the understanding, and there, no more shadowed with the dark night of earthly matters, seeth the heavenly beauty: but yet doth she not for all that enjoy it altogether perfectly, because she beholdeth it only in her particular understanding, which cannot conceive the passing great universal beauty; whereupon, not throughly satisfied with this benefit, love giveth unto the soul a greater happiness. For like as through the particular beauty of one body he guideth her to the universal beauty of all bodies, even so in the last degree of perfection through particular understanding he guideth her to the universal understanding. Thus the soul kindled in the most holy fire of heavenly love fleeth to couple herself with the nature of angels, and not only clean forsaketh sense, but hath no more need of the discourse of reason, for, being changed into an angel, she understandeth all things that may be understood; and without any veil or cloud she seeth the main sea of the pure heavenly beauty, and receiveth it into her, and enjoyeth that sovereign happiness that cannot be comprehended of the senses. Since, therefore, the beauties which we daily see with these our dim eyes in bodies subject to corruption, that nevertheless be nothing else but dreams and most thin shadows of beauty, seem unto us so well favored and comely that oftentimes they kindle in us a most burning fire, and with such delight that we reckon no happiness may be compared to it that we feel otherwhile through the only look which the beloved countenance of a woman casteth at us; what happy wonder, what blessed abashment, may we reckon that to be which taketh the souls which come to have a sight of the heavenly beauty? What sweet flame, what sweet incense, may a man believe that to be which ariseth of the fountain of the sovereign and right beauty? Which is the origin of all other beauty, which never increaseth nor diminisheth, always beautiful, and of itself, as well on the one part as on the other, only like itself, and partner of none other, but in such wise beautiful that all other beautiful things be beautiful because they be partners of the beauty of it.

"This is the beauty unseparable from the high bounty which with her voice calleth and draweth to her all things; and not only to the endowed with understanding giveth understanding, to the reasonable reason, to the sensual sense and appetite to live, but also partaketh with plants and stones, as a print of herself, stirring, and the natural provocation of their properties. So much, therefore, is this love greater and happier than others, as the cause that stirreth it is more excellent. And therefore, as common fire trieth gold and maketh it fine, so this most holy fire in souls destroyeth and consumeth whatsoever is mortal in them, and relieveth and maketh beautiful the heavenly part, which at the first by reason of the sense was dead and buried in them. This is the great fire in the which, the poets write, that Hercules was burned on the top of the mountain Oeta, and, through that consuming with fire, after his death was holy and immortal. This is the fiery bush of Moses; the divided tongues of fire; the inflamed chariot of Elias; which doubleth grace and happiness in their souls that be worthy to see it, when they forsake this earthly baseness and flee up into heaven. Let us, therefore, bend all our force and thoughts of soul to this most holy light, which showeth us the way which leadeth to heaven; and after it, putting off the affections we were clad withal at our coming down, let us climb up the stairs which at the lowermost step have the shadow of sensual beauty, to the high mansion place where the heavenly, amiable, and right beauty dwelleth, which lieth hid in the inner-most secrets of God, lest unhallowed eyes should come to the sight of it; and there shall we find a most happy end for our desires, true rest for our travails, certain remedy for miseries, a most healthful medicine for sickness, a most sure haven in the troublesome storms of the tempestuous sea of this life.

"What tongue mortal is there then, Oh most holy Love, that can sufficiently praise thy worthiness? Thou most beautiful, most good, most wise, art derived of the unity of heavenly beauty, goodness, and wisdom, and therein dost thou abide, and unto it through it, as in a circle, turnest about. Thou the most sweet bond of the world, a mean betwixt heavenly and earthly things, with a bountiful temper bendest the high virtues to the government of the lower, and turning back the minds of mortal men to their beginning, couplest them with it. Thou with agreement bringest the elements in one, and stirrest nature to bring forth that which ariseth for the succession of the life. Thou bringest severed matters into one, to the unperfect givest perfection, to the unlike likeness, to enmity amity, and goodwill, enemy to rude wildness and sluggishness—to be short, the beginning and end of all goodness. And forsomuch as thou delightest to dwell in the flower of beautiful bodies and beautiful souls, I suppose that thy abiding-place is now here among us, and from above otherwhile showest thyself a little to the eyes and minds of them that be worthy to see thee. Therefore vouchsafe, Lord, to hearken to our prayers, pour thyself into our hearts, and with the brightness of thy most holy fire lighten our darkness, and, like a trusty guide in this blind maze, show us the right way; reform the falsehood of the senses, and after long wandering in vanity give us the right and sound joy.
Make us to smell those spiritual savors that relieve the virtues of the understanding, and to hear the heavenly harmony so tunable that no discord of passion take place any more in us. Make us drunken with the bottomless fountain of contentation that always doth delight and never giveth fill, and that giveth a smack of the right bliss unto whoso drinketh of the running and clear water thereof. Purge with the shining beams of thy light our eyes from

When Bembo had hitherto spoken with such vehemency that a man would have thought him, as it were, ravished and beside himself, he stood still without once moving, holding his eyes toward heaven as astohied; when the Lady Emilia,9 which together with the rest gave most diligent ear to this talk, took him by the plait of his garment and plucking him a little, said: "Take heed, M.
Peter, that these thoughts make not your soul also to forsake the body."

"Madam," answered M. Peter, "it should not be the first miracle that love hath wrought in me."

Then the Duchess and all the rest began afresh to be instant1 upon M.
Bembo that he would proceed once more in his talk, and everyone thought he felt in his mind, as it were, a certain sparkle of that godly love that pricked him, and they all coveted to hear farther; but M. Bembo: "My Lords," quoth he, "I have spoken what the holy fury of love hath, unsought for, indited2 to me; now that, it seemeth, he inspireth me no more, I wot not what to say. And I think verily that Love will hot have his secrets discovered any farther, nor that the Courtier should pass the degree that his pleasure is I should show him, and therefore it is not perhaps lawful to speak any more in this matter."

"Surely," quoth the Duchess, "if the not-young Courtier be such a one that he can follow this way which you have showed him, of right he ought to be satisfied with so great a happiness, and not to envy the younger."

Then the Lord Cesar Gonzaga: "The way," quoth he, "that leadeth to this happiness is so steep, in my mind, that I believe it will be much ado to get to it."

The Lord Caspar said: 'I believe it be hard to get up for men, but unpossible for women.'

The Lady Emilia laughed, and said: "If you fall so often to offend us, I promise you you shall be no more forgiven."3

The Lord Gaspar answered: 'It is no offense to you in saying that women's souls be not so purged from passions as men's be, nor accustomed in behold-ings,' as M. Peter hath said is necessary for them to be that will taste of the heavenly love. Therefore it is not read that ever woman hath had this grace;

a number of our holy fathers, as Saint Francis, in whom a fervent spirit of love imprinted the most holy seal of the five wounds.\(^5\) And nothing but the virtue\(^6\) of love could hale up Saint Paul the Apostle to the sight of those secrets which is not lawful for man to speak of; nor show Saint Stephen the heaverls open.\(^7\)

Here answered the Lord Julian: "In this point men shall nothing pass women, for Socrates himself doth confess that all the mysteries of love which he knew were oped unto him by a woman, which was Diotima.\(^8\) And the angel that with the fire of love imprinted the five wounds in Saint Francis hath also made some women worthy of the same print in our age. You must remember, moreover, that Saint Mary Magdalen\(^9\) had many faults forgiven her, because she loved much; and perhaps with no less grace than Saint Paul was she many times through angelic love haled up to the third heaven. And many other, as I showed you yesterday more at large, that for love of the name of Christ have not passed upon\(^1\) life, nor feared torments, nor any other kind of death how terrible and cruel ever it were. And they were not, as M. Peter will have his Courtier to be, aged, but soft and tender maidens, and in the age when he saith that sensual love ought to be borne withal in men."

The Lord Gaspar began to prepare himself to speak, but the Duchess: "Of this," quoth she, "let M. Peter be judge, and the matter shall stand to his verdict, whether women be not as meet for heavenly love as men. But because the plead\(^2\) between you may happen be too long, it shall not be amiss to defer it until tomorrow."

"Nay, tonight," quoth the Lord Cesar Gonzaga.

"And how can it be tonight?" quoth the Duchess.

The Lord Cesar answered: "Because it is day already," and showed her the light that began to enter in at the clefts of the windows. Then every man arose upon his feet with much wonder, because they had not thought that the reasonings had lasted longer than the accustomed wont, saving only that they were begun much later, and with their pleasantness had deceived so the lords' minds that they wist\(^3\) not of the going away of the hours. And not one of them felt any heaviness of sleep in his eyes, the which often happeneth when a man is up after his accustomed hour to go to bed. When the windows then were opened on the side of the palace that hath his prospect toward the high top of Mount Catri, they saw already risen in the east a fair morning like unto the color of roses, and all stars voided,\(^4\) saving only the sweet governess of the heaven, Venus, which keepeth the bounds of the night and the day, from which appeared to blow a sweet blast that, filling the air with a biting cold, began to quicken the tunable notes of the pretty birds among the hushing woods of the hills at hand. Whereupon they all, taking their leave with reverence of the duchess, departed toward their lodgings without torch, the light of the day sufficing.

Women in Power

Tudor England was a patriarchal and in many respects intensely misogynistic society, one that took for granted the subordination of women in public, private, economic, and spiritual life. The relatively few dissenting voices were vastly outnumbered by those of writers who cited alleged scriptural, medical, moral, historical, and philosophical ‘proofs’ of male superiority. Women were tirelessly urged to be chaste, silent, and obedient, and these urgings could be enforced. Husbands perceived to be dominated by their wives were on occasion publicly ridiculed, and women perceived to be scolds could be brutally punished with a “brank”—a metal cage for the head with a built-in gag. Yet from 1550 to 1603 England had five uninterrupted decades of female rule. How much did this unprecedented experience affect gender relations in the society? The answer would seem to be, precious little.

To be sure, even the most belligerent misogynists had to acknowledge the commanding authority of the women at top. But these powerful female rulers were generally perceived as anomalies; and none of them showed a personal interest in improving the general lot of women in their society. Their principal focus, understandably, was not sisterhood but survival. And the path to survival in the sixteenth century, for women as for men, was blood-soaked. Two of the figures introduced in this section, Mary Tudor and Elizabeth, signed the death warrants of the two others, Jane Grey and Mary Stuart. In addition, Mary Tudor probably came close to having her half-sister, Elizabeth, executed, and Mary Stuart plotted Elizabeth’s assassination.

In certain respects women were if anything more disadvantaged at the end of the Tudor era than they had been half a century earlier. Before the Reformation, some learned and ambitious women found within convents scope for both literary expression and the exercise of authority. With the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII, that option was closed, and the strong Protestant emphasis on marriage further narrowed for women the possibilities of an independent life. At the same time that Protestantism had the effect of restricting the scope of women’s authority, however, its insistence on Scripture as the crucial guide to faith also sharply increased the emphasis on literacy, which contributed to a gradual increase in the number of women readers and writers. Moreover, if male chauvinism and misogyny were as ubiquitous as ever, condemnations of the female sex could not under Elizabeth be quite so sweeping or absolute as in previous times. When the prominent humanist Sir Thomas Smith considered how he should describe his country’s social order, he declared that “we do reject women, as those whom nature hath made to keep home and to nourish their family and children, and not to meddle with matters abroad, nor to bear office in a city or commonwealth.” Then, with a kind of nervous glance over his shoulder, he made an exception of those few in whom “the blood is respected, not the age nor the sex”: for example, the queen.

Even at the top, however, women could not easily escape being defined by their marital status, sexual behavior, and reproductive potential. Such was the case for Jane Grey, matched to Guildford Dudley as a move in a reckless political game; for Mary Tudor, with her marriage to a foreign king and her phantom pregnancies; and for Mary Stuart, with her string of disastrous marriages and reputed sexual liaisons. Imagining how the careers of these contemporary women appeared to the eyes of Elizabeth helps explain her choice to remain unwed.
MARY I (MARY TUDOR)

Mary Tudor (1516—1558) was the only surviving child of Henry VIII’s first wife, Catherine of Aragon. The king saw his daughter as a useful bargaining chip in international diplomacy—at the age of six she was engaged to be married to her cousin Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor and England’s chief ally against France—but balked at the thought of leaving his kingdom to a female heir. Blaming Catherine for failing to produce a son, he determined to seek a divorce. The pope’s refusal to grant it precipitated the Protestant Reformation in England.

In the years immediately following the royal divorce and the break with Rome, Mary had good reason to believe that her life was in danger. When, like Thomas More, she refused to take the Oaths of Succession and Supremacy, Henry came close to having her arrested for treason. At length, her own Catholic councilors prevailed on her to sign the oaths rather than lose her life. Sparing her no humiliation, the Privy Council insisted that she add a postscript acknowledging that Henry VIII’s marriage to her mother had been “incestuous and unlawful,” thus effectively declaring herself a bastard. In his will, however, Henry VIII left Mary second in line for the throne, after her younger half-brother, Edward.

Harassed for harboring priests and attending mass during Edward’s reign, Mary very nearly did not survive the attempt, at its end, to establish as successor the Protestant Jane Grey. But when, somewhat surprisingly, Protestants as well as Catholics rallied firmly to Mary’s cause, she ascended to the throne, and Jane Grey and her supporters went to the scaffold. The early eagerness of Protestants to accept Henry VIII’s legitimate heir as their queen, regardless of her religion, diminished sharply when it became clear that Mary intended to marry a foreign ruler, Philip II of Spain. ( Eleven years her junior, Philip was the son of her childhood fiance, Charles V.) Sir Thomas Wyatt, son of the poet of the same name, led an uprising in January 1554 to prevent the match. Urged to flee, Mary instead went to the Guildhall in London and made a forceful speech that garnered popular support.

Wyatt’s rebellion was subdued, but there would never thereafter be real peace between Mary and her subjects. Her determination to restore the Catholic religion was probably welcomed by the majority, but there was no hope of avoiding confrontation with committed Protestants, and Mary did not attempt to avoid it. Between the beginning of 1555 and the end of her reign in 1558, she had 283 Protestants, from famous bishops to village zealots, executed for heresy. The immediate popular response of horror and resentment, which would soon solidify into the lurid historical legend of “Bloody Mary,” had less to do with the number of executions than with the nature of the charge and with the grisly method employed. In reality both Henry VIII and Elizabeth executed many more people in the course of their reigns than did Mary. But Henry and Elizabeth, who were disposed to treat religious dissent as treason, typically had their victims executed as traitors, that is, hanged or beheaded. The pious Mary attempted to stamp out heresy and had her victims burned at the stake.

Impelled to marry for political reasons, Mary seemed to fall genuinely in love with her husband, who, however, did not reciprocate her feelings. On two occasions in her reign, she believed and announced herself to be with child, but both were phantom pregnancies. The melancholy from which she had always suffered intensified in the later years of her reign, when she grappled with bitter disappointments: many of her subjects incorrigibly heretical, her husband aloof and usually absent, her body apparently incapable of child-bearing. In 1558 Mary died, leaving the throne to her Protestant half-sister.
Letter to Henry VIII

To the King’s Most Gracious Highness, my father:

Most humbly prostrate before the feet of Your Most Excellent Majesty, your most humble, faithful, and obedient subject, which hath so extremely offended Your Most Gracious Highness that my heavy and fearful heart dare not presume to call you father, ne’er Your Majesty hath any cause by my deserts, saving the benignity of your most blessed nature doth surmount all evils, offenses, and trespasses, and is ever merciful and ready to accept the penitent calling for grace in any convenient time. Having received this Thursday at night certain letters from Mr. Secretary, as well advising me to make my humble submission immediately to yourself, which because I durst not without your gracious license presume to do before, I lately sent unto him, as signifying that your most merciful heart and fatherly pity had granted me your blessing, with condition that I should persevere in that I had commenced and begun, and that I should not eftsoons offend Your Majesty by the denial or refusal of any such articles and commandments as it may please Your Highness to address unto me for the perfect trial of mine heart and inward affection. For the perfect declaration of the bottom of my heart and stomach, first, I knowledgeth myself to have most unkindly and unnaturally offended Your Most Excellent Highness, in that I have not submitted myself to your most just and virtuous laws, and for mine offense therein, which I must confess were in me a thousandfold more grievous than they could be in any other living creature, I put myself wholly and entirely to your gracious mercy; at whose hands I cannot receive that punishment for the same that I have deserved. Secondly, to open my heart to Your Grace in these things which I have hitherto refused to condescend unto, and have now written with mine own hand, sending the same to Your Highness herewith; I shall never beseech Your Grace to have pity and compassion of me, if ever you shall perceive that I shall privily or aperently vary or alter from one piece of that I have written and subscribed, or refuse to confirm, ratify, or declare the same where Your Majesty shall appoint me. Thirdly, as I have and shall, knowing your excellent learning, virtue, wisdom, and knowledge, put my soul into your direction, and, by the same, hath and will, in all things, from henceforth direct my conscience, so my body I do wholly commit to your mercy and fatherly pity; desiring no state, no condition, nor no manner degree of living, but such as Your Grace shall appoint unto me; knowledging and confessing that my state cannot be so vile as either the extremity of justice would appoint unto me, or as mine offenses have required and deserved. And whatsoever Your Grace shall command me to do, touching

I. After the execution of Anne Boleyn on May 19, 1536, Mary thought that she would quickly be restored to her father’s favor. Henry, though, persisted in the demand that he had been making of her for several years: that she acknowledge in writing his supremacy over the English church, as well as the invalidity of his marriage to her mother. In the weeks following Anne’s beheading, Mary’s continuing refusal to comply with this demand infuriated Henry to the point that he threatened her (not for the first time) with death. Finally, lambasted by Henry’s secretary and principal adviser Thomas Cromwell, who had supported her until the king’s rage made him fear for his own safety, and urged to submit even by her Spanish allies, Mary yielded, signing the prescribed articles on a Thursday night in June (either the 15th or the 22nd), and writing her father this supplicatory letter (which may have been drafted by Cromwell).

From An Ambassdorial Dispatch to the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V: The Coronation of Mary I

Your Highness’s own cousin, 2 Queen Mary, now wears the crown of this kingdom. She was crowned on the first day of this month, 3 with the pomp and ceremonies customary here, which are far grander than elsewhere, as I shall briefly show; and according to the rites of the old religion. 4 On the eve of her coronation-day, the queen was removed from the Tower and castle of London to Westminster Palace, where the sovereigns of England are by custom wont to reside in London. She was accompanied by the earls, lords, gentlemen, ambassadors, and officers, all dressed in rich garments. The queen was carried in an open litter covered with brocade. Two coaches followed her: the Lady Elizabeth and the Lady of Cleves 5 rode in one; some of the ladies of the court in the other. The streets were hung with tapestries and strewn with grass and flowers; and many triumphal arches were erected along her way. The next day, coronation-day, the queen went from the Hall of Parliament and Justice to the church, 6 in procession with the bishops and priests in full canonical dress, the streets being again covered with flowers and decked with stuffs. 7 She mounted a scaffolding that was erected at the church for this purpose, and showed herself to the people. The queen’s coronation was proclaimed to them and the question asked of them if they were willing to accept her as their queen. All answered: Yes; and the ordinary ceremonies were then gone through, the queen making an offering of silver and silken stuffs. The bishop of Winchester, who officiated, gave her the scepter and the orb, fastened on the spurs, and girt her with the sword; he received the oath, and she was twice anointed and crowned with three crowns. The ceremonies lasted from ten in the morning till five o'clock in the afternoon. She was carried from the church to the Parliament Hall, where a banquet was prepared. The queen sat on a stone chair covered with brocade, which they say was carried off from Scotland in sign of a victory, and was once used by the kings of Scotland at their crowning; she rested her feet upon two of her ladies, which is also a part of the prescribed ceremonial, and ate thus. She was served by the earls and lords, Knights of the Order and officers, each one performing his own special office. The meats were carried by the Knights of the Bath. These knights are made by the kings on the eve of their coronation and at no other time; and their rank is inferior to the other order. The queen instituted twenty fresh ones. They are called Knights of the Bath because they plunge naked into a bath with the king and kiss his shoulder. The queen being a woman, the ceremony was performed for her by the earl of Arundel, her great master of the household. The earl marshal and the lord steward directed the ceremonies mounted on horseback in the great hall. When the banquet was over, an armed knight rode in upon a Spanish horse and flung down his glove, while one of the kings of arms challenged anyone who opposed the queen's rights to pick up the glove and fight the champion in single combat. The queen gave him a gold cup, as it is usual to do. Meanwhile the earls, vassals, and councillors paid homage to her, kissing her on the shoulder; and the ceremonies came to an end without any of the interruptions or troubles that were feared on the part of the Lutherans, who would rejoice in upsetting the queen's reign. They were feared especially because of the Lady Elizabeth, who does not feel sincerely the oath she took at the coronation; she has had intelligence with the king of France, which has been discovered. A remedy is to be sought at the convocation of the estates, which is to take place on the fifth of this month: Elizabeth is to be declared a bastard, having been born during the lifetime of Queen Catherine, mother of the queen. The affairs of the kingdom are unsettled because the vassals and people are prone to scandal, and seekers after novelties; they are strange and troublesome folk.

The Oration of Queen Mary in the Guildhall, on the First of February, 1554

I am come unto you in mine own person, to tell you that which already you see and know; that is, how traitorously and rebelliously a number of Kentishmen have assembled themselves against both us and you. Their pretense (as they said at the first) was for a marriage determined for us: to the which, and to all the articles thereof, ye have been made privy. But since, we have caused certain of our privy council to go again unto them, and to demand the cause of this their rebellion: and it appeared then unto our said council that the matter of the marriage seemed to be but a Spanish cloak to cover their pretended purpose against our religion; for that they arrogantly and traitorously demanded to have the governance of our person, the keeping of the Tower, and the placing of our councillors.

Now, loving subjects, what I am, ye right well know. I am your queen, to whom at my coronation, when I was wedded to the realm and laws of the same (the spousal ring whereof I have on my finger, which never hitherto was, nor hereafter shall be, left off), you promised your allegiance and obedience unto me. And that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown of this realm of England, I take all Christendom to witness. My father, as ye all know, possessed the same regal state, which now rightly is descended unto me: and to him always ye showed yourselves most faithful and loving subjects; and therefore I doubt not, but ye will show yourselves likewise to me, and that ye will not suffer a vile traitor to have the order and governance of our person, and to occupy our estate, especially being so vile a traitor as Wyatt is; who most certainly, as he hath abused mine ignorant subjects which be on his side, so doth he intend and purpose the destruction of you, and spoil of your goods.

And this I say to you, on the word of a prince: I cannot tell how naturally the mother loveth the child, for I was never the mother of any; but certainly, if a prince and governor may as naturally and earnestly love her subjects, as the mother doth the child, then assure yourselves that I, being your lady and mistress, do as earnestly and as tenderly love and favor you. And I, thus loving you, cannot but think that ye as heartily and faithfully love me; and then I doubt not but we shall give these rebels a short and speedy overthrow.

As concerning the marriage, ye shall understand that I enterprised not the doing thereof without advice, and that by the advice of all our privy council, who so considered and weighed the great commodities that might ensue thereof, that they not only thought it very honorable, but also expedient, both for the wealth of our realm and also of all you our subjects. And as touching myself, I assure you, I am not so bent to my will, neither so precise nor affectionate, that either for mine own pleasure I would choose where I lust, or that I am so desirous as needs I would have one. For God, I thank him, to whom be the praise therefore, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt nothing but with God’s grace am able so to live still. But if, as my progenitors have done before, it might please God that I might leave some fruit of my body behind me to be your governor, I trust ye would not only rejoice thereat, but also I know it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if I either did think or know that this marriage were to the hurt of any of you my commons, or to the impeachment of any part or parcel of the royal state of this realm of England, I would never consent thereunto, neither would I ever marry while I lived. And on the word of a queen I promise you that if it shall not probably appear to all the nobility and commons in the high court of Parliament that this marriage shall be for the high benefit and commodity of the whole realm, then I will abstain from marriage while I live.

And now, good subjects, pluck up your hearts, and like true men stand fast against these rebels, both our enemies and yours, and fear them not; for I assure you, I fear them nothing at all. And I will leave with you my Lord Howard and my Lord treasurer, who shall be assistants with the mayor for your defense.

LADY JANE GREY

Jane Grey (1537—1554) was unlucky in her parents, the duke and duchess of Suffolk. They were, by her own account, impossible to please, subjecting her to taunts, threats, and physical abuse whenever she made a minor error in performance or deportment. Much worse for Jane, her mother was a granddaughter of Henry VII with a distant but just plausible claim to the English throne. This fact, more than any action of her own, determined the course of Jane’s life and death.

In 1553 England was ruled in name by the boy-king Edward VI, but in reality by John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, who as protector (regent) stood at the head of a decisively Protestant regime. With Edward’s health in decline and his Catholic half-sister Mary next in line to the throne, Protestant nobles feared for their future and for England’s. For Northumberland, Jane Grey’s bloodline offered an elegant solution. Aged fifteen, Lady Jane was married to Northumberland’s son, Guildford Dudley. Within six weeks of the marriage, Edward VI was dead, and the privy council, pressured by Northumberland, had denounced Mary Tudor as a bastard and declared Jane Grey queen of England (her mother having instantly abdicated in her favor).

Jane’s reign lasted a mere nine days, July 9—18. For the first seventy-two hours, there seemed some hope of the coup’s success; even the hostile ambassadors of Catholic powers were ready to hail Jane as queen. But the nobility and the common people, Protestant as well as Catholic, soon rallied to Mary’s cause: respect for the rights of inheritance seems to have outweighed religious partisanship. Within weeks Northumberland was defeated, arrested, and executed. Jane, who had briefly reigned from the Tower of London, was now made prisoner there. The victorious Mary initially had no intention of executing Jane or her young husband, who, she recognized, had been no more than pawns in their parents’ political games. But in January 1554 the duke of Suffolk joined in an ill-fated rebellion intended to reinstate his daughter on the throne. Mary’s councillors convinced her that Jane would pose a danger as long as she remained alive. On the morning of February 12, 1554, Jane watched from a Tower window as her husband Guildford went to his public execution; within an hour she too had been beheaded, privately, on Tower Green.

Jane Grey was never really a woman in power. Her ability to command her own destiny, let alone that of others, was hardly greater when she was queen of England than when she was prisoner in the Tower. Yet it is clear from her own writings and the testimony of others that Jane possessed a firm, even fiery will of her own. In her brief stint as queen, she shocked her controllers by refusing to allow Guildford to take the title of king and rule jointly with her, and again by insisting that Northumberland, rather than her father Suffolk, should lead her forces against Mary. Her will was harnessed to a militant and unshakeable Protestantism; from an early age she mocked Catholic beliefs. In the Tower, where a timely conversion might well have saved her life, she instead wrote a violent and soon public letter to her one-time tutor Harding, who had converted, lambasting him as a "seed of Satan." Yet far from being a narrow bigot, Jane was at age sixteen among the most learned women of her century; she had mastered Latin and Greek and was a student of Hebrew. She rivalled Elizabeth in intellectual brilliance and—to her fatal cost—exceeded her greatly in religious fervor.

[A TALK WITH LADY JANE]

 One example whether love or fear doth work more in a child for virtue and learning I will gladly report; which may be heard with some pleasure and followed with more profit. Before I went into Germany, I came to Broadgate in Leicestershire to take my leave of that noble Lady Jane Grey, to whom I was exceeding much beholding. Her parents, the duke and the duchess, with all the household, gentlemen and gentlewomen, were hunting in the park. I found her in her chamber reading Phaedon Platonis in Greek, and that with as much delight as some gentleman would read a merry tale in Boccaccio. After salutation and duty done, with some other talk, I asked her why she would lose such pastime in the park. Smiling she answered me, "Iwis, all their sport in the park is but a shadow to that pleasure that I find in Plato. Alas, good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant." "And how came you, madam," quoth I, "to this deep knowledge of pleasure, and what did chiefly allure you unto it, seeing not many women, but very few men, have attained thereunto?" "I will tell you," quoth she, "and tell you a truth which perchance ye will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits that ever God gave me is that he sent me so sharp and severe parents and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go, eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number, even so perfectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea, presently sometimes, with pinches, nips, and bobs, and other ways which I will not name for the honor I bear them, so without measure misordered, that I think myself in hell till time come that I must go to Master Aylmer, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing whilst I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping, because whatsoever I do else but learning is full of grief, trouble, fear, and whole misliking unto me. And thus my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure and more, that in respect of it all other pleasures in very deed be but trifles and troubles unto me." I remember this talk gladly, both because it is so worthy of memory and because also it was the last talk that ever I had, and the last time that ever I saw, that noble and worthy lady.

From A Letter of the Lady Jane to M.H., late chaplain to the duke of Suffolk her father, and then fallen from the truth of God's most Holy Word.¹

So oft as I call to mind the dreadful and fearful saying of God, "That he which layeth hold upon the plough, and looketh back, is not meet for the kingdom of heaven,"² and, on the other side, the comfortable³ words of our Savior Christ to all those that, forsaking themselves, do follow him, I cannot but marvel at thee, and lament thy case, which seemed sometime to be the lively member of Christ, but now the deformed imp⁴ of the devil; sometime the beautiful temple of God, but now the stinking and filthy kennel of Satan; sometime the unspotted spouse of Christ, but now the unshamefaced paramour of Antichrist; sometime my faithful brother, but now a stranger and apostate; sometime a stout Christian soldier, but now a cowardly runaway. Yea, when I consider these things, I cannot but speak to thee, and cry out upon thee, thou seed of Satan, and not of Judah,⁵ whom the devil hath deceived, the world hath beguiled, and the desire of life subverted, and made thee a Christian an infidel. Wherefore hast thou taken the testament of the Lord in thy mouth? Wherefore hast thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore hast thou instructed others to be strong in Christ, when thou thyself dost now so shamefully shrink, and so horribly abuse the testament and law of the Lord? when thou thyself preachest not to steal, yet most abominably stealest, not from men but from God, and, committing most heinous sacrilege, robtest Christ thy Lord of his right members, thy body and thy soul, and choosest rather to live miserably with shame to the world, than to die and gloriously with honor reign with Christ, in whom even in death is life? Why dost thou now show thyself most weak, when indeed thou oughtest to be most strong? The strength of a fort is unknown before the assault: but thouyieldest thy hold before any battery be made.

O wretched and unhappy man, what art thou, but dust and ashes? and wilt thou resist Him that called thee from the custom gathering among the Romish

Like many other English clergymen, Harding had renounced his Protestantism after Mary I made clear her determination to restore Catholicism. Jane, who wrote from her prison in the Tower, might have had her life spared if she had followed the same course.

Darest thou deliver up thyself to another, being not thine own, but his? How canst thou, having knowledge, or how darest thou neglect the law of the Lord and follow the vain traditions of men; and whereas thou hast been a public professor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuse the true God, and worship the invention of man, the golden calf, the whore of Babylon,\(^6\) the Romish religion, the abominable idol, the most wicked Mass? Wilt thou torment again, rend and tear the most precious body of our Savior Christ, with thy bodily and fleshly teeth?\(^7\) Wilt thou take upon thee to offer up any sacrifice unto God for our sins, considering that Christ offered up himself, as Paul saith, upon the cross, a lively sacrifice once for all? Can neither the punishment of the Israelites (which, for their idolatry, they so oft received), nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curses of God's own mouth, fear thee to honor any other god than him? Dost thou so regard Him that spared not his dear and only son for thee, so diminishing, yea, utterly extinguishing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praise and honor due unto him to the idols, "which have mouths and speak not, eyes and see not, ears and hear not";\(^8\) which shall perish with them that made them?

Return, return again into Christ's war, and, ascometh a faithful warrior, put on that armor that St. Paul teacheth to be most necessary for a Christian man.\(^9\) And above all things take to you the shield of faith, and be you provoked by Christ's own example to withstand the devil, to forsake the world, and to become a true and faithful member of his mystical body, who spared not his own body for our sins.

Throw down yourself with the fear of his threatened vengeance for this so great and heinous an offense of apostasy; and comfort yourself, on the other part, with the mercy, blood, and promise of him that is ready to turn unto you whensoever you turn unto him. Disdain not to come again with the lost son,\(^1\) seeing you have so wandered with him. Be not ashamed to turn again with him from the swill of strangers\(^2\) to the delicates of your most benign and loving Father, acknowledging that you have sinned against heaven and earth: against heaven, by staining the glorious name of God and causing his most sincere and pure word to be evil-spoken-of through you; against earth, by offending so many of your weak brethren, to whom you have been a stumbling-block through your sudden sliding. Be not abashed to come home again with Mary, and weep bitterly with Peter,\(^3\) not only with shedding the tears of your bodily eyes, but also pouring out the streams of your heart—to wash away, out of the sight of God, the filth and mire of your offensive fall. Be not abashed to say with the publican, 'Lord be merciful unto me a sinner.'

Last of all, let the lively remembrance of the last day be always before your eyes, remembering the terror that such shall be in at that time, with the run-agates and fugitives from Christ, which, setting more by the world than by heaven, more by their life than by him that gave them life, did shrink, yea did clean fall away, from him that forsook not them; and, contrariwise, the inestimable joys prepared for them that, fearing no peril nor dreading death, have manfully fought and victoriously triumphed over all power of darkness, over hell, death, and damnation, through their most redoubted captain Christ, who now stretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiss you, and, last of all, to feast you with the dainties and delicates of his own precious blood: which undoubtedly, if it might stand with his determinate purpose, he would not let to shed again, rather than you should be lost. To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honor, praise, and glory everlasting. Amen.

Be constant, be constant; fear not for pain: Christ hath redeemed thee, and heaven is thy gain.

A Letter of the Lady Jane, Sent unto her Father

Father, although it hath pleased God to hasten my death by you, by whom my life should rather have been lengthened; yet can I so patiently take it, as I yield God more hearty thanks for shortening my woeful days than if all the world had been given into my possession, with life lengthened at my own will. And albeit I am well assured of your impatient dolors, redoubled manifold ways, both in bewailing your own woe and especially, as I hear, my unfortunate state, yet, my dear father (if I may without offense rejoice in my own mishaps), meseems in this I may account myself blessed, that washing my hands with the innocency of my fact, my guiltless blood may cry before the Lord, Mercy, mercy to the innocent! And yet, though I must needs acknowledge that, being constrained and, as you wot well enough, continually assayed, in taking upon me I seemed to consent, and therein grievously offended the queen and her laws: yet do I assuredly trust that this mine offense towards God is so much the less in that, being in so royal estate as I was, mine enforced honour never agreed with mine innocent heart. And thus, good father, I have opened unto... you the state wherein I presently stand; whose death at hand, although to you perhaps it may seen right woeful, to me there is nothing that can be more welcome, than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure with Christ our savior. In whose steadfast faith (if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father) the Lord that hitherto hath strengthened you so continue you that at the last we may meet in heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

A Prayer of the Lady Jane

O Lord, thou God and Father of my life, hear me, poor and desolate woman, which flieth unto thee only, in all troubles and miseries. Thou, O Lord, art the only defender and deliverer of those that put their trust in thee: and therefore I, being defiled with sin, encumbered with affliction, unequited with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miseries, vexed with temptations, and grievously tormented with the long imprisonment of this vile mass of clay, my sinful body, do come unto thee, O merciful Savior, craving thy mercy and help, without which so little hope of deliverance is left that I may utterly despair of any liberty.

Albeit it is expedient, that, seeing our life standeth upon trying, we should be visited sometime with some adversity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of thy flock or no, and also know thee and ourselves the better, yet thou, that saidst thou wouldst not suffer us to be tempted above our power, be merciful unto me now, a miserable wretch, I beseech thee; which with Solomon do cry unto thee, humbly desiring thee that I may neither be too much puffed up with prosperity, neither too much pressed down with adversity, lest I, being too full, should deny thee, my God, or being too low brought, should despair and blaspheme thee, my Lord and Savior.

O merciful God, consider my misery, best known unto thee; and be thou now unto me a strong tower of defense, I humbly require thee. Suffer me not to be tempted above my power, but either be thou a deliverer unto me out of this great misery, either else give me grace patiently to bear thy heavy hand and sharp correction. It was thy right hand that delivered the people of Israel out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the space of four hundred years did oppress them and keep them in bondage. Let it, therefore, likewise seem good to thy fatherly goodness to deliver me, sorrowful wretch (for whom thy son Christ shed his precious blood on the cross), out of this miserable captivity and bondage wherein I am now.

How long wilt thou be absent? forever? O Lord, hast thou forgotten to be gracious, and hast thou not yet seen my misery, and have I not been brought to repentance? Is thy mercy clean gone forever, and thy promise come utterly to an end for evermore? Why dost thou make so long tarrying? Shall I despair of thy mercy, O God? Far be that from me. I am thy workmanship, created in Christ Jesu: give me grace, therefore, to tarry thy leisure, and patiently to bear thy works; assuredly knowing that as thou canst, so thou wilt deliver me when it shall please thee, nothing doubting or mistrusting thy goodness towards me; for thou knowest better what is good for me than I do: therefore do with me in all things what thou wilt, and plague me what way thou wilt. Only in the meantime, arm me, I beseech thee, with thy armor, that I may stand fast, my loins being girded about with verity, having on the breastplate of righteousness and shod with the shoes prepared by the gospel of peace; above all things, taking to me the shield of faith, wherewith I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and taking the helmet of salvation and the sword of the spirit, which is thy most holy word: praying always with all manner of prayer and supplication, that I may refer myself wholly to thy will, abiding thy pleasure and comforting myself in those troubles that it shall please thee to send me; seeing such troubles be profitable for me, and seeing I am assuredly persuaded that it cannot be but well, all that thou dost.

Hear me, O merciful Father, for His sake whom thou wouldst should be a sacrifice for my sins: to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honor and glory. Amen.

A Second Letter to Her Father

The Lord comfort your grace, and that in his word, wherein all creatures only are to be comforted. And though it hath pleased God to take away two of your children, yet think not, I most humbly beseech your grace, that you have lost them, but trust that we, by losing this mortal life, have won an immortal life. And I for my part, as I have honored your grace in this life, will pray for you in another life. Your grace's humble daughter,

Jane Dudley

The Words and Behavior of the Lady Jane upon the Scaffold

These are the words that the Lady Jane spake upon the scaffold, at the hour of her death. First, when she mounted upon the scaffold, she said to the people standing thereabout, 'Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me; but, touching the procurement and desire thereof by me, or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency.

before God and the face of you, good Christian people, this day." And therewith she wrung her hands, wherein she had her book. 3 Then said she, "I pray you all, good Christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true Christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other mean but only by the mercy of God, in the blood of his only Son Jesus Christ; and I confess that when I did know the word of God I neglected the same, loved myself and the world;
and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthy happened unto me for my sins; and yet I thank God of his goodness that he hath thus given me a time and respite to repent. And now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers." And then, kneeling down, she turned her to Feckenham, 4 saying, "Shall I say this psalm?" And he said, "Yea." Then said she she the psalm of Miserere mei Deus 5 in English, in most devout manner, throughout to the end; and then she stood up, and gave her maiden, Mistress Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Master Brydges. 6 And then she untied her gown, and the hangman pressed upon her to help her off with it; 7 but she, desiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentle-women, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frau's paste 8 and neckerkchief, giving her a fair handkerchief to knit about her eyes.

Then the hangman kneeled down and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he willed her to stand upon the straw 9 which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, "I pray you, dispatch me quickly." Then she kneeled down, saying, "Will you take it off before I lay me down?"
And the hangman said, "No, madam." Then tied she the kerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block she said, "What shall I do? Where is it? Where is it?" One of the standers-by guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretched forth her body and said, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit" 1 and so finished her life, in the year of our Lord God 1554, the twelfth day of February.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS

Mary Stuart (1542—1587) was born on December 8, and within a week, following the death of her father, King James V, she had inherited the throne of Scotland. She has always been remembered as the "Queen of Scots," though she spent very few years in Scotland, never spoke its language as easily as French, and was forced to abdicate at the age of twenty-four.

Determined to foil the ambitions of Henry VIII, who sought to force a union between England and Scotland by marrying Mary to his own son, Edward, Mary's guardians sent her at the age of five to the court of France, where she would be brought up. At age fifteen she married Francis, the French dauphin, who became king in 1559. A year later, Francis II died, and at the age of eighteen Mary returned to her own kingdom, Scotland, a land she could barely remember. As a Catholic woman coming to rule over a patriarchal society in which militant Protestantism was gathering force, Mary could hardly hope for a unanimously warm welcome. Her own subsequent decisions destroyed whatever chance she may have had of enjoying a peaceful reign. In 1565, she married her vain and erratic cousin, Henry Stewart, lord Darnley, with whom she was soon deeply unhappy. In 1566, Darnley was implicated in the murder of Mary’s secretary, David Rizzio, who was rumored to be her lover. In 1567 Darnley was murdered in turn, certainly with the connivance of the powerful James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell. Soon Mary was married to Bothwell, though her own will in the matter remains unclear. The scandal of this marriage alienated many of her supporters and helped provoke an uprising of the Scottish nobility. Mary was imprisoned at Lochleven Castle and forced to abdicate in favor of her one-year-old son, James. Though she escaped, she failed to rally the Scottish people to her side, and in 1568 she fled across the border into England, where she appealed for help from her cousin Elizabeth.

The arrival on English soil of the twenty-five-year old Queen of Scots was not welcome news to the Protestant queen and her wary advisers. As a descendant of Henry VII with a good claim to the English throne, Mary was seen to be a dangerous and destabilizing presence. She was immediately taken prisoner and remained so until her execution at the age of forty-four. She was tried in England in 1568-69 on the charge of murdering her second husband. At this point her Scottish accuser produced the notorious Casket Letters, which had supposedly been discovered in a silver casket seized from an associate of Bothwell’s. The casket, it was said, contained eight letters and twelve sonnets, all in French, testifying (if they are authentic) to an adulterous relationship with Bothwell and, more ambiguously, to Mary’s involvement in the murder of Darnley. Mary herself was not permitted to inspect the letters, which were withdrawn shortly after being displayed in court and subsequently disappeared, though not before translations of them had been made into English and Scots. The result of the trial was inconclusive; Elizabeth declared that nothing had been proven which would make her "conceive an evil opinion of her good sister"; yet she continued to keep Mary prisoner, moving her from one place of confinement to another for the next nineteen years.

Mary quickly became the focus for the aspirations of discontented Catholics at home and abroad. She conspired with these adherents by means of secret messages, written in ciphers or in invisible ink on white taffeta, smuggled in and out of her prison hidden in such things as beer barrels. The conspiracies were monitored, and to some extent even engineered, by Elizabeth’s spy-master, Francis Walsingham, who was setting a trap for the queen of Scots and English Catholics generally. In 1586 Mary was found to be in communication with a young Englishman named Anthony Babington, who was plotting to assassinate Elizabeth and place Mary on the throne. Babington and his co-conspirators were drawn and quartered, their heads displayed on Tower Bridge. Though she insisted that, as the sovereign queen of another country, she could not be charged with treason against England’s queen, Mary was convicted as a traitor and sentenced to death. Elizabeth vacillated for some time over carrying out the sentence, worrying about the reaction abroad and about the precedent involved in executing a monarch. Eventually she was prevailed upon to sign the death warrant, and Mary was beheaded on February 8, 1587. A week later, Elizabeth wrote to the orphaned James VI of Scotland, lamenting the "miserable accident, which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen."*

* For further information on relations between England and Scotland in the sixteenth century, go to Norton Literature Online, "Island Nations," which includes a portrait of Mary (with the excerpt from Robert Wedderburn).
Many of the words that seem to speak to us most eloquently of Mary's self and circumstances are not in fact her own. Throughout her life, Mary encountered no shortage of people, some admirers and others deadly foes, who were eager to seize control of her voice. The controversy over the Casket Letters thus crystallizes the more general problem of locating the "real" Mary Stuart. It will probably never be possible to prove with certainty whether the letters are products of Mary's own hand or cunning forgeries designed to incriminate her, and indeed it is this impossibility that lends them much of their fascination, opening them up for the endless play of interpretation. Yet if the interpretation of the Casket Letters has become a kind of intellectual game, it began as a matter of life or death. If Mary was in one respect a text with many authors, she was also a singular woman inhabiting a body that, on the orders of another woman, was at last cut in two.

From Casket Letter Number 2

* * * This day I have wrought till two of the clock upon this bracelet, to put the key in the cleft of it, which is tied with two laces. I have had so little time that it is very ill, but I will make a fairer; and in the meantime take heed that none of those that be here do see it: for all the world would know it, for I have made it in haste in their presence. I go to my tedious talk. You make me dissemble so much that I am afraid thereof with horror; and you make me almost to play the part of a traitor. Remember that if it were not for obeying you, I had rather be dead, my heart bleedeth for it. To be short, he will not come but with condition that I shall promise to be with him as heretofore at bed and board, and that I shall forsake him no more; and upon my word he will do whatsoever I will, and will come, but he hath prayed me to tarry till after tomorrow. * * * But now, to make him trust me, I must feign something unto him; and therefore when he desired me to promise that when he should be whole we should make but one bed, I told him (feigning to believe his fair promises) [that if he] did not change his mind between this time and that, I was contented, so as he would say nothing thereof: for (to tell it between us two) the lords wished no ill to him, but did fear lest (considering the threatenings which he made in case we did agree together) he would make them feel the small account they have made of him, and that he would persuade me to pursue some of them; and for this respect should be in jealousy if at one instant, without their knowledge, I did break a game made to the contrary in their presence. And he said unto me, very pleasant and merry, "Think you that they do the more esteem you therefore? But I am glad that you talk to me of the lords. I hear that you desire now that we shall live a happy life—for if Thereupon I have willed this bearer to tell you many pretty things; for I have too much to write, and it is late, and I trust him, upon your word. To be short, he will go anywhere upon my word. Alas! and I never deceived anybody; but I remit myself wholly to your will. And send me word what I shall do, and whatever happen to me, I will obey you. Think also if you will not find some invention more secret by physic, for he is to take physic at Craigmillar, and the baths also, and shall not come forth of long time. To be short, for that I can learn, he hath great suspicion, and yet nevertheless trusteth upon my word, but not to tell me as yet anything. Howbeit, if you will that I shall avow him, I will know all of him; but I shall never be willing to beguile one who putteth his trust in me. Nevertheless, you may do all. And do not esteem me the less therefore, for you are the cause thereof; for, for my own revenge, I would not do it.

He giveth me certain charges (and those strong) of that that I fear: even to say that his faults be published, but there be that commit some secret faults and fear not to have them spoken of so loudly, and that there is speech of great and small. And even touching the Lady Reres, he said, "God grant that she serve you to your honor," and that men may not think, nor he neither, that mine own power was not in myself, seeing I did refuse his offers. To conclude, for a surety he mistrusteth us of that that you know, and for his life. But in the end, after I had spoken two or three good words to him, he was very merry and glad. I have not seen him this night, for ending your bracelet; but I can find no clasps for it. It is ready thereunto, and yet I fear lest it should bring you ill hap, or that it should be known if you were hurt. Send me word whether you will have it, and more money, and when I shall return, and how far I may speak. * * *

He hath sent to me, and prayeth me to see him rise tomorrow in the morning early. To be short, this bearer shall declare unto you the rest; and if I shall learn anything, I will make every night a memorial thereof. He shall tell you the cause of my stay. Burn this letter, for it is too dangerous; neither is there anything well said in it, for I think upon nothing but upon grief if you be at Edinburgh.

A Letter to Elizabeth I, May 17, 1568

Madam my good sister, I believe you are not ignorant how long certain of my subjects, whom from the least of my kingdom I have raised to be the first, have taken upon themselves to involve me in trouble, and to do what it appears they had in view from the first. You know how they purposed to seize me and the late king my husband, from which attempt it pleased God to protect us, and to permit us to expel them from the country, where, at your request, I again afterwards received them; though, on their return, they committed another crime, that of holding me a prisoner, and killing in my presence a servant of mine, I being at the time in a state of pregnancy. It again pleased God that I should save myself from their hands; and, as above said, I not only pardoned them, but even received them into favor. They, however, not yet satisfied with so many acts of kindness, have, on the contrary, in spite of their promises, devised, favored, subscribed to, and aided in a crime for the purpose of charging it falsely upon me, as I hope fully to make you understand. They have, under this pretence, arrayed themselves against me, accusing me of being ill-advised, and pretending a desire of seeing me delivered from bad

1. This letter (translated from the French by Agnes Strickland) was written just after Mary, in flight from her Scottish enemies, made her fateful crossing into England. Its account of her troubles is, though not exaggerated, inevitably one-sided. In 1565, Mary’s ill-advised marriage to her cousin Lord Darnley had upset the power structure of the nation’s factious and violent nobility. A group of nobles rebelled against her, led by Mary’s illegitimate half-brother James Stewart, earl of Moray, who had previously been her key supporter and adviser.

King James VI. She omits the fact that Darnley was involved in the murder.

counsels, in order to point out to me the things that required reformation. I, feeling myself innocent, and desirous to avoid the shedding of blood, placed myself in their hands, wishing to reform what was amiss. They immediately seized and imprisoned me. When I upbraided them with a breach of their promise, and requested to be informed why I was thus treated, they all absented themselves. I demanded to be heard in council, which was refused me. In short, they have kept me without any servants, except two women, a cook, and a surgeon; and they have threatened to kill me, if I did not sign an abdication of my crown, which the fear of immediate death caused me to do, as I have since proved before the whole of the nobility, of which I hope to afford you evidence.

After this, they again laid hold of me in parliament, without saying why, and without hearing me; forbidding, at the same time, every advocate to plead for me; and, compelling the rest to acquiesce in their unjust usurpation of my rights, they have robbed me of everything I had in the world, not permitting me either to write or to speak, in order that I might not contradict their false inventions.

At last, it pleased God to deliver me, when they thought of putting me to death, that they might make more sure of their power, though I repeatedly offered to answer any thing they had to say to me, and to join them in the punishment of those who should be guilty of any crime. In short, it pleased God to deliver me, to the great content of all my subjects, except Moray, Morton, the Humes, Glencairn, Mar, and Sempill, to whom, after that my whole nobility was come from all parts, I sent to say that, notwithstanding their ingratitude and unjust cruelty employed against me, I was willing to invite them to return to their duty, and to offer them security of their lives and estates, and to hold a parliament for the purpose of reforming every thing. I sent twice. They seized and imprisoned my messengers, and made proclamation, declaring traitors all those who should assist me, and guilty of that odious crime. I demanded that they should name one of them, and I would give him up, and begged them, at the same time, to deliver to me such as should be named to them. They seized upon my officer and my proclamation. I sent to demand a safe-conduct for my Lord Boyd, in order to treat of an accommodation, not wishing, as far as I might be concerned, for any effusion of blood. They refused, saying that those who had not been true to their regent and to my son, whom they denominate king, should leave me and put themselves at their disposal, a thing at which the whole nobility were greatly offended.

Seeing, therefore, that they were only a few individuals, and that my nobility were more attached to me than ever, I was in hope that, in course of time, and under your favor, they would be gradually reduced; and, seeing that they said they would either retake me or all die, I proceeded toward Dumbarton, passing at the distance of two miles from them, my nobility accompanying me, marching in order of battle between them and me; which they seeing, sallied forth, and came to cut off my way and take me. My people seeing this, and moved by that extreme malice of my enemies, with a view to check their progress, encountered them without order, so that, though they were twice their number, their sudden advance caused them so great a disadvantage that God permitted them to be discomfited, and several killed and taken; some of them were cruelly put to death when taken on their retreat. The pursuit was immediately interrupted, in order to take me on my way to Dumbarton; they stationed people in every direction, either to kill or take me. But God through his infinite goodness has preserved me, and I escaped to my Lord Herries, who, as well as other gentlemen, have come with me into your country, being assured that, hearing the cruelty of my enemies, and how they have treated me, you will, conformably to your kind disposition and the confidence I have in you, not only receive me for the safety of my life but also aid and assist me in my just quarrel; and I shall solicit other princes to do the same. I entreat you to send to fetch me as soon as you possibly can, for I am in a pitiable condition, not only for a queen, but for a gentlewoman; for I have nothing in the world, but what I had on my person when I made my escape, travelling across the country the first day, and not having since ever ventured to proceed except in the night, as I hope to declare before you, if it pleases you to have pity, as I trust you will, upon my extreme misfortune; of which I will forbear complaining, in order not to importune you, and pray to God that he may give to you a happy state of health and long life, and to me patience, and that consolation which I expect to receive from you, to whom I present my humble commendations. From Workington, the 17th of May.

Your most faithful and affectionate good sister, and cousin, and escaped prisoner, Mary R.

From Narrative of the Execution of the Queen of Scots.
In a Letter to the Right Honorable Sir William Cecil.

It may please your lordship to be advertised that, according as your honor gave me in command, I have here set down in writing the true order and manner of the execution of the Lady Mary, late queen of Scots, the 8th of February last, in the great hall within the castle of Fotheringhay, together with relation of all such speeches and actions spoken and done by the said queen or any others, and all other circumstances and proceedings concerning the same, from and after the delivery of the said Scottish queen to Thomas Andrews, Esquire, high sheriff for Her Majesty's county of Northampton, unto the end of the said execution: as followeth.

It being certified the 6th of February last to the said queen, by the right honorable the earl of Kent, the earl of Shrewsbury, and also by Sir Amyas Paulet and Sir Drue Drury, her governors, that she was to prepare herself to die the 8th of February next, she seemed not to be in any terror, for aught that appeared by any her outward gesture or behavior (other than marveling she should die), but rather with smiling cheer and pleasing countenance digested and accepted the said admonition of preparation to her (as she said) unexpected execution, saying that her death should be welcome unto her, seeing Her Majesty was so resolved, and that that soul were too too far unworthy the fruition of joys of heaven forever, whose body would not in this world be content to endure the stroke of the executioner for a moment. And that spoken, she wept bitterly and became silent.

The said 8th day of February being come, and time and place appointed for the execution, the said queen, being of stature tall, of body corpulent, round-shouldered, her face fat and broad, double-chinned, and hazel-eyed, her borrowed hair auburn, her attire was this. On her head she had a dressing of lawn edged with bone lace, a pomander chain and an Angus Dei about her neck, a crucifix in her hand, a pair of beads at her girdle, with a silver cross at the end of them. A veil of lawn fastened to her caul, bowed out with wire and edged round about with bone lace. Her gown was of black satin painted, with a train and long sleeves to the ground, set with acorn buttons of jet trimmed with pearl, and short sleeves of satin black cut, with a pair of sleeves of purple velvet whole under them. Her kirtle whole, of figured black satin, and her petticoat skirts of crimson velvet, her shoes of Spanish leather with the rough side outward, a pair of green silk garters, her nether stockings worsted colored watchet, clocked with silver, and edged on the tops with silver, and next her leg a pair of jersey hose, white, etc. Thus appareled, she departed her chamber, and willingly bended her steps towards the place of execution.

As the commissioners and divers other knights were meeting the queen coming forth, one of her servants, called Melvin, kneeling on his knees to his queen and mistress, wringing his hands and shedding tears, used these words unto her: "Ah, Madam, unhappy me: what man on earth was ever before the messenger of so important sorrow and heaviness as I shall be, when I report that my good and gracious queen and mistress is beheaded in England?" This said, tears prevented him of further speaking. Whereupon the said queen, pouring forth her dying tears, thus answered him: "My good servant, cease to lament, for thou hast cause rather to joy than to mourn. For now shalt thou see Mary Stuart's troubles receive their long-expected end and determination. For know (said she), good servant, all the world is but vanity, and subject still to more sorrow than a whole ocean of tears can bewail. But I pray thee (said she), carry this message from me, that I die a true woman to my religion, and like a true queen of Scotland and France. But God forgive them (said she) that have long desired my end and thirsted for my blood, as the hart doth for the water brooks. Oh God (said she), thou that art the author of truth, and truth itself, knowest the inward chamber of my thought, how that I was ever willing that England and Scotland should be united together. Well (said she), commend me to my son, and tell him that I have not done anything prejudicial to the state and kingdom of Scotland; and so resolving herself again into tears, said, "Good Melvin, farewell"; and with weeping eyes and her cheeks all besprinkled with tears as they were, kissed him, saying once again, "Farewell, good Melvin, and pray for thy mistress and queen."

And then she turned herself unto the lords, and told them she had certain requests to make unto them. One was, for certain money to be paid to Curie, her servant. Sir Amyas Paulet, knowing of that money, answered to this effect, "it should." Next, that her poor servants might have that with quietness which she had given them by her will, and that they might be favorably entreated, and to send them safely into their countries. "To this (said she) I conjure you." Last, that it would please the lords to permit her poor distressed servants to be present about her at her death, that their eyes and hearts may see and witness how patiently their queen and mistress would endure her execution, and so make relation, when they came into their country, that she died a true constant Catholic to her religion. Then the earl of Kent did answer thus: "Madam, that which you have desired cannot conveniently be granted. For if it should, it were to be feared lest some of them, with speeches or other behavior, would both be grievous to Your Grace and troublesome and unpleasing to us and our company, whereof we have had some experience. For if such an access might be allowed, they would not stick to put some superstitious trumpery in practice, and if it were but dipping their handkerchiefs in Your Grace's blood, whereof it were very unmeet for us to give allowance."

"My lord," said the queen of Scots, "I will give my word, although it be but dead, that they shall not deserve any blame in any the actions you have named. But alas, poor souls, it would do them good to bid their mistress farewell; and I hope your mistress (meaning the queen), "being a maiden queen, will vouchsafe in regard of womanhood that I shall have some of my own people about me at my death: and I know Her Majesty hath not given you any such strait charge or commission but that you might grant me a request of far greater courtesy than this is, if I were a woman of far meaner calling than the queen of Scots." And then, perceiving that she could not obtain her request without some difficulty, burst out into tears, saying, "I am cousin to your queen, and descended from the blood royal of Henry the Seventh, and a married queen of France, and an anointed queen of Scotland." Then, upon great consultation had betwixt the two earls and the others in commission, it was granted to her what she instantly before earnestly entreated, and desired her to make choice of six of her best-beloved men and women. Then of her men she chose Melvin, her apothecary, her surgeon, and one old man more; and of her women, those two which did lie in her chamber. Then, with an unappalled countenance, without any terror of the place, the persons, or the preparations, she came out of the entry into the hall, stepped up to the scaffold, being two foot high and twelve foot broad, with rails round about, hanged and covered with black, with a low stool, long fair cushion, and a block covered also with black. The stool brought her, she sat down. The earl of Kent stood on the right hand, the earl of Shrewsbury on the other, other knights and gentlemen stood about the rails. The commission for her execution was read (after silence made) by Mr. Beale, clerk of the council; which done, the people with a loud voice said, "God save the Queen!" During the reading of this commission, the said queen was very silent, listening unto it with so careless a regard as if it had not concerned her at all, nay, rather with so merry and cheerful a countenance as if it had been a pardon from Her Majesty for her life; and withal used such a strangeness in her words as if she had not known any of the assembly, nor had been anything seen in the English tongue.

Then Mr. Doctor Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, standing directly before her without the rails, bending his body with great reverence, uttered the exhortation following:

"Madam, the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty (whom God preserve long to reign over us), having (notwithstanding this preparation for the execution of justice justly to be done upon you for your many trespasses against her sacred person, state, and government) a tender care over your soul, which presently departing out of your body must either be separated in the true faith in Christ or perish forever, doth for Jesus Christ offer unto you the comfortable promises of God, wherein I beseech Your Grace, even in the bowels of Jesus Christ, to consider these three things:

"First, your state past, and transitory glory;
"Secondly, your condition present, of death;
"Thirdly, your estate to come, either in everlasting happiness or perpetual infelicity.

"For the first, let me speak to Your Grace with David the King: Forget, Madam, yourself, and your own people, and your father's house; so shall the King of Kings have pleasure in your spiritual beauty, etc."

"Madam, even now, Madam, doth God Almighty open you a door into a heavenly kingdom; shut not therefore this passage by the hardening of your heart, and grieve not the Spirit of God, which may seal your hope to a day of redemption."

The queen three or four times said unto him, "Mr. Dean, trouble not yourself nor me: for know that I am settled in the ancient Catholic and Roman religion, and in defense thereof, by God's grace, I mind to spend my blood."

Then said Mr. Dean, "Madam, change your opinion, and repent you of your former wickedness. Settle your faith only upon this ground, that in Christ Jesus you hope to be saved." She answered again and again, with great earnestness, "Good Mr. Dean, trouble yourself not anymore about this matter, for I was born in this religion, have lived in this religion, and am resolved to die in this religion."

Then the earls, when they saw how far uncomfortable she was to hear Mr. Dean's good exhortation, said, "Madam, we will pray for Your Grace with Mr.

Dean, that you may have your mind lightened with the true knowledge of God and his word."

"My lords," answered the queen, "if you will pray with me, I will even from my heart thank you, and think myself greatly favored by you; but to join in prayer with you in your manner, who are not of one religion with me, it were a sin, and I will not."

Then the lords called Mr. Dean again, and bade him say on, or what he thought good else. The dean kneeled and prayed. **

All the assembly, save the queen and her servants, said the prayer after Mr. Dean as he spake it, during which prayer the queen sat upon her stool, having her Agnus Dei, crucifix, beads, and an office in Latin. Thus furnished with superstitious trumpery, not regarding what Mr. Dean said, she began very fastly with tears and a loud voice to pray in Latin, and in the midst of her prayers, with overmuch weeping and mourning, slipped off her stool, and kneeling presently said diverse other Latin prayers. Then she rose, and kneeled down again, praying in English for Christ's afflicted church, an end of her troubles, for her son, and for the Queen's Majesty, to God for forgiveness of the sins of them in this island: she forgave her enemies with all her heart, that had long sought her blood. This done, she desired all saints to make intercession for her to the Savior of the World, Jesus Christ. Then she began to kiss her crucifix and to cross herself, saying these words: "Even as thy arms, oh Jesu Christ, were spread here upon the cross, so receive me into the arms of mercy." Then the two executioners kneeled down unto her, desiring her to forgive them her death. She answered, "I forgive you with all my heart. For I hope this death shall give an end to all my troubles." They, with her two women helping, began to disrobe her, and then she laid the crucifix upon the stool. One of the executioners took from her neck the Agnus Dei, and she laid hold of it, saying she would give it to one of her women, and, withal, told the executioner that he should have money for it. Then they took off her chain. She made herself unready with a kind of gladness, and, smiling, putting on a pair of sleeves with her own hands, which the two executioners before had rudely put off, and with such speed as if she had longed to be gone out of the world.

During the disrobing of this queen, she never altered her countenance, but smiling said she never had such grooms before to make her unready, nor ever did put off her clothes before such a company. At length, unattired and unapparelled to her petticoat and kirtle, the two women burst out into a great and pitiful shrieking, crying, and lamentation, crossed themselves, and prayed in Latin. The queen turned towards them: "Ne criez vous; j'ai promis pour vous"; and so crossed and kissed them, and bade them pray for her.

Then with a smiling countenance she turned to her menservants, Melvin and the rest, crossed them, bade them fare well, and pray for her to the last. One of the women having a Corpus Christi cloth, lapped it up three-corner-wise and kissed it, and put it over the face of her queen, and pinned it fast upon the caul of her head. Then the two women departed. The queen kneeled down upon the cushion resolutely, and without any token of fear of death, said aloud in Latin the Psalm “In te, Domine, confido.” Then, groping for the block, she laid down her head, putting her chain over her back with both her hands, which, holding there still, had been cut off, had they not been espied.

Then she laid herself upon the block most quietly, and stretching out her arms and legs cried out: "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum," three or four times.

At last, while one of the executioners held her straitly with one of his hands, the other gave two strokes with an axe before he did cut off her head, and yet left a little gristle behind.

She made very small noise, no part stirred from the place where she lay.
The executioners lifted up the head, and bade God save the Queen. Then her dressing of lawn fell from her head, which appeared as gray as if she had been threescore and ten years old, polled very short. Her face much altered, her lips stirred up and down almost a quarter of an hour after her head was cut off. Then said Mr. Dean: "So perish all the Queen's enemies!" The earl of Kent came to the dead body, and with a loud voice said, "Such end happen to all the Queen's and Gospel's enemies." One of the executioners, plucking off her garters, espied her little dog, which was crept under her clothes, which would not be gotten forth but with force, and afterwards would not depart from the dead corpse, but came and laid between her head and shoulders: a thing much noted. The dog, imbrued in her blood, was carried away and washed, as all things else were that had any blood, save those things which were burned.
The executioners were sent away with money for their fees, not having any one thing that belonged unto her. Afterwards everyone was commanded forth of the hall, saving the sheriff and his men, who carried her up into a great chamber made ready for the surgeons to embalm her; and there she was embalmed.

And thus I hope (my very good lord) I have certifieth Your Honor of all actions, matters, and circumstances as did proceed from her or any other at her death: wherein I dare promise unto your good lordship (if not in some better or worse words than were spoken I am somewhat mistaken), in matter
I have not in any whit offended. Howbeit, I will not so justify my duty herein but that many things might well have been omitted, as not worthy noting. Yet because it is your lordship's fault to desire to know all, and so I have certified all, it is an offense pardonable. So, resting at Your Honor's further commandment, I take my leave this 11th of February, 1587.

ELIZABETH I

Elizabeth I (1533–1603), queen of England from 1558 to her death, set her mark indelibly on the age that has come to bear her name. Endowed with intelligence, courage, cunning, and a talent for self-display, she managed to survive and flourish in a world that would easily have crushed a weaker person. Her birth was a disappointment to her father, Henry VIII, who had hoped for a male heir to the throne, and her prospects were further dimmed when her mother, Anne Boleyn, was executed a few years later on charges of adultery and treason. At six years old, observers noted, Elizabeth had as much gravity as if she had been forty.

Under distinguished tutors, including the Protestant humanist Boger Ascham, the young princess received a rigorous education, with training in classical and modern languages, history, rhetoric, theology, and moral philosophy. Her own religious orientation was also Protestant, which put her in great danger during the reign of her Catholic older half-sister, Mary. Imprisoned in the Tower of London, interrogated and constantly spied upon, Elizabeth steadfastly professed innocence, loyalty, and a pious abhorrence of heresy. Upon Mary’s death, she ascended the throne and quickly made clear that the official religion of the land would be Protestantism.

When she came to the throne at twenty-five, speculation about a suitable match, already widespread, intensified. It remained for decades at a fever pitch, for the stakes were high. If Elizabeth died childless, the Tudor line would come to an end. The nearest heir was her cousin Mary, Queen of Scots, a Catholic whose claim was supported by France and by the papacy, and whose penchant for sexual and political intrigue soon confirmed the worst fears of English Protestants. The obvious way to avert the nightmare was for Elizabeth to marry and produce an heir, and the pressure upon her to do so was intense.

More than the royal succession hinged on the question of the queen’s marriage; Elizabeth’s perceived eligibility was a vital factor in the complex machinations of international diplomacy. A dynastic marriage between the queen of England and a foreign ruler could forge an alliance sufficient to alter the balance of power in Europe. The English court hosted a steady stream of ambassadors from kings and princelings eager to win the hand of the royal maiden, and Elizabeth played her romantic part with exemplary skill, sighing and spinning the negotiations out for months and even years. Most probably, she never meant to marry any of her numerous foreign (and domestic) suitors. Such a decisive act would have meant the end of her independence, as well as the end of the marriage game by which she played one power off against another. One day she would seem to be on the verge of accepting a proposal; the next, she would vow never to forsake her virginity. “She is a princess,” the French ambassador remarked, “who can act any part she pleases.” Ultimately she refused all offers and declared repeatedly that she was wedded to her country.

In the face of deep skepticism about the ability of any woman to rule, Elizabeth strategically blended imperiousness with an elaborate cult of love. Quickly making it clear that she would not be a figurehead, she gathered around her an able group of advisers, but she held firmly to the reins of power, subtly manipulating factional disputes, conducting diplomacy, and negotiating with an often contentious Parliament. Her courtiers and advisers, on their knees, approached the queen, glittering in jewels and gorgeous gowns, and addressed her in extravagant terms that conjoined romantic passion and religious veneration. Artists and poets celebrated her in mythological guise—as Diana, the chaste goddess of the moon; Astraea, the goddess of justice; Gloriana, the queen of the fairies. Though she could suddenly veer, whenever she chose, toward bluntness and anger, Elizabeth herself often contrived to transform the language of politics into the language of love. “We all loved her,” her godson John Harington wrote with a touch of irony, “for she said she loved us.”

Throughout her life, Elizabeth took pride in her command of languages (she spoke fluent French and Italian and read Latin and Greek) and in her felicity of expression. Her own writing includes carefully crafted letters and speeches on several state occasions; a number of prayers; translations of selections from the Psalms, Petrarch, Seneca, and Horace; prose translations from Boethius, Plutarch, and the French Protestant Queen Margaret of Navarre; and a few original poems. The original poems known to be hers deal with actual events in her life. They show her to be an exceptionally agile, poised, and self-conscious writer, a gifted role-player fully in control of the rhetorical as well as political situation in which she found herself. The texts printed here, occasionally altered in light of variant versions, are from Elizabeth I: Collected Works, ed. Leah Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose (2000).*

 * * * Her grace, by holding up her hands and merry countenance to such as stood far off, and most tender and gentle language to those that stood nigh to her grace, did declare herself no less thankfully to receive her people's goodwill than they lovingly offered it unto her. To all that wished her grace well she gave hearty thanks, and to such as bade God save her grace she said again, God save them all, and thanked them with all her heart. So that on either side there was nothing but gladness, nothing but prayer, nothing but comfort. The queen's majesty rejoiced marvelously to see it so exceedingly showed toward her grace which all good princes have ever desired: I mean, so earnest love of subjects, so evidently declared even to her grace's own person

1. This is the heading given to the verses in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments. After the insurrection of January 1554 against Mary I, Elizabeth was imprisoned in the Tower of London. Extensive interrogation and investigation yielded no firm evidence of treason against her, but she was transferred to the royal manor at Woodstock in Oxfordshire, and held there in close custody for a year.

being carried in the midst of them. The people, again, were wonderfully ravi-ished with welcoming answers and gestures of their princess, like to the which they had before tried at her first coming to the Tower from Hatfield.\(^3\) This her grace’s loving behavior, preconceived in the people’s heads, upon these considerations was thoroughly confirmed, and indeed implanted a wonderful hope in them touching her worthy government in the rest of her reign. For in all her passage she did not only show her most gracious love toward the people in general, but also privately. If the baser personages had either offered her grace any flowers or such like as a signification of their goodwill, or moved to her any suit, she most gently, to the common rejoicing of all the lookers-on and private comfort of the party, stayed her chariot\(^4\) and heard their requests.
So that if a man should say well, he could not better term the City of London that time than a stage wherein was showed the wonderful spectacle of a noble-hearted princess toward her most loving people and the people’s exceeding comfort in beholding so worthy a sovereign and hearing so princelike a voice.

Out at the windows and penthouses of every house did hang a number of rich and costly banners and streamers, till her grace came to the upper end of Cheap.\(^5\) And there, by appointment, the right worshipful Master Ranulph Cholmley, recorder\(^6\) of the City, presented to the queen’s majesty a purse of crimson satin richly wrought with gold, wherein the City gave unto the queen’s majesty a thousand marks\(^7\) in gold, as Master Recorder did declare briefly unto the queen’s majesty, whose words tended to this end: that the lord mayor, his brethren, and commonality of the City, to declare their gladness and goodwill towards the queen’s majesty, did present her grace with that gold, desiring her grace to continue their good and gracious queen and not to esteem the value of the gift, but the mind of the givers. The queen’s majesty with both her hands took the purse and answered to him again marvellous pithily, and so pithily that the standers-by, as they embraced entirely her gracious answer, so they marveled at the couching thereof, which was in words truly reported these:

I thank my lord mayor, his brethren, and you all. And whereas your request is that I should continue your good lady and queen, be ye ensured that I will be as good unto you as ever queen was to her people. No will in me can lack, neither do I trust shall there lack any power. And persuade yourselves that for the safety and quietness of you all I will not spare, if need be, to spend my blood. God thank you all.

Which answer of so noble an hearted princess, if it moved a marvelous shout and rejoicing, it is nothing to be marveled at, since both the heartiness thereof was so wonderful, and the words so jointly\(^8\) knit.

But because princes be set in their seat by God’s appointing and therefore they must first and chiefly tender\(^9\) the glory of Him from whom their glory issueth, it is to be noted in her grace that forsomuch as God hath so wonderfully placed her in the seat of government over this realm, she in all doings doeth show herself most mindful of His goodness and mercy showed unto her.

And amongst all other, two principal signs thereof were noted in this passage.
First in the Tower, where her grace, before she entered her chariot, lifted up her eyes to heaven and said:

O Lord, almighty and everlasting God, I give Thee most hearty thanks that Thou hast been so merciful unto me as to spare me to behold this joyful day. And I acknowledge that Thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me as Thou didst with Thy true and faithful servant Daniel, Thy prophet, whom Thou deliverestd out of the den from the cruelty of the greedy and raging lions. Even so was I overwhelmed and only by Thee delivered. To Thee (therefore) only be thanks, honor, and praise forever, amen.

The second was the receiving of the Bible at the Little Conduit in Cheap.
For when her grace had learned that the Bible in English should there be offered, she thanked the City therefore, promised the reading thereof most diligently, and incontinent commanded that it should be brought. At the receipt whereof, how reverently did she with both her hands take it, kiss it, and lay it upon her breast, to the great comfort of the lookers-on! God will undoubtedly preserve so worthy a prince, which at His honor so reverently taketh her beginning. For this saying is true and written in the book of truth:
he that first seeketh the kingdom of God shall have all other things cast unto him.

Now, therefore, all English hearts and her natural people must needs praise
God’s mercy, which hath sent them so worthy a prince, and pray for her grace’s long continuance amongst us.

Williams, I have heard by you the common request of my Commons, which I may well term (methinketh) the whole realm, because they give, as I have heard, in all these matters of Parliament their common consent to such as be here assembled. The weight and greatness of this matter might cause in me, being a woman wanting both wit and memory, some fear to speak and bashfulness besides, a thing appropriate to my sex. But yet the princely seat and kingly throne wherein God (though unworthy) hath constituted me, maketh these two causes to seem little in mine eyes, though grievous perhaps to your ears, and boldeneth me to say somewhat in this matter, which I mean only to touch but not presently to answer. For this so great a demand needeth both

1. Daniel 6.16-23.
2. The smaller of two lead pipe water conduits situated at the west end of Cheap Street.
3. In contrast to the Latin Bibles of the restored Catholicism of Mary’s reign.
4. Immediately.
1. Since a secure royal succession depended on Elizabeth’s marrying and producing an heir. Parliament had been concerned about her single state from the beginning of her reign. The Commons raised the matter with her (not for the first time) in January 1563; the speech printed here is a later, written version of her extemporaneous response.

great and grave advice. I read of a philosopher whose deeds upon this occasion I remember better than his name who always when he was required to give answer in any hard question of school points would rehearse over his alphabet before he would proceed to any further answer therein, not for that he could not presently have answered, but have his wit the riper and better sharpened to answer the matter withal. If he, a common man, but in matters of school took such delay the better to show his eloquent tale, great cause may justly move me in this, so great a matter touching the benefits of this realm and the safety of you all, to defer mine answer till some other time, wherein I assure you the consideration of my own safety (although I thank you for the great care that you seem to have thereof) shall be little in comparison of that great regard that I mean to have of the safety and surety of you all. And although God of late seemed to touch me rather like one that He chastised than one that He punished, and though death possessed almost every joint of me, so as I wished then that the feeble thread of life, which lasted (methought) all too long, might by Clotho’s hand have quietly been cut off, yet desired I not then life (as I have some witnesses here) so much for mine own safety, as for yours. For I know that in exchanging of this reign I should have enjoyed a better reign where residence is perpetual. There needs no boding of my bane. I know now as well as I did before that I am mortal. I know also that I must seek to discharge myself of that great burden that God hath laid upon me; for of them to whom much is committed, much is required. Think not that I, that in other matters have had convenient care of you all, will in this matter touching the safety of myself and you all be careless. For I know that this matter toucheth me much nearer than it doth you all, who if the worst happen can lose but your bodies. But if I take not that convenient care that it behoveth me to have therein, I hazard to lose both body and soul. And though I am determined in this so great and weighty a matter to defer mine answer till some other time because I will not in so deep a matter wade with so shallow a wit, yet have I thought good to use these few words, as well to show you that I am neither careless nor unmindful of your safety in this case, as I trust you likewise do not forget that by me you were delivered whilst you were hanging on the bough ready to fall into the mud—yea, to be drowned in the dung; neither yet the promise which you have here made concerning your duties and due obedience, wherewith, I assure you, I mean to charge you, as, further, to let you understand that I neither mislike any of your requests herein, nor the great care that you seem to have of the surety and safety of yourselves in this matter.

Lastly, because I will discharge some restless heads in whose brains the needless hammers beat with vain judgment that I should mislike this their petition, I say that of the matter and sum thereof I like and allow very well. As to the circumstances, if any be, I mean upon further advice further to

From A Speech to a Joint Delegation of Lords and Commons, November 5, 1566

 Was I not born in the realm? Were my parents born in any foreign country? Is there any cause I should alienate myself from being careful over this country? Is not my kingdom here? Whom have I oppressed? Whom have I enriched to others’ harm? What turmoil have I made in this commonwealth, that I should be suspected to have no regard to the same? How have I governed since my reign? I will be tried by envy itself. I need not to use many words, for my deeds do try me.

Well, the matter whereof they would have made their petition, as I am informed, consisteth in two points: in my marriage and in the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein my marriage was first placed as for manner sake. I did send them answer by my Council I would marry, although of mine own disposition I was not inclined thereunto. But that was not accepted nor credited, although spoken by their prince. And yet I used so many words that I could say no more. And were it not now I had spoken those words, I would never speak them again. I will never break the word of a prince spoken in public place, for my honor’s sake. And therefore I say again I will marry as soon as I can conveniently, if God take not him away with whom I mind to marry, or myself, or else some other great let happen. I can say no more except the party were present. And I hope to have children; otherwise I would never marry. A strange order of petitioners, that will make a request and cannot be otherwise ascertained but by the prince’s word, and yet will not believe it when it is spoken! But they, I think, that moveth the same will be as ready to mislike him with whom I shall marry as they are now to move it, and then it will appear they nothing meant it. I thought they would have been rather ready to have given me thanks than to have made any new request for the same. There hath been some that have, ere this, said unto me they never required more than that they might once hear me say I would marry. Well, there was never so great a treason but might be covered under as fair a pretense.

The second point was the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein was nothing said for my safety, but only for themselves. A strange thing that the foot should direct the head in so weighty a cause, which cause hath been so diligently weighed by us for that it toucheth us more than them. I am sure

1. The birth on June 19, 1566, of a son—James—to Maty, Queen of Scots, imparted new urgency to the concern about Elizabeth’s unmarried state. Mary was Elizabeth’s second cousin and, in the absence of any child of Elizabeth’s own, had a strong claim to be her heir; Mary’s male child would have an even stronger one. On November 5, a delegation of sixty members of the Lords and Commons met with Elizabeth, to urge her to marry and also to establish formally the line of succession. After the meeting, a member of the delegation wrote down Elizabeth’s impromptu response.

2. I.e., envy itself could not fault my governance.
3. Parliament, which had planned to submit a written petition to the queen.
4. Manners.
5. Honor’s.
6. Hindrance. At the time, there were negotiations for a possible match with Archduke Charles of Austria.
7. Unless.
8. Assured.
there was not one of them that ever was a second person,\(^1\) as I have been, and have tasted of the practices against my sister, who I would to God were alive again. I had great occasions to hearken to their motions,\(^2\) of whom some of them are of the Common House. But when friends fall out truth doth appear, according to the old proverb, and were it not for my honor, their knavery should be known. There were occasions in me at that time: I stood in danger of my life, my sister was so incensed against me. I did differ from her in religion and I was sought for divers ways; and so shall never be my successor.

I have conferred before this time with those that are well learned and have asked their opinions touching the limitation of succession, who have been silent—not that by their silence after lawlike manner\(^3\) they have seemed to assent to it, but that indeed they could not tell what to say, considering the great peril to the realm and most danger to myself. But now the matter must needs go trimly and pleasantly, when the bowl runneth all on the one side.\(^4\) And alas, not one amongst them all would answer for us, but all their speeches was for the surety\(^5\) of their county. They would have twelve or fourteen limited in succession, and the more the better. And those shall be of such uprightness and so divine as in them shall be divinity itself. Kings were wont to honor philosophers, but if I had such\(^6\) I would honor them as angels, that should have such piety in them that they would not seek where they are the second to be the first, and where the third to be the second, and so forth.

It is said I am no divine.\(^7\) Indeed, I studied nothing else but divinity till I came to the crown, and then I gave myself to the study of that which was meet\(^8\) for government, and am not ignorant of stories wherein appeareth what hath fallen out for ambition of kingdoms, as in Spain, Naples, Portugal,\(^9\) and at home. And what cocking\(^1\) hath been between the father and the son for the same! You would have a limitation of succession. Truly if reason did not subdue will in me, I would cause you to deal in it, so pleasant a thing it should be unto me. But I stay\(^2\) it for your benefit; for if you should have liberty to treat of it, there be so many competitors—some kinsfolk, some servants, and some tenants; some would speak for their master, and some for their mistress, and every man for his friend—that it would be an occasion of a greater charge than a subsidy.\(^3\) And if my will did not yield to reason, it should be that thing I would gladly desire, to see you deal in it.

Well, there hath been error—I say not errors, for there were too many in the proceeding in this matter. But we will not judge that these attempts were done of any hatred to our person, but even for lack of good foresight. I do not marvel though Domini Doctores\(^4\) with you, my lords, did so use themselves therein, since after my brother’s\(^5\) death they openly preached and set forth ascending the throne she studied nothing but theology is an exaggeration, but it is true that she had devoted much effort to the subject, as evidenced by her translations of several religious works.

1. Next in line to the throne, as Elizabeth had been under her half-sister Mary I.
2. "To hearken to their motions": to pay heed to their doings.
3. "After lawlike manner": in accordance with the legal maxim (that silence gives consent).
4. A metaphorical extension of the preceding clause: in the game of bowls, the ball has a flat place; rolled unskilfully, it wobbles, bounces, and prematurely stops; rolled well ("all on the one side"), it runs smoothly.
6. 1^., such virtuous potential successors. "Mo": more.
7. Theologian.
8. Relevant to. Elizabeth’s claim that before that my sister and I were bastards. Well, I wish not the death of any man, but only this I desire: that they which have been the practitioners herein may before their deaths repent the same and show some open confession of their faults, whereby the scabbed sheep may be known from the whole. As for my own part, I care not for death, for all men are mortal; and though I be a woman, yet I have as good a courage answerable to my place as ever my father had. I am your anointed queen. I will never be by violence constrained to do anything. I thank God I am indeed endued with such qualities that if I were turned out of the realm in my petticoat, I were able to live in any place of Christendom.

From A Letter to Mary, Queen of Scots, February 24, 1567

Madame:

My ears have been so deafened and my understanding so grieved and my heart so affrighted to hear the dreadful news of the abominable murder of your mad husband and my killed cousin that I scarcely yet have the wits to write about it. And inasmuch as my nature compels me to take his death in the extreme, he being so close in blood, so it is that I will boldly tell you what I think of it. I cannot dissemble that I am more sorrowful for you than for him. O madame, I would not do the office of faithful cousin or affectionate friend if I studied rather to please your ears than employed myself in preserving your honor. However, I will not at all dissemble what most people are talking about: which is that you will look through your fingers at the revenging of this deed, and that you do not take measures that touch those who have done as you wished, as if the thing had been entrusted in a way that the murderers felt assurance in doing it. Among the thoughts in my heart I beseech you to want no such thought to stick at this point. Through all the dealings of the world I never was in such miserable haste to lodge and have in my heart such a miserable opinion of any prince as this would cause me do. Much less will I have such of her to whom I wish as much good as my heart is able to imagine or as you were able a short while ago to wish. However, I exhort you, I counsel you, and I beseech you to take this thing so much to heart that you will not fear to touch even him whom you have nearest to you if the thing touches him, and that no persuasion will prevent you from making an example out of this to the world: that you are both a noble princess and a loyal wife. I do not

6. Presumably in support of the claim of Lady Jane Grey to the throne. (See p. 668 above.)
7. Infected with scab (the skin disease also known as scabies).
1. Written after news reached Elizabeth of the murder of Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, the arrogant and erratic Scottish nobleman whom Mary had ill-advisedly married in 1565.
2. Darnley, like Mary, was Elizabeth’s second cousin and a potential claimant to the throne of England.
3. Wink at.
4. Since Mary and Darnley had been estranged, there were immediately rumors that she had been complicit in his murder.
5. Evidently an allusion to James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, whom Mary married (under much-disputed circumstances) three months after Darnley’s death, although Bothwell was known to have been one of the chief conspirators in the murder.
write so vehemently out of doubt that I have, but out of the affection that I bear you in particular. For I am not ignorant that you have no wiser counselors than myself. Thus it is that, when I remember that our Lord had one Judas out of twelve, and I assure myself that there could be no one more loyal than myself, I offer you my affection in place of this prudence.

The doubt of future foes

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy, And wit warns to shun such snares as threaten mine annoy. For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith doth ebb, Which should not be, if reason ruled or wisdom weaved the web. But clouds of toys untried do cloak aspiring minds, Which turns to rain of late repent, by course of changed winds. The top of hope supposed, the root of rue shall be, And fruitless all their grafted guile, as shortly you shall see. Their dazzled eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds, Shall be unsealed by worthy wights whose foresight falsehood finds. The daughter of debate, that discord aye doth sow, Shall reap no gain where former rule still peace hath taught to grow. No foreign banished wight shall anchor in this port: Our realm brooks no seditious sects—let them elsewhere resort. My rusty sword through rest shall first his edge employ To poll their tops who seek such change or gape for future joy. Vivat Regina

On Monsieur’s Departure

I grieve and dare not show my discontent, I love and yet am forced to seem to hate,

1. The poem concerns Mary, Queen of Scots, who in 1568 sought refuge in England from her rebel- lious subjects.
2. I.e., threaten to do me harm (“annoy”).
3. I.e., the tide of faith (loyalty) is ebbing, yielding to the rising tide of falsehood.
4. Clouds of tricks (“toys”) not yet tested or detected hide the “aspiring minds” of ambitious foes, but those clouds will turn at last into rains of repentance.
5. The deception (“guile”) grafted into them will not bear fruit.
6. Strife. Mary Stuart also was sometimes called "Mother of Debate," because she was constantly the focus of conspiracies and plots.
7. "Former rule": either the reign of Henry VIII or that of Edward VI, which established the Reformation in England.
8. Sword rusty from disuse.
9. Strike off their heads.
10. Long live the queen.
1. The heading, present in a seventeenth-century manuscript, identifies the occasion of this poem as the breaking off of marriage negotiations between Queen Elizabeth and the French duke of Anjou in 1582.
I do, yet dare not say I ever meant,
I seem stark mute but inwardly do prate.\(^0\)
5  I am and not, I freeze and yet am burned,
Since from myself another self I turned.

My care is like my shadow in the sun,
Follows me flying, flies when I pursue it,
Stands and lies by me, doth what I have done.\(^2\)
10  His too familiar care\(^3\) doth make me rue\(^4\) it.
No means I find to rid him from my breast,
Till by the end of things it be suppressed.

Some gentler passion slide into my mind,
For I am soft and made of melting snow;
Or be more cruel, love, and so be kind.
Let me or\(^5\) float or sink, be high or low.
15  Or let me live with some more sweet content,
Or die and so forget what love e'er\(^6\) meant.

A Letter to Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester,
February 10, 1586\(^1\)

How contemptuously we conceive ourselves to have been used by you, you shall by this bearer\(^2\) understand: whom we have expressly sent unto you to charge you withal. We could never have imagined (had we not seen it fall out\(^3\) in experience) that a man raised up by ourself and extraordinarily favored by us, above any other subject of this land, would have in so contemptible a sort broken our commandment in a cause that so greatly toucheth us in honor. Whereof although you have showed yourself to make but little account in so most undutiful a sort, you may not therefore think that we have so little care of the reparation thereof as we mind to pass so great a wrong in silence unre-dressed. And therefore our express pleasure and commandment is that, all delays and excuses laid apart, you do presently upon the duty of your allegiance obey and fulfill whatsoever the bearer hereof shall direct you to do in our name.\(^4\) Whereof fail you not, as you will answer the contrary at your uttermost peril.

2. Does everything I do.
3. I.e., my own care, which he caused.
1. Leicester (ca. 1532-1588) had been the queen's greatest favorite from the beginning of her reign, and was for a time her suitor and possibly lover. Sent to the Netherlands to assist the revolt of the Dutch Protestants against Spanish rule, however, he incurred her rage by accepting, without her permission, the offer of the Dutch to make him their absolute governor. They had been without a leader since the assassination of William of Orange in 1584, and had offered Elizabeth herself the sovereignty of the United Provinces (which she declined) the preceding summer.
2. Sir Thomas Heneage, one of Elizabeth's most trusted courtiers.
3. Happen.
4. Heneage was instructed to direct Leicester to resign the governorship immediately. Though it was several months before Leicester did so, Elizabeth was by April already addressing him fondly again.
A Letter to Sir Amyas Paulet, August 1586

Amyas, my most careful and faithful servant,

God reward thee treblefold in the double for thy most troublesome charge so well discharged. If you knew, my Amyas, how kindly, besides dutifully, my careful heart accepts your double labors and faithful actions, your wise orders and safe regards performed in so dangerous and crafty a charge, it would ease your troubles' travail and rejoice your heart. In which I charge you to carry this most highest thought: that I cannot balance in any weight of my judgment the value that I prize you at. And suppose no treasure to countervail such a faith, and condemn me in that behalf which I never committed if I reward not such deserts. Yea, let me lack when I have most need if I acknowledge not such a merit with a reward non omnibus datum.

But let your wicked mistress know how, with hearty sorrow, her vile deserts compels these orders; and bid her, from me, ask God forgiveness for her treacherous dealing towards the saver of her life many years, to the intolerable peril of her own. And yet not content with so many forgivenesses, must fall again so horribly, far passing a woman's thought, much more a princess', instead of excusing, whereof not one can serve, it being so plainly confessed by the actors of my guiltless death. Let repentance take place; and let not the fiend possess her so as her best part be lost, which I pray with hands lifted up to Him that may both save and spill, with my loving adieu and prayer for thy long life.

Your most assured and loving sovereign in heart,

by good desert induced, Elizabeth Regina.

A Letter to King James VI of Scotland, February 14, 1587

My dear brother,

I would you knew though not felt the extreme dolor that overwhelms my mind for that miserable accident, which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen. I have now sent this kinsman of mine, whom ere now it hath pleased

1. Paulet was the keeper of Mary, Queen of Scots. In 1586 a number of her supporters, led by Anthony Babington, plotted to murder Elizabeth and place Mary on the throne. The plot was discovered, and the plotters were executed in September. Mary, who had been complicit with them, was placed under stricter confinement, and then tried for treason. Elizabeth's letter to Paulet circulated widely in manuscript: to her contemporaries, it was evidently the single best-known of the queen's letters.
2. Duty, responsibility.
3. Full of care.
4. Not given to all.
5. I.e* Elizabeth's own.
6. I.e., the conspirators.
7. Destroy.
1. Fellow ruler.
2. I.e., the execution, six days before, of James's mother, Mary, Queen of Scots. In the aftermath of the Babington plot, Elizabeth decided to have Mary tried and convicted of treason—legally an outrageous charge, since she was not a subject of England. Mary was sentenced to death, and Elizabeth, after much vacillation, signed the warrant for her execution. Once the sentence had been carried out, however, the queen went to great lengths to exculpate herself, even in her own mind, from responsibility for her cousin's death.
3. Sir Robert Carey, related to Elizabeth on her mother's side.
you to favor, to instruct you truly of that which is too irksome for my pen to tell you. I beseech you that—as God and many more know—how innocent I am in this case, so you will believe me that if I had bid aught I would have bid by it. I am not so base minded that fear of any living creature or prince should make me afraid to do that¹ were just or, done, to deny the same. I am not of so base a lineage nor carry so vile a mind; but as not to disguise fits most a king, so will I never dissemble my actions but cause them show even as I meant them. Thus assuring yourself of me that, as I know this was deserved, yet if I had meant it I would never lay it on others' shoulders, no more will I not damnify² myself that thought it not. The circumstance it may please you to have of this bearer. And for your part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman nor a more dear friend than myself, nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your estate.³ And thus in haste,
I leave to trouble you, beseeching God to send you a long reign. The 14 of February, 1587.

Verse Exchange between Elizabeth and Sir Walter Ralegh

[RALEGH TO ELIZABETH]

Fortune hath taken away my love,
My life's joy and my soul's heaven above.
Fortune hath taken thee away, my princess,
My world's joy and my true fantasy's mistress.

5 Fortune hath taken thee away from me;
Fortune hath taken all by taking thee.
Dead to all joys, I only live to woe:
So is Fortune become my fantasy's foe.

In vain, my eyes, in vain ye waste your tears;
In vain, my sights,² the smoke of my despairs,
In vain you search the earth and heaven above.
In vain you search, for Fortune keeps my love.

Then will I leave my love in Fortune's hand;
Then will I leave my love in worldings' band,³
And only love the sorrows due to me—
Sorrow, henceforth, that shall my princess be—

4. i.e., if I had commanded her death, I would have abided by my decision. ("Bid" is a form of the past participle of both "bid" and "bide.")
5. C.f., the thing that.
6. Wrong.
7. Position.
1. This exchange, which exemplifies the poetic banter that sometimes passed between the queen and her favorites, took place about 1587, when Ralegh believed that the rapid rise of the earl of Essex in Elizabeth's favor entailed a diminution of his own standing with her.
2. Sighs?
3. Bond.
And only joy that Fortune conquers kings.
Fortune, that rules the earth and earthly things,
Hath taken my love in spite of virtue's might:
So blind a goddess did never virtue right.

With wisdom's eyes had but blind Fortune seen,
Then had my love, my love forever been.
But love, farewell—though Fortune conquer thee,
No fortune base nor frail shall alter me.

[ELIZABETH TO RALEGH].
Ah, silly Pug,4 wert thou so sore afraid?
Mourn not, my Wat,5 nor be thou so dismayed.
It passeth fickle Fortune's power and skill
To force my heart to think thee any ill.
No Fortune base, thou sayest, shall alter thee?
And may so blind a witch so conquer me?
No, no, my Pug, though Fortune were not blind,
Assure thyself she could not rule my mind.
Fortune, I know, sometimes doth conquer kings,
But rules and reigns on earth and earthly things,
But never think Fortune can bear the sway
If virtue watch, and will her not obey.
Ne chose I thee by fickle Fortune's rede,6
Ne she shall force me alter with such speed
But if to try this mistress' jest with thee.7
Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish tears,
Tortment thee not, but put away thy fears.
Dead to all joys and living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne'er gave wise men blow,
Revive again and live without all dread,
The less afraid, the better thou shalt speed.8

Speech to the Troops at Tilbury

ca. 1600?

My loving people, I have been persuaded by some that are careful of my safety, to take heed how I committed myself to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery. But I tell you that I would not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear! I have so behaved myself that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good-will of my subjects. Wherefore I am come among you at this time but for my

1. Delivered by Elizabeth on August 9, 1588, to the land forces assembled at Tilbury (in Essex) to repel the anticipated invasion of the Spanish Armada, a fleet of warships sent by Philip II. The Armada was defeated at sea and never reached England, a miraculous deliverance and sign of God's special favor to Elizabeth and to England, in the general view.

2. Anxious about.

4. An endearment, which Elizabeth used as her pet name for Raleigh.
5. Short for Walter.
6. Decision.
7. Since 'thee' has nothing to rhyme with, and since the line is hard to construe, it seems likely that there is a line missing before or after this one. "But if": unless I do it.
8. Succeed.
recreation and pleasure, being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live and die amongst you all, to lay down for my God and for my kingdom and for my people mine honor and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman; but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too—and take foul scorn that Parma or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm. To the which, rather than any dishonor shall grow by me, I myself will venter my royal blood; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of your virtue in the field. I know that already for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns; and I assure you in the word of a prince you shall not fail of them. In the meantime, my lieutenant general shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject; not doubting but by your concord in the camp and valor in the field, and your obedience to myself and my general, we shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of my God and of my kingdom.

The "Golden Speech" A speech to Elizabeth's last Parliament, delivered November 30, 1601, and here given as recorded by one of the members. The designation "Golden Speech" stems from the headnote to a version of the speech printed near the end of the Puritan interregnum (1659?): "This speech ought to be set in letters of gold, that as well the majesty, prudence, and virtue of this royal queen might in general most exquisitely appear, as also that her religious love and tender respect which she particularly and constantly did bear to her Parliament in unfeigned sincerity might (to the shame and perpetual disgrace and infamy of some of her successors) be nobly and truly vindicated."

The royal prerogatives included the right to grant or sell "letters patent," which gave the recipient monopoly control of some branch of commerce. (Sir Walter Raleigh, for example, was given the exclusive right, for a period of thirty years, to license all taverns.) Discontent with the monopolies—which had resulted in higher prices for a wide range of commodities, including such basic ones as salt and starch—came to a head in the Parliament of 1601. Under parliamentary pressure (and in return for a subsidy granted to her treasury), Elizabeth agreed to revoke some of the most obnoxious patents and to allow the courts to rule freely on charges brought against the holders of others. She invited members of Parliament who wished to offer thanks for this largess to come to her in a body, and on November 30 received about 150 of them at Whitehall palace. After effusive remarks by the speaker of the House of Commons (Sir John Croke), the queen responded more or less as recorded here. (Elizabeth revised the speech for publication; and none of the surviving versions of it—which differ considerably—was printed earlier than about 1628.)

3. In another version of the speech (based, like this one, on an auditor's memory) the sentence up to this point reads: "And therefore I am come amongst you, as you see at this time, not for my recreation and disport, but being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live or die amongst you all."

4. An allusion to the concept of the king's (or queen's) two bodies, the one natural and mortal, the other an ideal and enduring political construct. "Stomach": valor.

5. Alessandro Farnese, duke of Parma, allied with (the king of) Spain and expected to join with him in the invasion of England.

6. Venture, risk.

7. "Forwardness": eagerness.

8. The earl of Leicester led the English troops. Elizabeth's great and powerful favorite, he died just a month later.
The "Golden Speech"\textsuperscript{1}

Mr. Speaker, we have heard your declaration and perceive your care of our estate,\textsuperscript{2} by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgment of such benefits as you have received; and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present.

I do assure you that there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can countervail\textsuperscript{3} our loves. There is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I set before this jewel—\textsuperscript{4}I mean your loves. For I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches: for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count invaluable.\textsuperscript{4} And though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown, that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subjects, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person that still,\textsuperscript{5} yet under God, hath delivered you, so I trust, by the almighty power of God, that I shall be His instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonor, shame, tyranny, and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptable because it manifesteth the largeness of your loves and loyalties unto your sovereign.

Of myself I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait, fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster. My heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you bestow on me, I will not hoard it up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, my own properties I account yours to be expended for your good, and your eyes shall see the bestowing of all for your good. Therefore render unto them from me, I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth but my tongue cannot express.

Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech.\textsuperscript{6}

Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt\textsuperscript{7} me that I have more cause to thank you all than you me; and I charge you to thank them of the Lower House\textsuperscript{8} from me. For had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lapse of an error only for lack of true information.

Since I was queen yet did I never put my pen to any grant but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me, it was both good and beneficial to the subject in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well. But the contrary being found by experience, \textsuperscript{9}I am exceedingly beholding to such subjects as would move the same at the first. And I am not so simple to suppose but that there be some of the Lower House whom these grievances never touched; and for them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries' and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved. And I take it exceedingly gratefully from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them other than the minds they bear to suffer no diminution of our honor and our subjects' love unto us, the zeal of which affection tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely care.

For above all earthly treasures I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous to my people and oppressions to be privileged under color of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer it. Yea, when I heard it I could give no rest unto my thoughts until I had reformed it. Shall they (think you) escape unpunished that have thus oppressed you and have been respectless of their duty and regardless of our honor? No, no, Mr. Speaker, I assure you were it not more for conscience' sake than for any glory or increase of love that I desire, these errors, troubles, vexations, and oppressions done by these varlets and low persons (not worthy the name of subjects) should not escape without condign punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians who, ministering a drug, make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savor; or when they give pills, do gild them all over.

I have ever used to set the Last Judgment Day before my eyes and so to rule as I shall be judged, to answer before a higher Judge. To whose judgment seat I do appeal that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not unto my people's good. And now if my kingly bounties have been abused and my grants turned to the hurts of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps and offenses to my charge.

Who, though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would I not rather incur for your good than I would suffer them still to continue? I know the title of a king is a glorious title, but assure yourself that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazzled the eyes of our understanding but that we well know and remember that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great Judge. To be a king and wear a crown is more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king or royal authority of a queen as delighted that God hath made me His instrument to maintain His truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom (as I said) from peril, dishonor, tyranny, and oppression.

There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country, care to my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety, than myself. For it is not my desire to live nor reign longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had or shall have any that will be more careful and loving.

Shall I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly weakness? I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which yet never feared any foreign or home enemy. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute anything unto myself. For I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear? O, what can I do, that I should speak for any glory? God forbid!

This, Mr. Speaker, I pray you deliver unto the House, to whom heartily recommend me. And so I commit you all to your best fortunes and further counsels. And I pray you, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Secretary, and you of my council, that before these gentlemen depart into their countries, you bring them all to kiss my hand.

ARThUR GOLDiNG

1536-1605

A prolific translator, especially from Latin and French, Arthur Golding belonged to a wealthy, well-connected family in Essex and was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. Golding was an ardent Puritan; he translated seven works of Calvin into English. His most celebrated rendering, however, was of Ovid’s Metamorphoses. The first complete English version of this poem to be published (four books in 1565, the full work in 1567), Golding’s translation is in rhyming couplets of “fourteeners” (lines of fourteen syllables).

Ovid’s vast poem, with its flood of erotic narratives about pagan gods and mortals caught up in ceaseless transformations (metamorphoses), is not an obvious subject for the sustained attention of a Puritan country gentleman. But in addition to powerful humanist interests that coexisted uneasily with religious commitments in many educated Elizabethans, there was a long medieval tradition of allegorical interpretation of the Metamorphoses, a tradition amply reflected in the six hundred lines of heavily moralizing commentary that Golding wrote as a dedicatory epistle to the earl of Leicester.

Golding’s Ovid was one of Shakespeare’s favorite books; although the playwright was able to read the Latin original, his references to the classic myths related by Ovid often reflect Golding’s English version. Most Elizabethans would have been familiar with Ovid’s description of the Golden Age, from whose ideal state humankind has declined to the evil Iron Age of the present. As Raleigh’s description of Guiana and Amadas and Barlowe’s description of Virginia attest, Europeans often interpreted the climate and cultures of the New World as a version of the Golden Age.
From Ovid's *Metamorphoses*¹

[THE FOUR AGES]

Then sprang up first the golden age, which of itself maintained
The truth and right of everything unforced and unconstrained.
There was no fear of punishment, there was no threat'ning law
In brazen tables nailed up, to keep the folk in awe.
There was no man would crouch or creep to judge with cap in hand:
They lived safe without a judge, in every realm and land.
